WISE LITTLE BOB.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

LITTLE boy Bob and little doll Sue
Were a very affectionate pair.
And one day they went traveling together, and soon
They came to a hill known as "Chair";
And, climbing up this, Table Mountain they reached,
And what do you think they found there?
A bird dressed in white, with a bright yellow plume,
Whose eyes had a wonderful stare.
Said Bobby, politely, "Sir, how do you do?"
And the bird answered thus, "Cockatoo—cockatoo."

Then they looked at each other in silence awhile,
Little Bob and this creature so queer,
Till the laddie began to feel sure that the big Hooked beak was unpleasantly near.
So softly he backed down the hill known as "Chair," Clasping close to his breast doll dear,
While he said, as politely as ever, although His voice trembled slightly with fear,
"I think you don't care to have boys play with you;
Good-by." "Cockatoo!" screamed the bird—"Cockatoo."

ANAGRAMS.

BY C. W. FISHER.

THE pastime of making and guessing anagrams is not at all new. Many centuries ago people began puzzling their brains over the mazy entanglements that the letters of the alphabet wind themselves up in, and the game still retains its power to fascinate. The keen-witted boy or girl of to-day—and man or woman too, for that matter—finds as much pleasure and perplexity in it as did the young Greek of more than twenty centuries ago.

An anagram is simply a re-arrangement of the letters of a word, done in such a manner that another or several other words are made. Thus "ceanoc" becomes "ocean," and "astronomers" are made "moon-starers."

The former of these anagrams is a very simple one. No little skill and thought, however, are necessary where, besides forming new words, one endeavors to make these new words in some way suggest the original; as, for instance, to have them ask a question the answer to which is found in the given word, or to find an anagram which shall define the word it is derived from. This is a higher order of amusement, and offers opportunities for the use of sharp eyes and the exercise of quick wits that are to be found in few games.

A delightful evening may be spent by a number of persons part of whom make while the others solve the anagrams. A box of pasteboard letters, such as are sold in all toy and stationery shops, is all that is needed in the way of material, unless one's spelling is at all uncertain, in which case a good dictionary is indispensable. I make special mention of this because I have spent many fruitless hours in trying to unravel a knotty anagram, only to find at last that the word had been carelessly spelled at the outset, and its anagram was, of course, incorrect. Be sure, then, before transposing a letter, that your word is properly spelled. Do not select a long word. One of four or five syllables is often more easily guessed than one of two or three. As a general thing a rather short word containing a number of vowels is harder to discover than any other.

Having chosen your word, place the letters that form it before you on the table, without regard to order, and as they lie they may suggest one or more new words. If either of these has any bearing upon or connection with the meaning of the original word, it is a good word to use in the anagram. If such words fail to appear at once, keep transposing and changing the letters until they do, and your anagram will have a point, and be something more than a mere trick in letters.

Practice and experience will make you very expert after a while, though many a brilliant hit has been made unconsciously.

Proper names—of authors and distinguished men—are excellent to begin on, and their anagrams can be made to refer to their best-known works. Of this kind of anagram the pen-name of Bryan Waller Proctor is a good one, and Proctor is almost better known as "Barry Cornwall, poet," than by his own name.

No fixed rules or general directions can be given to aid you in this. The method I adopt, and which has proved very successful, is as follows: I spread the letters out before me just as they come, and looking carefully at them, try to get some clew to the word they represent. If I fail to do so, I change them repeatedly back and forth, in and out, until, if our arithmetics did not tell us otherwise, it would seem as if they could not possibly be arranged in more ways than I have employed. If after this I am still in the dark, I give up attempting to find the whole word by inspiration or inspection, and devote myself to building it up piecemeal, always beginning at the tail end.

The terminations of English words are comparatively few, and I use in turn—ringing all possible changes on them—such common suffixes as "lion," "ness," "ity," "al," "ous," "ance," "ic," as well as others that are familiar to you all. Using any one of these as a "trial" ending, I of course have only the remaining letters of the word to arrange, and the task is at once simplified. Following this plan one rarely fails to bring down his game.

In guessing in the manner pointed out above, it often happens that one's whole mind becomes so intent upon forming the separate syllables that one actually fails to discover the word, even when it lies spelled in full before one's eyes; and I have seen people—not young ones, either—with such a word as SOMETIMES in front of them, saying to themselves "SO-MET-I-MES, SOM-ETI-MES, what on earth can that be?"—and they have absolutely not seen the word, and have gone on transposing the letters.

The following are excellent examples of anagrams with some meaning:

Charles James Stuart gives the anagram, "Claimes [old spelling] Arthur's seat."

James Stuart makes "A just master"; Florence Nightingale gives "Fit on cheering angel." Presbyterian, is "best in prayer"; chimney becomes "my niche"; editorial, "Lo! I read it"; Christianity, "This in charity"; religion, "Lo! I reign"; penitentiary, "Nay, I repeat it"; paralytic, "Pity Clara"; telegraph, "Great help."

Another type of anagram is simply curious, without serving to suggest the word from which it comes.

In this class may be mentioned "New door" which, transposed, makes "one word," and which has bothered many a youngster who has been told to form one word from the anagram. "Early bat" gives betrayal, and is called Queen Victoria's anagram.

From "Neat girl" we get triangle, relating, integral, and altering; from "Hot grub," brought; from "One-half bias," fashionable; from "Tea slops," Apostles, and so on indefinitely.

There is no better way, in fact there is no other way, to become a good "anagrammariar"—to coin a long word—than to practice constantly, and I know of no more charming evening occupation. Here are a few to sharpen your wits upon: 1, City life; 2, Roast mules; 3, White rose; 4, Far into Rome; 5, Mind his map; 6, Hard castle; 7, His odd name; 8, Queen's bust; 9, Rice soup; 10, Dry voices; 11, Ate so much; 12, Oyster man; 13, No more stars; 14, Hear a gun; 15, A dry shop; 16, Incur stamps; 17, Clear habit; 18, Oily tapers; 19, I'm sent to pat; 20, Sha'n't copy; 21, O! stop ate; 22, Best rod; 23, O, fat, fat, fat; 24, Scrape rent; 25, Made in pint pots; 26, A cent pie; 27, Heads, sir; 28, Some mire; 29, Ned is a toper; 30, Cart-horse; 31, Hectic rat; 32, Any one can; 33, Nine thumps; 34, Sin sat on a tin, tar tub; 35, I a beer tin; 36, Sly wares; 37, I take no lamp.

"THE BOOK OF BALBO."

BY SHERWOOD HULSE.

King SOMBA the Great, Hereditary Monarch and Grand Potentate of Hypokondrea, was a very learned, studious, and thoughtful person. So studious and thoughtful was he, indeed, that every gay sound disturbed and irritated him, and the sound of laughter was of all things the most detestable to his ears. And this was the more annoying for the reason that his own palace was overrun by as noisy a lot of children as ever tried the patience of a royal governess.

After putting up with their racket for several years, he at last determined to put an end to it, and this he did in one of the two ways by which kings are in the habit of enforcing obedience. One way, as all who have studied history know, is to say, "Off with his head!" and off it goes. "This is an excellent plan, and it has never been known to fail; but in King Somba's present difficulty it would not exactly do; for in the first place there was quite a number of heads—brown heads, yellow heads, red heads, tow heads, curly heads; and in the second place, all the heads with which he was most concerned were on the shoulders of his own children.

So he decided to issue an edict, and having taken counsel with his most trusted ministers of state, he set his royal signature and seal to a document which was read from the steps of the palace to the assembled multitude. It began in this style:

"To our most Loyal, Faithful, and Beloved subjects of this our Kingdom of Hypokondrea"—here followed about two pages giving the names of all the provinces over which he ruled—"we, Somba, surnamed the Great, Hereditary Monarch and Grand Potentate of Hypokondrea"—and so forth through several pages giving his Majesty's various titles—"having at heart the true welfare of our beloved subjects, and being moved by a great and noble desire to see this kingdom and our people exalted to the foremost place among the nations of the world, as well in the arts of peace as in the arts of war, do decree"—and so forth. When his Majesty finally came to the point, he decreed that on a certain date all children between the ages of three and seventeen should be sent to certain asylums, "lately erected for the confinement of lunatics, the same not yet having been found within our dominions."

Then, having named several varieties of punishment for any who should dare to disobey the edict, he signed himself, "Yours truly, Somba," only in much more dignified language, you will please to understand.

"I think," said his Majesty to Hevvinug and Wohful, his chief counsellors—"I think I have disposed of the baby question."

"Your Majesty has put an effectual quietus on their infant cabinnations," said Hevvinug.

"Quietus?" asked the King.

"Ancient Roman word, sire," replied the counsellor, "meaning a—ahem!—a stopper."

"Yes, yes, to be sure; and cuckey—?"

"Nation, your Majesty—meaning laughter."

"Of course—of course," returned the King. "Well, my son, what dost thou seek?" This to young Somba, the heir to the throne, who had just entered the room.

"Oh," replied the youth, "I only came to say, sir, that of course you understand this king business better than I do; but it seems to me that it's going to be awfully slow here if I've got that edict through my head properly."

"What, surrah?" cried the King, thoroughly aroused; and a king always calls a person sirrah when he is angry with him.

"Goodness! don't get mad," said the young Prince, who was just old enough to escape the action of the edict.

"It's all very well for you and old fossils like Hevvinug and Wohful; but for a fellow—"

"Fossils, boy!" cried the King. "What do you mean by using this common street slang in my presence? What ho, there!"

"Tain't slang at all, sir; it is science, traly; my tutor told me so."

At the word science the King's anger cooled down, and he took himself off to his library to hunt up the word fossil in the dictionary, leaving Wohful and Hevvinug to lament that court etiquette forbade them to punish the irreverent youth for calling them names.

The edict allowed two months for the asylums to be prepared for the reception of the children, and when at last the day came on which they were to be banished, all the roads leading to the asylums were thronged with children of all sorts and sizes who were to be separated from their parents, some for only one year, some for fourteen. His Majesty stood at the palace window, and watched the long procession with much satisfaction, while the young Prince looked out from another window with very different feelings.

Once arrived at the asylums, the young people were treated kindly, having plenty to eat and drink, pleasant gardens and fields to play in, and enough lessons to keep them out of mischief in-doors. They, indeed, were not so much to be pitied as the people who remained behind in the cities of Hypokondrea, where melancholy reigned supreme.

Let us look forward ten years in the reign of King Somba. That great monarch's ambition was gratified, and Hypokondreak scholars were recognized as the most learned in the world. Whereas formerly the Rule of Three was only attempted by the wisest professors, now Double Proportion was actually taught in the highest colleges, and Compound Interest—a new discovery in mathematics—was engaging the attention of the greatest minds. During a late war the Hypokondreak general had won a great victory, owing to the fortunate discovery by the Stargazer-in-Chief that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points. "This fact," remarked the King, "would never have been known had children been allowed to remain at large."

And not in science only, but also in language, King Somba's subjects were ahead. No less than seven words of five syllables had been adopted into the Hypokondreak tongue, and there was one sage who could actually spell and pronounce five of them by heart; whereas the most learned professor in the rival kingdom of Scrumphia could only pronounce four such words, and could not spell all of them correctly without peeping into the book.

About fifteen years after the publication of the edict, King Somba the Great died, and was succeeded by his son, Somba the Second. For several months the new King appeared to be the most utterly miserable person in his dominions, which was not to be wondered at, since he had just lost his father, and was bound to set a good example in the melancholy fashion of the time. But, strange to say, the new King did not altogether like being miserable, and he was often very much bored because he could not even smile without lowering his dignity.

To add to the miseries of his situation, everything had been going wrong in Hypokondrea lately. His armies had been defeated in battle, and not only did his learned men make no further progress in the arts and sciences, but several of them had gone out of their minds, and brought reproach upon the dignified court of Hypokondrea by their absurd doings.

This condition of things kept growing worse and worse, and Soniba the Second was at his wits' end to know what to do about it. In vain he called for Hevvinug and Wohful. Their advice was of no avail. Hevvinug ventured to hint that the King's court was too gay, whereupon his Majesty flew into a rage, and "would like to know where the gayety came in." Wohful suggested that if they were to send the babies to the asylums at two years old instead of three, it might do some good; but he only got scolded and called uncomplimentary names for his pains, for the new King did not think very much of these two wise counsellors.

At length there came a stranger to the city of Hypokondrea who had such a jolly red face and such a hearty laugh that he was promptly clapped into prison, lest his evil communications of mirth should corrupt the good manners of the Hypokondreaks. And in prison he might have staid until he was forgotten, had not the jailer become alarmed, for, thought he, if a man who laughs so much can use so many long words, he must be a very extraordinary kind of man, so the jailer invited the King's chief counsellors to talk with the stranger in the prison.

"Can you spell concatenation?" asked Hevvinug.

"C-o-n-c-a-t-e-n-a-t-i-o-n," answered the stranger, quickly.

"Hypo-hypo-hypo-chondriasis?" asked Wohful, almost choking himself.

The stranger spelled the word before poor Wohful had caught his breath again.

"Say that again, please, slowly," said Wohful.

of your realm will suggest the remedy for your misfortunes."

"'Tis well, sir stranger," replied his Majesty. "Go, search our royal library with diligence. All the learned and ancient works shall be at your disposal. When you see any light, come again to me. If you are successful, you shall be royally rewarded."

Several weeks slipped by before the stranger, whose name, it may be said, was Rambustius, informed the King that he had made a discovery, and when the hour arrived at which the King was to receive him, all the officers of the court had assembled in the great audience-chamber.

The stranger spelled it again, and the wise men checked off the letters one by one in the spelling-book, and were obliged to admit that he had spelled the word correctly.

"Can you do compound interest?" they asked; and when they gave him a quire of paper and an arithmetic book he did half a dozen sums before they had proved the first one. Then he found the square-root of a large number; so they decided to take this wonderfully learned man before the King.

"Ah," said his Majesty, "so you can do square-root, eh? I wish you would find the square-root of the trouble that is bothering my kingdom."

"I think I can, your Majesty."

"Indeed; then speak."

"Not yet, sire. I must first consult the ancient books in your royal library. Doubtless a thorough study of the early history

Rambustius reads the Book of Balbo.

"In my researches among the ancient works in your royal library," said Rambustius, "I chanced on a parchment scroll, which was so exceedingly dusty and so greatly favored by spiders, that I at once divined that it must be a work of the greatest antiquity and wisdom. Having brushed off several layers of dust, after a long study of the ancient manuscript I at length found the clew to the extraordinary language in which it was written. It is nothing less than the Book of Balbo."

At the mention of this great name the learned men looked at one another with astonishment, and their surprise was the more real for the reason that not one of them had ever heard of Balbo or of his book before.

"The Book of Balbo," continued Rambustius, "is a prophetic utterance which seems to have been fulfilled almost to the very letter. It sets forth the great advance that was to be made in learning during the reign of a monarch who should be greater than any of his predecessors. Then it goes on to say that evil things shall happen in the reign of the next King, since—and here the writer makes use of a language which is like no known tongue:

'Lal rowk dan on alpy
Kame ejka a lalil oby.'

"But what does it all mean?" cried the King.

The stranger shook his head.

"A thousand crowns to him who shall interpret these words," exclaimed the King.

"But stay," said Rambustius. "That is only the reason of your misfortunes. Proceeding with my studies, I at length discovered the remedy, and this is it."

"Oh, well, then," said the King, who was not of a recklessly extravagant nature, "that offer of a thousand crowns is withdrawn for the present. Proceed, sir stranger."

"The words," continued Rambustius, "are not exactly clear. The Book of Balbo says that he who shall interpret them shall be the means of bringing back prosperity to the kingdom of Hypokondrea. Shall I read them?"

"Read on. We listen."

"A darry leep lowdu eb tils treah
Wree heert on tillet leep ni ti;
Het nogs fo file lowdu sole sti rhimut
Wree heert on dhirnee ot negib ti."

When Rambustius finished reading these mysterious words a great silence fell upon all present, and those who enjoyed the greatest reputation for learning tried to look as if they could interpret them if they liked, but did not care to do so just now.

"And the meaning, the meaning!" cried the excited monarch.

"Ay, the meaning?" cried a hundred voices.

Rambustius raised his hand, and in a voice of awful solemnity said,

"The meaning, sire, of these inspired words is"—then he paused, and looked round upon the eager throng—"is veiled in the obscurity of prophetic speech."

The King fell back in his throne, and was distinctly heard to say, "Oh, psha!" while the others groaned.

The King finds his Children.

"What?" cried the King, rousing himself. "Can none of you interpret these words? You, there, Hevving and Wohful, and the rest of you. Have I allowed myself to be made miserable for years in order that you might grow to such understanding that nothing that is knowable shall be unknown to you, and yet you can not interpret a single prophecy? Begone! sirrabs, addeleptes, to your books! It shall go hard with you, ye learned men of Hypokondrea, if ye discover not this meaning for me. And you, sir stranger," he continued, turning to Rambustius, "go, seek diligently the interpretation, and as I perceive that you love not these our learned addeleptes, on the day on which you declare to me the meaning of these words of Balbo, their lips shall kiss the headsman's block, and you shall name your own reward."

After two or three weeks, during which the sages of Hypokondrea had been puzzling their brains to make sense out of what appeared to them to be nonsense, Rambustius informed the King that he had discovered the meaning of the two prophecies, and in a private interview with the monarch told him what they were, and what would be necessary to restore prosperity to the kingdom. And when Somba had heard what Rambustius had to say, he was so much pleased that he could hardly keep his crown on his head for joy.

"Will your Majesty allow me," asked Rambustius, "to take steps to bring about this reform?"

"My Majesty has no idea of raising any objection—tol-de-rol-de-riddle-i-day!—and just hurry it up, please." Then his Majesty lifted the skirts of his robe of state, and actually tried to dance a jig, which he did not perform very well, being, of course, sadly out of practice.

Then King Somba sent for the wise counsellors, who were shocked to find their master so merry.

"Now, then, you addeleptes," said the King, "get ready to have your heads chopped off; but in the mean time listen to the interpretation of the words of Balbo. First,

'All work and no play
'Make Jack a dull boy.'

"Did you ever find that out? Not a bit of it; you weren't smart enough. Tol-de-rol-de-riddle! That's the sort of a King I am. Now for the other one:

'A dreary place would be this earth
'Were there no little people in it,
'The song of life would lose its mirth,
'Were there no children to bgin it.'

"Did you ever find that out? Not you. You thought yourselves mighty smart because you could spell conceal—what d'ye-call-it?—and hypochon—something-or-other—and yet you never found this out. Now old Rambustius, who is the jolliest fellow living, is going to bring back all those children, that stupid old edict will be revoked, and you, of course, will have to get along without your heads. Ta-ta!"

A few days afterward the streets of Hypokondrea saw a strange sight. Banners waved overhead, flags flew from house-tops and windows, and a vast procession of children passed through the streets and up to the palace in a line that seemed endless. The great hall of the palace soon swarmed with these unaccustomed visitors, and such a babel arose of laughter and chatter as was never heard in a king's palace before. King Somba was so well pleased, that he had something nice to say to every one that came near him; and he patted the boys and kissed the little girls, so that he might by chance do the kind thing by his own children, whom he could hardly be expected to recognize after having been separated from them so long.

Indeed, he utterly failed to do so, and he was obliged to take the little boy's word for it who came up to him and addressed him with a lack of etiquette that was very distressing to the courtiers who stood by.

"Hello, dad; how are you?" said the little fellow. "I'm your son Somba. I knew you by that funny crown on your head, and, besides, I've seen your picture in the history book we had to study in the asylum. You must be an awfully good King if that history's all true."

Then a very pretty little girl came up and took hold of his Majesty's robe in a very loving manner.

"And who are you, little lady?" asked the King. "Why, I'm your little girl Babil, of course," answered the child, who was indignant that her own papa should not recognize her. "And, I say," she whispered, "do princesses really have an awfully good time, as brother Somba says they do?"

Then the King stooped down and kissed her, and there were tears in his eyes. He had never shed tears while he was so miserable; these were tears of happiness.

"My little Babil," he said, "shall be the happiest little girl in my kingdom, as I am now the happiest man."

With the recall of the children prosperity and happiness returned to Hypokondrea. Hevving and Wohful did not lose their heads, for, at the instance of Rambustius, Princess Babil interceded for them, and told her royal papa that she would never have believed that he was such a horrid, cruel wretch as to chop off the heads of those nice, dear old men, and if he did she would never love him any more, but hate him like everything, and she'd go right straight back to the asylum, she would, and stay there till she was grown up—so, there!

Of course the King had to pardon them, for though his Majesty ruled Hypokondrea, Princess Babil ruled his Majesty like the little tyrant that she was.

Rambustius remained in Hypokondrea as King Somba's chief counsellor, and was greatly beloved by young and old. But he never told the King how that, in order to convince him of the wickedness of the late King's edict, he had taken some familiar lines that he had heard in his own country, mixed the spelling up, and passed them off as ancient prophecies from a mysterious Book of Balbo.

TWO ARROWS:*

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.

WONDERFUL FISHING.

THERE had been a good deal of discussion of the fishing question between the two young friends, for Two Arrows knew nothing of the powers of a "spoon hook." Sile had them of several sizes, and Two Arrows admitted to himself that anything so very bright and pretty must be very effective. Any of those spoons was brilliant enough to have been worn in the hat of a great chief, but the doubt was as to what the trout would think of them. The gaudy assortment of artificial flies Two Arrows quite turned up his nose at. The fish of the western mountains were not in the habit of biting at such things, and could not be taught to do so. As to the hooks, however, large and small, anybody could see their superiority over such as he was accustomed to using, and the lines were elegant. Sile provided him with a rod, and when the young chief marched away with it he felt a strong desire to carry it to and through his own camp, in order that everybody he knew might see what an extraordinary thing he was doing. No Nez Percé boy that he had ever heard of had been able to go a-fishing with a joint rod and a spoon hook.

They had but a mile or so to walk in order to reach the nearest bend of the little river, and they startled more than one gang of deer on the way. Sile had his rifle and Two Arrows had his bow, but the morning had been given up to fish, and they stuck to their original purpose in spite of all temptation. On the bank of the stream they paused for a moment and took a survey of the situation. The water was not more than fifty yards wide, and did not seem to be deep, but it ran with rippling swiftness.

"That 'll do," said Sile. "It's plenty strong enough to carry a spoon. You won't have to skitter it a bit."

"Ugh! Heap fish," said Two Arrows, but he did not understand Sile's remark, and wondered what was to come next. During all his life thus far he had never thought of the pale-faces as fishermen, or that they really knew anything valuable about such matters. The contents of Sile's box had staggered him, and now he looked on in silence while the "Red-head" (as Ha-ha-pah-no had named him) put his rod together, setting the reel firmly in its socket, and then deftly fitted on the spoon hook with its fine wire "snell." Sile's father was an enthusiastic fisherman, and had given his son more than a little good schooling. Up went the rod, and the line swung lightly back for a second, and then, with a perfect cast, the brilliant "spoon" flew out over the water, and alighted among the swift ripples. The current caught it and whirled it away, the polished silver glittering and dancing near the surface, but it was visible only for an instant. There came a rush and a plunge, and away out of the water sprang a splendid trout with Sile's hook fastened firmly in his too hasty jaw.

"Hurrah!" shouted Sile. "Got him!"

"Ugh! Good," said Two Arrows. "Break!"

"No, he won't break any line. See!"

Two Arrows did see a great deal in a very few moments. The tough rod bent, and Sile gave a little line at first; but the trout made an up-stream rush and was guided to the shore. He was lying on the grass, quietly enough, just after that. So was another and another, and now Two Arrows had mastered the idea, and was at work with energy. It surprised Sile to see how perfectly his red friend could handle his new tools, but it was well that the rod was a stout one, for the reel and its uses were as yet a puzzle. It was exciting sport, for there was hardly any waiting for bites whatever. The trout were on the look-out for their breakfasts, and nobody had ever before offered them such attractive little silvery fish as they now saw, every now and then struggling through the water, all ready to be seized upon.

"We've got enough now," said Sile at last. "We'd better hurry back to camp."

At that moment a strange and unexpected sound came to his ears from some point lower down the stream, and Two Arrows came near dropping his rod into the water.

"Ugh! Catch now!"

"Yes, you've caught your fish, but what's that? It sounds for all the world like a mule braying."

"Two Arrows know him. Heap bad mule. Nez Percé lose all pony. Find 'em now. Red-head come?"

Sile looked with admiration upon the fiercely excited face of the young Nez Percé. The dark eyes fairly glittered with pleasure and expectation, and he was striving with all the words and signs he was master of to convey an idea of the loss his band had sustained, and now once more, and more sonorously, the "morning bugle" of a mule in command of something came ringing up the river.

"I'll string the trout," said Sile, as he began to do so, "then I'll go with you. It 'll be grand if we can really catch them."

"Two Arrows catch 'em all, heap time. Get one, get all tribe."

"Wish we were mounted. Better go to camp and get some horses."

"Ugh! No wait. Find now."

There was no such thing as resisting his eager urgency, and Sile himself began to get excited. The trout made two magnificent "strings," but were pretty heavy to carry, and it was decided to hang them and the two rods upon the limb of a tree until a visit should have been paid to the owner of that bray.

Not even his adventure with the grizzly, or his timely success with the two bisons when his people were starving, had so aroused the ambition of Two Arrows. The future fortunes of his entire band seemed to him to depend once more upon his own individual good conduct.

The two boys did not have to follow far the windings of the stream before Two Arrows, who was somewhat in the advance, dodged behind a tree and beckoned eagerly to Sile:

"Ugh! Look! Pony!"

Just beyond him was a grassy glade glistening with morning dew, and scattered over it was the entire command of the wicked old mule. To have been seen by them prematurely would have been a pretty sure way of stampeding them again, and the occasion called for prudence and good management.

Some of the animals still had their long hide lariats hanging and dragging from their necks and some had not, but Two Arrows noted one of the former, a very good-looking pony, feeding at no great distance from a clump of hazel and willows beyond him. He made Sile understand his purpose of getting into that cover, and then all that Sile had to do was to watch him. Down dropped the young Nez Percé, and from that moment there was little of him to be seen, except when his gayly ribboned head now and then showed itself, peering over the wet, luxuriant grass and weeds. Then a slight movement among the willows told of his safe arrival, and still the runaways were feeding quietly, unaware of the nearness of human enemies.

Sile peered from behind his tree, and watched the movements of the particular pony his friend had pointed out. He was a brisk sort of fellow, and he was working at his breakfast busily. Nearer and nearer he fed his way toward a projecting growth of the hazel-bushes, and Sile perceived a promising shake in one of these. There was something more than a shake hidden by them, for in about one minute more a light, lithe, graceful human form sprang suddenly out. A quick grasp at the trailing lariat, a rapid twist of a loop of it around the animal's face, a buoyant leap, and Two Arrows was a mounted Indian once more.

Every beast of the wicked old mule's startled command was familiar with the tones of the whoop of triumph which called them all away from their grass and their freedom. They had many a time been driven in from other pastures by that particular yell, and it seemed now as if each of them took a swift look around him and listened for the expected voice of One-eye. It should naturally have followed that whoop. Their commander put out his head and brayed lustily, and so did all the other mules, but the ponies took the matter more soberly. Whether or not they had already begun to discover warning signs of cougars, wolves, or grizzlies, they actually felt better to be once more in the company of a human being whom they knew.

Sile wondered greatly to see how readily the whole drove obeyed the shouts of Two Arrows, and permitted themselves to be gathered and driven. He refused the invitation given him to mount one of the ponies, for he had doubts of his success in managing it barebacked and with such a halter-bridle. He explained as well as he could that he preferred to carry the fish and the rods and the news to his own camp, leaving Two Arrows to handle his captives as best he could.

That was just what Two Arrows wanted. He was almost afraid lest the pale-faces should send him some help, and so take from him some part of the glory of his fresh achievement. There was little danger of that, as Sile was soon to discover. He hurried back after his fish in a state of such excitement that he very nearly forgot that he was in a new country. He would have forgotten it more completely if it had not been for something he heard as he drew nearer the spot where he had left his speckled game.

"What's that?" he suddenly exclaimed, stopping short and listening. "What's all that growling? I never heard a bear, but it might be one."

So it might be, indeed, in a country where they were so plentiful, but it was not a grizzly this time. It was only a common black bear, very fond of fish, and tremendously disgusted at the failure of his efforts to get hold of some which had plainly been caught and left expressly for him. Standing upon his hind feet, and springing up as far as he was able, his paws just reached the end of the longest string of trout and set it a-swinging. Two Arrows had wisely insisted upon bending down a branch and hanging the fish pretty high, Indian fashion, and Sile now saw the reason of it.

"He'd bring 'em all down as it is if I should let him take his time to it. What shall I do now? Oh, but ain't I glad I brought along my rifle!"

He was glad of it, very; but when he raised it in the direction of that bear the sight seemed to dance in all directions, and he could not get a good aim, short as was the distance. Sile had the "buck ague." Even old hunters sometimes find their nerves playing tricks on them. It would not do to miss a shot then and there, and Sile lowered his rifle.

"I'll try a rest and see about this thing. I must hit that bear in the head the first time, sure." He stepped behind a tree and put his rifle through the crotch of a projecting branch. That tree had no shake in it, and the barrel grew steady. "He is getting up on his hind feet again. Now for him."

The bear poised himself, with uplifted head, and, just as he lifted his paw for another scratch at the fish, Sile pulled the trigger.

The range was very short, the rest was a good one, the sight was quick but careful, and the bit of lead went straight to its intended place under the ear of that black bear. He would need no more fish from that time forth, and he pitched heavily forward upon the ground.

"Wait a moment, Sile! Never run in on a bear till yer sure of him. Reckon he's dead, though. Stand where you are, my boy!"

"Why, father! Yellow Pine! You here? I never expected to see you."

"Well, my son," said the Judge, "we thought we'd come over and see what luck you were having. Where's Two Arrows?"

"We watched ye just a moment," said Pine. "Allers take sight from a rest if you can get one. You did that thing fine. There's the making of a prime good shot in ye."

"I shook all over at first," said Sile, walking a little nearer the bear.

"Buck ager. I've had it. He won't come to. If he does it's no matter, now we've got here. I'll come back after breakfast with a hoss and fetch him in. Where's the red-skin?"

Sile rapidly explained the cause of his delay in getting back to camp; but what he did not know or explain was the fact that the Nez Percés had had no idea that their drove of lost ponies had wandered into that valley.

"Glad they've got 'em," said Yellow Pine. "Every hoof of ourn 'll be safer from this time on, treaty or no treaty, good Indians or bad."

"Would they really steal from us, after all?" asked Sile, soberly.

"Steal hosses? Well, now, that isn't jest the way it looks to them. They're brought up to it. All hoss-flesh is fair game to a plains red-skin. The more they have of their own, the easier it is to get 'em to keep their hands off from them that you have and to make believe good. These 'ere Nez Percés ain't a bad lot. Hope we won't run afoul of any that's worse than they are."

Sile was proud of his fish, and tenfold prouder of his bear, but the proudest person in the mining camp that morning was Na-tee-kah. Her wonderful brother had earned some more glory.

A VERY STRANGE BOY.

BY DAVID KER

"AND if I had not rushed in and dragged the boy away from him, I do believe he'd have killed the poor little fellow."

"Ha! ha! ha!"

We all looked round in amazement, for Charlie Thornton, of the —th Bengal Native Infantry, the pleasantest and most kind-hearted young fellow among all the eighty-three saloon passengers on our homeward-bound steamer from India, was the very last man whom any one would have expected to be amused at the idea of a child being beaten and ill-used.

"I beg your pardon, really," said the young lieutenant, still quivering with suppressed merriment, "but it always makes me laugh when I hear of a boy being hurt or ill-treated."

"Then, sir," growled a hard-faced old Commissioner beside him, "all I can say is that you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

"Don't be too hard upon Charlie, Mr. Currie," put in Major McNab, of the Seventy-eighth Highlanders. "I'll be bound there's some good joke behind it all, or he'd never talk like that. Come, Charlie, my boy, let's have the story; it's sure to be a good one."

And Lieutenant Thornton began as follows:

"About two years ago I was down at Bombay on leave from Jhansi, just at the beginning of the hot season. I put up at Watson's Hotel, as usual; and before I had been there half an hour I met three old friends of mine, just out from England, whom I hadn't seen for five or six years.

"We had plenty to talk about, as you may think; and so we managed to sit together at dinner. After dinner we went out on to the veranda to have our coffee; and I was just in the middle of telling them about the fun I'd had among the tigers up in the Terai the year before, when all at once a great halloo from below made us look down, and there we saw a sight that put everything else out of our heads at once.

"You know that enormous square in front of the hotel, with the tall clock tower on the other side of it? Well, about midway across it, seemingly coming straight toward the hotel, was a man, carrying a small boy in his arms, and shouting at him very savagely every now and then. They were soon near enough for us to see them quite plainly; and certainly they did look the two most extraordinary hobgoblins that I ever set eyes on.

"The man was an immensely tall fellow, and as thin as a lightning-rod; and although it was now, as I've said, the beginning of the hot season, he wore a long dark gray coat and high black hat, which made him look taller still. But if his dress wasn't very gay, the boy was grand enough for both, for he seemed to have got all the colors of the rainbow. He had a sky-blue cap, an apple-green jacket, red pantaloons, white stockings, and a bright yellow sash round his waist.

"It takes something to gather a crowd in Bombay, where swarms of figures as queer as any in a circus are going about the streets all day long; but two such objects as this man and this boy couldn't be overlooked even there. Half a dozen young English soldiers, who were strolling through the town, began first to stare at them, and then to go after them. Then some other people turned and followed too, till at last the pair found themselves heading quite a procession. But the man seemed to take no notice, and kept straight on, with the child in his arms, giving him a shake and a rough word every now and then, while the boy kept screeching out,

"Oh, papa, please don't hit me any more!"

"I say, this won't do, you know," said big Dick Netherby, of the —th Dragoons, who was sitting beside me.

"If the fellow bullies that poor little chap any more, I'll go down and warn his hide in a way he'll remember."

"By this time the man had come close underneath the veranda, and put the child roughly down on the pavement, saying to him:

"Now, you lazy young whelp, just walk on your own feet a bit. I'm not going to carry a great heavy thing like you all the way home."

"Oh, papa, do carry me a little farther; remember that I'm lame!"

"Lame! yes, trust you for being lame when you're told to do anything. If you don't walk on this minute, when I tell you, I'll lame you in earnest."

"Leave that boy alone, you coward!" roared Dick Netherby, leaning over the balustrade of the veranda, "or I'll break every bone in your skin."

"But the man took no notice of him, and as the boy didn't go on, his father gave him a slap on the side of the head that fairly knocked him down. Dick turned quite purple with rage, and would have jumped right down into the street, and perhaps have broken his leg, if we hadn't held him. But just then there came a frightful scream of pain from below, and we all rushed down stairs and out of the door like so many madmen, to see what had happened.

"All round the door there was such a crowd gathered that it quite blocked up the front of the hotel, and they seemed to be all shouting at once:

"Murder! Call a policeman. There's one over yonder!"

"Hold him tight, or he'll be trying to sneak off!"

"What a villain, to stab his own child!"

"There, sure enough, lay the boy seemingly dead, and over him stood the father with a knife in his hand, which two soldiers were just taking from him.

"Is the poor little fellow really dead?" asked Netherby, stooping tenderly over the fallen child. "Hollo! what sort of boy is this? Why, he seems all ribs and paper, like a Japanese umbrella."

"Well, I guess that ain't wonderful, seein' he's made of whalebone and pasteboard," said the supposed murderer, coolly. "Say, Britisher, don't you know a live boy from an image yet?"

"An image?" echoed Dick, staring, while the crowd burst into a roar of laughter.

"That's so," said the Yankee, tapping the seeming boy with his knuckles. "Fact is, I'm a ventriloquist, and all that boy's hollerin' was just my voice talkin' through that image. Here's my card" (scattering among the crowd, as he spoke, a shower of cards engraved with "Silas J. Polyvox, Professor of Ventriloquism") "and if any of you folks care to come to my performance at the Town-hall to-morrow evening, I'll fix you up a deal better show than this one."

"And Professor Polyvox kept his word on the following evening before a crowd such as the Town-hall had not seen since it was built."

CHARITY TRIUMPHANT.

ONE moment stood she silently in doubt,
Her treasure grasping tightly in her hand,
First looking at the tempting things spread out—
Red apples, cakes, and candies—on the stand,
Then when the blind man, old and wan and gray,
Sat patiently, his good dog by his side,
Begging from all who chanced to pass that way
From early morning until even-tide:
One moment, then the poor child gave her all
To him who begged with piteous, sightless eyes.
Only a penny 'twas; but though so small,
Her gift as gold will count beyond the skies. M. E.

OLD COLLEGE CUSTOMS.

BY ROBERT BRIDGES.

THE BOWL FIGHT.

EVERY college has a number of customs as peculiarly its own as the old buildings and elms on its campus. They are part of the unwritten law, which the boys obey far better than the printed regulations which the faculty issue.

At the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia, the students have a trial for Freshman nerve and grit which is certainly as severe as any known and practiced in the other colleges of the East. It is called the "Bowl Fight," and its origin was fully twenty years ago. It is said that the Sophomores of 1865 presented the Freshmen of 1866 with a wooden spoon such as is used in salad dishes. Men who were then in college do not know why the present was made. The custom was probably borrowed from Yale, where for many years a wooden spoon was presented to the most popular man in every Senior class. There was a lull in the custom for several years, and when it again came to the surface, a bowl was substituted for the spoon—probably a small salad bowl, which, as the years went by, grew in size until it became as large as the bowls which are used in bread-making.

The Freshmen at first treated the present as a mark of esteem from the Sophomores, and even when the custom was further modified by choosing one particular Freshman to be the recipient of the bowl, his class-mates still made the occasion one of good-will and hilarity. The Freshman selected for this doubtful compliment was and is the "lowest third honor man"; that is, the man whose grade for recitations and examinations during the first term is nearest to 12, which is the lowest number publicly announced.

The Sophomores asserted that they made the present on the theory that a Freshman who stood so low in the estimation of the professors must be a very good sort of fellow—which shows that Sophomores are not apt to have a high opinion of the faculty. At any rate, everybody seemed pleased with the ceremony until on one very uproarious occasion the Sophomores not only presented the low-grade Freshman with the bowl, but put him in it and carried him through the streets of the quiet Quaker City, singing jolly songs, and making him an object of curiosity to the towns-people. Everybody wanted to know why one particular man was chosen to be carried in the bowl, and everybody by-and-by found out that he was the man whom the august faculty had graded as the dunce of the class.

It began to look like an insult to the whole class, and Freshmen are only meek when the Sophomores are stronger than they are. So when the time approached for the next presentation, the indignant Freshmen decided to resist all efforts of the Sophomores to put their man in the bowl, and if possible to break it.

The result was the first "bowl fight" between the classes, in which the bowl was broken and the pieces distributed among the Freshmen as trophies of their strength. Thereafter, at the end of every first term in the college year, the bowl fight took place as regularly as any other event in the college course. In 1872 the Sophomores succeeded in placing the reluctant Freshman in the bowl, but in the following ten years the Freshmen were uniformly the victors, either breaking the bowl or holding out against their assailants until the fight became a draw.

You can imagine that great preparations were made for these contests, which each class felt was to test its honor. And although stern faculties have often frowned on similar trials of strength, I can not help feeling that they do no harm. A boy who has not patriotism enough to stand up for his class will not be likely to stand up for his home,

State, or country. There is nothing like good-fellowship, boys, and honorable faith-keeping between friends.

Well, the wily Sophomores believed in doing the best for their class, and they spared no money to have the bowl made strong. They had the hardest and toughest wood used, and the bowl was made in sections, so that the grain of the wood should run in divers directions. There is a regular rule now which provides that the bowl must be made of cherry-wood, and that it shall not be less than twenty-two inches in diameter and six inches deep, and not more than one inch in thickness. It is often handsomely decorated inside with painted designs.

The contest last year was a very fine one. It was the first held under a new and exceedingly fair set of rules which had been adopted at a mass-meeting of the college. About eleven o'clock in the morning a large crowd of students and their friends began to arrive outside the gates of the new campus opposite the college. Among them about eighty were distinguished by their peculiar clothes. The neat and attractive suits common to most students in a city college had been exchanged for knee-breeches, close-fitting canvas jackets, which will not tear and which are hard to hold, and many-colored skull-caps. The costume is similar to that worn in foot-ball matches, and is fitted for the roughest kind of a scrimmage.

Suddenly the gates were opened, and the crowd went in with a rush. The spectators took their places, and the '87 men and '88 men drew up at opposite ends of the field in battle array. The ground was in fair condition for the struggle. In the centre of it a large stone had been placed. On it the sanguine Freshmen expected to break the strong bowl to fragments. A doctor from the medical school, who had been chosen referee, mounted the stone and announced the rules for the struggle. He pointed out the place from which the Freshmen with the bowl-man were to start when he gave the signal, and the line beyond which if they carried him he was to be considered free. If, on the other hand, the Sophomores did not put him inside the bowl within fifteen minutes, he was to be allowed to go free, but was liable to be placed in the bowl on returning within bounds. Two hours were then allowed the Freshmen in which to take the bowl from the Sophomores and break it.

Then the final preparations for the struggle were made. "Where's the bowl-man?" cried several Freshmen, and immediately a short, dark-haired boy said, "I'm here," and stepped to the centre of a group of his class-mates. The latter locked arms and inclosed him in several circles of almost unyielding muscle. It seemed impossible to break through such a barrier. Opposite them the Sophomores were drawn up in close ranks ready for a charge.

"Are you ready?" said the referee; and then gave the signal. The Freshmen braced themselves for the shock. Down the field came the Sophomores as orderly as a football team at the kick-off. But in a moment the two bodies met, and all was confusion. Sophomores leaped upon the solid mass of Freshmen, changing the circle into a pyramid. Soon there was an indistinguishable mass of arms, legs, hatless heads, and torn clothes, equal to the severest foot-ball scrimmage. For five minutes the Freshmen kept their ranks compact. They were forced almost around the field, but still protected their bowl-man. Then the weaker men gave way, and the lines were penetrated. After thirteen minutes' incessant struggling the Sophomores seized the bowl-man. It seemed that he would be torn to pieces by the rival classes, but the Sophomores by hard work got him in the bowl, and the referee decided that it was a fair victory for them, and a very hard fight they had to win it.

A great shout went up, and the victors marched off with their prize on their shoulders, singing, and yelling the old college cheer, "Hooray! hooray! hooray! Pennsylvania!"

THE "CANE SPREE" AT PRINCETON.

At almost all other Eastern colleges the test of strength between the two lower classes is made over the carrying of canes by the Freshmen. There are many different varieties of this old contest, known as the "cane rush," "banger rush," or "cane spree." At Princeton it has the last-mentioned name, and is one of the most carefully regulated of all college customs. The rules which govern it have been handed down and improved from year to year, until now they are almost as complete, though unwritten, as the duelling code.

During the first weeks of the opening term prominent men in the Junior Class choose three of the strongest Freshmen to represent their class in the spree. These inch in diameter, which is furnished by the Freshman. He also has the advantage of being given the "outside hold" on the cane; that is, each of his hands is so near the end of the cane that the Sophomore can not grasp outside of it. You see how the Freshman has at least four inches greater leverage in this way. His hands have been slightly powdered with resin to give him a firm hold on the cane.

When the word is given, the Sophomore seizes the cane and tries to wrench it from the Freshman's hands. He will suddenly turn and try to throw his opponent over his hip, or he will lift the cane up and endeavor to push it over the Freshman's head, or jump upon it with his knee and try to jerk it away. The Sophomore must take the cane completely out of both the Freshman's hands. The men are rigidly and severely trained in all the athletic tricks and arts by which the alert Sophomores will try to wrench the cane from their hands. With the advice of certain Seniors, these men are carefully matched in weight and size with three Sophomores. A bright moonlight night in early October is chosen for the contest.

It is one of the most picturesque and exciting events in the college course. Staid and dignified professors, old graduates, and occasionally ladies, gather on the campus back of East College to witness the sport. All the windows on that side of the quadrangle are illuminated. A great ring, six or eight deep, is formed of upper and lower class men, a certain number of athletic fellows acting as policemen to keep the lines intact. When all is ready, the first pair of contestants step into the ring. Each man has a clear-headed upper-class man to act as his second, and a disinterested referee is chosen.

The cane is generally a stout piece of hickory about one latter needs only to hold on a certain time, generally an hour, to be the winner. It is the Sophomore, therefore, who does the hard fighting.

How each side cheers its man and jeers his antagonist! Songs are sung and the "tiger" given by either side as the fortune of war varies. And when at length the cane is won, the whole class to which the victor belongs break into the ring, shouting wildly, and carry him off the field on their shoulders.

After a brief interval they are back again, and the next fight goes on in a similar way. The class winning two of the three sprees is declared the champion. The fortunate class is always wild with enthusiasm. A procession is hastily formed, and the grand march made around the "Old Triangle," song after song and cheer after cheer being given from a hundred hoarse throats. It is generally long after midnight when the spree is ended at the old cannon with a last "Tiger! hiss! boom! ah!"

CURLY LOCKS:

"Curly Locks Curly Locks Wilt thou be mine?"

"Thou shalt not wash dishes nor yet feed the swine

but sit on a cushion & sew a fine seam.

And feast upon strawberries sugar and cream."

She toiled along toward the town;

The way was rough and lilly.

Her gown was poor, her feet were bare,

She had no gold but her golden hair,

And her face was like a lily.

The Prince came riding to the town,

His jewelled 'broideries flashing;

His velvet scarf with pearls was sewed,

A hundred nobles with him rode,

Their golden stirrups clashing.

The weary maiden on the road

Drooped like a way-side lily.

The Prince looked on her angel face;

He reined his steed; he slacked his pace.

"The way is rough and hilly," Quoth he, "for thee, and, by the rood!

I'll take thee to the city."

He lifted up the trembling maid,

And softly on his shoulder laid

Her golden head for pity.

"Now who art thou, O maiden dear?"

"What gives thee life for living?"

"A cruel mistress, sir, was mine;

I washed the dishes, fed the swine,

Life missed me in her giving."

He kissed her lovely curly locks.

"If thou'lt be mine, my beauty,

To sew a seam' in cloth of gold

Around thy charming form to fold

Shall be thy only duty.

"On silken cushions thou shalt sit

Within my ivory palace.

O Curly Locks, wilt thou be mine?

And thou shalt drink sweet cowslip wine

Out of a golden chalice.

"O Curly Locks, wilt thou be mine?

Thou shalt forget thy sorrow;

Singing thou'lt sew thy golden seam,

And sugared strawberries and cream

Shall be thy fare to-morrow."

The Prince rode gaily to the town,

His jewelled 'broideries flashing;

Sweet Curly Locks was by his side,

Behind, his nobles gay did ride,

With golden stirrups clashing.

MARY E. WILKINS.

THE QUEEN OF THE NURSERY.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WITH the present number HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE begins Volume VII. Last week we told you briefly about some of the good things which you may expect to find from week to week in the new volume. Of course you were delighted at the announcement of the bright, attractive serials by your favorite authors, and by the promise of charming short stories, sketches, and poems.

The publishers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE spare neither pains nor expense to procure the highest available talent in special fields, and persons who are distinguished for skill in games or for attainment in science and art are engaged to write of what they know best for the wide-awake circle of subscribers to this paper. There will continue to be offered, from time to time, articles of interest to girls, telling them how to employ their fingers in making pretty gifts for their friends and acquaintances, while the Post-office will continue to be taught by Little Housekeepers how to make dainty dishes and serve them tastefully.

No periodical prepared for childish eyes can compare with HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in the variety and loveliness of its illustrations. Artists and engravers make the paper a household picture-gallery, and it is no slight advantage to little people to see constantly in this journal pictures so beautiful that as they look they receive an initial education in art, and learn to prefer what is good and to dislike what is bad, unconsciously referring whatever they see to the high standard here given them.

It may not be improper to call attention to the series of holiday numbers, beginning with the Thanksgiving number and running until the beginning of the new year; a miscellany of stories and sketches, of fun, mirth, and adventure, which can not be excelled for brightness and charm.

While nothing coarse or unrefined is admitted to our columns, that which is amusing and droll is always to be found. A little nonsense now and then is welcome in both nursery and parlor, and fun at home for children and parents is not overlooked in the children's paper.

Love of native land, presence of mind in emergencies, bravery, and true gentleness are inculcated in the stories and poetry every week, and the little readers of the Post-office Box continue to show their sweet charity by their unabated interest in Harper's Young People's Cot in St. Mary's Free Hospital, New York, and by the help they still give to the little church for poor whites and negroes built by their generosity at Woodside, North Carolina.

The Post-office Box has always been a very attractive and popular department of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Parents and teachers often write to the Postmistress warmly commending its columns as most helpful to them, and not infrequently the tedium of the old-fashioned composition day in the school-room is replaced by the pleasant occupation of writing and sending a letter to the Post-office Box. Little correspondents, not only in England and America, but in Australia, Japan, the Sandwich Islands, and China, little travelers and tourists, and dear little children at home, shut in by illness to their rooms, eagerly embrace the opportunity of writing to each other and the Postmistress about their pets, their pastimes, and their studies. The Postmistress is the personal friend of every child who writes to her, and is daily the recipient of messages of affection from children whose homes are on the other side of the world. No lovelier description of child life, on the California ranch, in the homes of Old England, and of New England, on the plantation and the orange grove, in the remote frontier, anywhere to be read than is found in the artless revelations of the children as they write in the Post-office Box.

The Puzzle column, in which enigmas, square words, diamonds, and charades are made and solved by little contributors, will lose nothing of its interest, but, if possible, will be rendered brighter than ever.

The Exchange columns have always afforded boys and girls living in different parts of the globe an opportunity of transferring to each other their treasures in stamps and curiosities, receiving in return something equally valuable, and of assisting each other in studying natural history and other sciences by the exchange of specimens and the interchange of experiences. These columns are carefully edited, and certain articles, such as birds' eggs, fire-arms, and articles offered for sale, are rightly excluded from publication. It is to be regretted that some persons abuse the privileges granted them in these columns, either acting dishonestly in the exchange of transactions or using the columns for other than the purpose for which they are intended. The publishers do their best to guard against such abuse, and readers of the paper should not hesitate to report to them any breach of good faith or other improper use of the Exchange lists.

The publishers are resolved to make Volume VII. of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in every way more delightfully satisfactory than any preceding volume has been. The host of subscribers on both sides of the Atlantic may count upon this. Will the children not add their efforts to increase the already very large number of readers, so that Messrs. Harper & Brothers may be justified in their efforts to make the volume perfect in its literary and artistic features, and to so fill HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE with attractions that no home can afford to do without it?

IRAO, JAPAN.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are two little English girls born in Japan, and we have taken your nice paper and St. Nicholas from the commencement, and like them very much. We get them in yearly volumes, as we are afraid the numbers might get lost. Your volume for this month has just received. This is a very pretty paper, and famous for its mineral springs, and it is very much cooler than Yokohama, where we live, so we come up here every summer for the amusement. The Japanese are very kind to us, and we have many nice friends among them. Our father came to Japan in 1896, and has seen and told us many changes in the country. We all like Japan and the people, but soon hope to go home to England to school. Please excuse our writing in pencil and on Japanese paper. Your young friends,

EMILY and ANNIE M.

The Japanese paper delighted me, and I thank you for the photographs.

IRAO, JAPAN, August 31, 1895.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My little girls are writing you a letter, and I must add a line to say how much we prize and look for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. The volume for 1884 is only just received, and I have read the contents of the volume of the letters being very interesting, and my wife has obtained many useful hints and receipts from them. I have been in this interesting country since February, 1894, and have since that time had many changes, and I must say, not all for the best.

The Japanese are naturally most polite and kind, and many have obtained certificates of European and American ways, and lost a great deal of their innate politeness. We live in Yokohama, but the last two years have come up here during July and August, as it is our custom to take the mineral baths are very strengthening. Iako is built on the side of a mountain. The streets, all steps, remain very much of the same level; the houses rent rooms, which during July and August are crowded with visitors, the more so now as the railway has been built to Maybashi, thus bringing you in a few days to the country, formerly took two days. The hotel-keepers have a curious way: they simply rent rooms, then people come round and bring food, etc., to sell to the guests, paying a commission on the price to the host. There are no earthquakes here, and the houses are built very tall, and are much slighter than in our country. The mountains are very high. The two mountains near here are extinct volcanoes, and it is from the base of one of these that the hot water comes which supplies the baths. It is conducted to the city by a long pipe, and runs along the mountain-side. These are kept in order by the townsmen, and frequently they are broken by torrents coming down the mountains; then there is a great deal of work to be done, and I send one man to effect the repairs. A few years ago a case like this occurred, and while nearly all the pipes were in a way that they could not be before they could get back it was all burned down. All around there is evidence of volcanic action; wherever you dig you find burned and decomposed granite and pumice. The hot water walk is to Yamoto; this means "source of the hot water." The visitors drink it, but a German medical friend of mine says that the hot water would do one more good than the water. It must, however, contain a great deal of iron, as a cloth left in it for one night becomes quite red, and it is quite a business here putting white cloths made of cotton in the stream and leaving them until they have become red; then they are sold to the men who pull carts and jin riki shawls, who wear them for their own use, and it is said that when they perspire at their heavy work the iron acts as a tonic, and they do not catch cold. Another friend of mine says that the hot water peaks. These are natural steam baths. They are like boxes built up over holes in the ground, and the steam comes up through the floor, which is made of brick and is covered with a mat, and lie down for, say, ten minutes, and those suffering from rheumatism receive great benefits. While sitting here the heat is so strong that one is of aching nature, which is due to the heat of that of a serpent caught in the Aizu Mountains. After they were gone he let me see it, and I saw what was a snake, and I told you so. I was permitted it, but said the countrymen knew no better. Everything improbable here they always say comes from Aizu, and when you are in Aizu they tell you that you are in Aizu. The water opened out the water-land will have still to be moved. You must excuse this long letter, but I feel indebted to you, and if you get any notes from this, I shall be only too pleased.

Your affectionate English friend, E. I. M.

Many thanks in behalf of our readers for these kind words from a parent. For the benefit of children who do not know what a jin riki shawl is, I will tell them that it is a shut-up carriage, drawn not by a horse, but by a man.

POTTSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—You said that every subscriber to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE owed at least one letter to the Post-office Box; so I write to tell you about the Novelties' Exhibition now in Philadelphia. The exhibition is a large one, and is on Thirty-second Street, near Market, in the old Pennsylvania Depot. The first things you come to in the main hall are some of the most beautiful when used look like cabinets, and in which are elegant mirrors; there is one there worth $500. Next you see some Trenton china, which is very beautiful. Then there is a large room, and through your path—a sloping bank of grass with a tall monument resembling marble, but which is really made of manufactured ice, only slightly melted. You then go through a large room, which is a smaller building. In this is Wanamaker's Exhibition. It consists of toys and an enormous Christmas tree. There is a large room, which is with water, in which there is a steamboat worked by steam going around and around. The tree is very large, and is covered with decorations. Next you go to a room, which is a large room, and is very elegantly furnished, with a table set with a service of silver, and a parlor with beautiful paintings and velvet furniture. If it were a grate with gas burning in it, and a material which increases the light and burns very slowly. Beside the house there is a case full of all kinds of toys, such as bows, arrows, etc. I saw some coconuts being

THE HISTORY OF JAMRACH.

HERE is the history of Jamrach. After a time poor Little Jack was taken ill with a tremendous cough, so I let him out of the cage, and he used to sit almost under the fire, but he was too cute ever to get singed. One day Little Jack was so bad that I thought he could not last till the next day, so I sent John to my friend Jamrach to bring back another monkey of any kind, as monkeys, like ourselves, can not live alone. John brought back a deal box, upon opening which appeared a pinched, wretched-looking face, with very bright eyes, attached to an apology for a body. After the new arrival had been a short time in the house he began to be tamed, but the poor little fellow did not require much taming; he was too ill. We made him a coat at once, and that he was wise enough not to attempt to take off. I wanted a healthy monkey, not a sick one, and at first was going to send him back to Jamrach, but I doubted unch whether he would live to get there.

I named this monkey Jamrach, in honor of his former owner. I am strongly of opinion that he is a retired organ monkey. I formed this idea because, unlike most other monkeys, he no more minds being picked up off the ground than does a human baby. Again, when picked up, his great desire is to crawl in underneath one's waistcoat or coat, and there remain cuddled up as long as you will let him stay. He and poor sick Little Jack struck up a great friendship, and they sit nestled together like babes in the wood for hours without moving; still, occasionally they make mouths at each other, and have rows when questions of dainty bits arise. My Jamrach is a comical-looking monkey. When I examine him closely, I find his left ear is torn as though a ring had at some time or other been put in, and he had torn it out; his face and lower jaw are quite bald, as though he were shaved every morning; on the left cheek, just below the eye, he carries a tattoo mark. How they managed to tattoo him I can not conceive.

Jamrach is a very artful customer. Two baby children came to stay at our house. Jamrach at first could not tolerate their presence in the monkey room; he made terrible faces, and pouted his lips at them. The children nevertheless used to feed him with bits of sweet-stuff, etc. This, I suppose, set Jamrach thinking, for he at once changed his tactics: instead of scolding at them, he suddenly became very civil, and chattered Good-morning, thanking them especially in his own way when he got the sweets.

A PUZZLE

(Not new, but good).

MY name denotes my date to be
The morning of the Christian year.
Though fatherless, as all agree,

I am a father, it is clear;
A mother, too, without dispute;
And when my son comes, he's a fruit.
Then—not to puzzle you too much—
'Twas I gave Holland to the Dutch.

A PERFECT PIE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

I WAS much older than dear little Maud Marian, who goes to a cooking class every Saturday morning, and who often astonishes papa with some new dainty on the dinner table; much older than Clara Isabella, who tosses off feathery biscuits and foamy omelets with the ease of an artist whenever mamma has company to breakfast; much older than Laura Elise, who is just cutting the edges from the puff paste of a perfect pie (in the picture)—when a very mortifying thing happened to me. I blush whenever I think of it now, and I know very well that some of you will be surprised when I tell you that the very first dinner which I ever attempted to prepare all by myself turned out a complete failure, because when a little girl I had never liked to cook, and had always asked to be excused from learning how.

I can never forget the trouble I had that day, when the cook had gone to pay a visit to her first cousin's sister-in-law's aunt, and the waitress had been suddenly summoned to the funeral of the "frind of a frind who lived forinist me at home in the ould country, County Antrim, ma'am," and the baby was fretful and wouldn't be put down, and the range wouldn't burn, and the ovens were cold, and how to drain the vegetables and bake the pudding and make the coffee I knew no more than the little one in my arms. I am very glad that no such experience can ever fall to the lot of the little housekeepers who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, learning, as I know they are, how to do everything which comes into the routine of home life—learning it all by degrees, so that by-and-by when they shall be grown up they will step easily into the management of their own houses.

Nor is it probable that to any of my girl readers—Louise or Daisy or Letitia—will a servant one of these days say, as a good mulatto cook once said to me: "Now, honey, yo' go 'long out dis yere kitchen, an' sit yo'self in de parlor an' play de pianner. It's yo' business to eat de dinner, an' it's my business to cook it."

Poor dear Aunt Hannah, with her gay Madras kerchief arranged like a turban over her gray wool, her full white apron covering a dark print dress, her camp-meeting hymns, mournful to the last degree, and her jolly laugh, which made her shake and quake like a jelly, as she fairly quivered with fun! This nice, capable Aunt Hannah was a great comfort to a young matron who knew very little about housekeeping, for she could make the most delicious things, and nothing that she set her hand to was ever less than successful.

The result of my perplexities and botherations, children, let me tell you confidentially, was to make me resolved to find out all the housekeeping secrets, to study cookery books with more care than I had given to conic sections, and to be prouder of a light pudding, a sweet loaf, and a dainty pie than of a picture or a poem.

In cooking, you can not afford to leave anything to chance. Make it a rule to follow your receipt precisely, and do not be ashamed to take your favorite cookery book into the kitchen, to weigh your flour and sugar and butter, to beat your eggs until they are perfectly light, and to watch every step of the process from the moment you begin until the moment when you end by taking your cake or pie from the oven, done to a turn. Patience, perseverance, and thoroughness are necessary to good cooking.

You often hear ladies who are noted for their skill boast that they do not use receipts in their cookery, and that they mix and mingle ingredients according to their judgment. Believe me that it is better to have a rule and to follow it exactly. Probably, without being aware of it, they have learned their rules by heart.

nically brushed and tucked away—if you like, under a pretty little cooking-cap—that your hands and finger-nails are very clean, and that you have all the materials you will need on the table before you. Then, if you do not already understand your fire, ask mamma or the cook to explain the dampers to you, and to show you how to make the oven hot enough, and how to keep the fire burning so that the heat will be steady.

It is not a good plan to leave what you have begun, and make a half-dozen trips here and there—to the pantry, the cellar, and the refrigerator—for articles which you can not do without. If I were about to make mince-pies for Thanksgiving, I would stone my raisins, pare my apples, wash and dry my currants, shred my citron, grate my orange-peel, boil and finely chop my meat, the day before I wanted to use the delicious filling which is placed between the covers of a good mince-pie. Then I would make my pastry just as Aunt Diana has taught Miss Laura Elise to make hers.

I would choose the coolest place I could find, beside an open window if possible; for puff pastry is spoiled by being made of warm, half-melted ingredients. I would sift my flour twice with great care. Then, following Mrs. Henderson's receipt, which never disappoints, I would take, with one pound of flour, three-quarters of a pound of butter, the yolks of two eggs, a little salt, a sprinkle of sugar, and a little ice-cold water.

First sprinkle a little salt and a tiny pinch of sugar over the sifted flour; then beat the yolks of the eggs, and stir into them a few spoonfuls of water; pour this very slowly into the flour with the left hand, working it very daintily in with the tips of the fingers of the right hand.

Laura did all this until she had a smooth, firm paste. She then rolled it out in an even, square form, and having divided the butter into three portions, she spread one part flatly over half the crust, and folded the other half upon it; she rolled this out, and repeated the process three times, until the butter was all worked in. Each time she rolled it in a different direction, keeping her board lightly sprinkled with flour, so that the paste did not stick to it. When it was finished, she set it for a half-hour in the ice-box before she made her pie, of which the mince-meat had been ready for a week, carefully covered up in a stone jar.

The paste which was left over was set away on the ice and kept for future use. Paste made in the way that Aunt Diana showed Laura will keep good for a whole week. Please remember that pastry is ruined by too much handling. Learn to use the hands as little as possible in mixing it. I mix mine with a knife which I keep for the purpose.

"I tink yore pa will praise dat pie, Miss Laura, chile," said Aunt Diana, proudly, when the pie, done to a golden brown, rich and flaky, was at last baked and set on the shelf.

Papa has not yet tasted it. When he shall do so, he will, I am sure, call it a perfect pie.

THE TUNE THE OLD COW DIED OF.

BY FRANK BELLEW.

WE are all familiar with the expression, "The tune the old cow died of," as applied to some melody which does not exactly suit the taste of Jack Noakes or Bob Styles. But I once actually knew of a case where a young cow absolutely died—no, it did not exactly die, but it came pretty near it.

John, the son of a farmer at whose house I once boarded, had a consuming passion to learn the accordion—so consuming that he nearly set all the out-buildings on fire whilst practicing on one occasion, and he used to sit up late at night in the barn studying. The family had a cow (only one, but it was a good one), and she and John were on very good terms until he bought the accordion; then there sprang up a coolness between them. The cow began to lose ambition, and droop, and give short measure in milk, so that every one noticed it; but no one could guess what was the matter, least of all John, who gave her bran mashes and cut carrots and all sorts of boiled messes such as particularly kind farmers are apt to give to their cattle. Still it was no use; the cow moped and drooped and fidgeted.

One day John went away to stay a week in the city. While he was gone the cow picked up its spirits, and did its duty by the milk-pail like a regular pump. One day I was standing in the barn-yard, when I saw Mooley lift up her great big nose and give vent to a long and melancholy bellow. Happening to glance up the road, I saw John coming down the hill with a new silk hat and a black valise. We went out to greet him, but when we came back the cow was gone. It was after dark before she was hunted up in a shrubbery in the remotest part of the farm.

That night John took an extra turn at his beloved accordion on account of their long separation. The next morning Mooley was all thrown back again, and there was scarcely enough milk for breakfast.

I now began to put this and that together, and after patient watching I came to the conclusion that John was playing the tune the young cow's going to die of. I noticed that the beast grew uneasy whenever John made his appearance, and I thought I detected, under a pretense of driving away the flies, an effort on her part to look him, or flirt him in the face with the duster at the end of her tail. I had an affection for Mooley, and was fond of milk; besides, I knew how it was myself in regard to the music, so I thought I would see what could be done for the poor creature.

To tell John that his music was undermining the cow's health, or that we didn't like it round the house, would never do. To stick the accordion on the cow's horn, though poetic in its suggestion of retributive justice, might breed ill-feeling between John and the cow; so I rejected that idea. I then thought I would try an experiment; it was merely an experiment, without method or purpose, but I thought something might come of it.

Just before John's usual playing hour I quietly unfastened a corner of the accordion's bellows, and slipped a healthy rat inside, having previously taken the precaution to tie its head in a canvas bag to prevent its gnawing too rapidly. Then I fastened up the bellows and replaced it in its box. At the usual vesper hour John threw himself languidly on the hay, and drawing forth his darling instrument, gave it one long, delicious pull. There was a double note from that instrument, double and squeak—a muffled, shuffling noise, whilst the thing throbbled and bumped like one possessed. The barn was lonely, the night was dark, John was not lion-hearted; he dropped the accordion and boited for the house, where he made his appearance among us, white and wild and speechless.

The next morning he found his instrument exploded among the hay, with a big hole in its side, its music gone forever. He never had it repaired, and the cow survives to this day, giving milk in large quantities and of most excellent quality. Leaving it to be assumed that the tune has yet to be composed of which this cow in its old age will die,

The song's not been writ yet, I trow—
Rowdy-dow!
Nor composed is the tune quite, I vow—
Rowdy-dow!
With boreastic, cyclonic power—
Rowdy-dow!
Which shall slaughter our gentle old cow—
Rowdy-dow!

BRIGHTIE'S CHRISTMAS CLUB.

BY ALICE M. KELLOGG.

IRLS, have you made any Christmas presents for this year?" asked Brightie Harrison, at recess.

"Why, no," cried Mabel; "I haven't thought about Christmas yet."

"I never can think of anything to make," said Mabel's cousin Nell.

"It's the same thing over again every year," remarked Sadie Grey; "shaving-case for father, pincushion for mother, worsted ball or a doll for the baby."

"Brightie, tell us what you are thinking of," said Lillie Brown, who had watched her friend's earnest face while the others were speaking. Brightie's real name was Margaret, but it was years since her father had first called her his Bright Eyes, and this had been softened to Brightie, and adopted by all her friends.

"Well," said Brightie, glancing at the clock, which warned her that the school bell would ring in a moment, "I haven't time to tell you now; but if you want to know how to make some pretty things for Christmas presents, come to my house this afternoon. Aunt Jennie is visiting us, and promised to show me, and she said I could ask—" The bell sounded, and as the girls separated, Brightie added, hastily, "Bring any pieces of silk or plush or flannel you have, auntie said."

Aunt Jennie found a half-dozen expectant faces gathered in Brightie's room that afternoon. Aunt Jennie was a sweet-voiced, gentle-looking woman, and as the girls drew their chairs around her, she exclaimed:

"Why, Brightie, you have quite a little society here. Why don't you call yourselves a Christmas Club?"

The suggestion was a happy one, and was at once adopted. The girls displayed their materials, and the room soon looked as if a rainbow had settled there, as the bits of red and blue, orange, green, and purple silks and fancy ribbons were tossed about in the sunlight.

"Would any one like to make a photograph case?" asked Aunt Jennie.

"I would," answered Sadie, promptly. "Sister Kate has some cabinet photographs, and she is always wishing for something to keep them in."

"Very well, then," returned Aunt Jennie. "I will show Sadie how to make the photograph case, and the rest of you may watch if you like, and then you can remember how to make one another time."

"Cut a piece of this red plush eleven and a half inches long and nine inches wide; then a piece of this thin red silk for a lining the same size, and an interlining of black crinoline. Now these must be basted together; lay the plush down first, the crinoline on that (and we will double this crinoline, as it is rather limp), then the silk last, and baste these together a half-inch from the outside. Now the neatest way, Mabel, to finish the edges will be to bind them with narrow ribbon, but I will show you an easier method that will answer just as well. Trim off the silk and lining half an inch all around, and turn the plush over and catch it. This will keep it from making a stiff ridge all around. Now fold the two shorter sides together like a book, and sew a piece of narrow red ribbon (twelve inches long) on each side; this is to tie the case together. The edges should be finished with red cord or chenille, Mabel, but you haven't any here, so you must finish that part at home. There is one more thing to be done: fasten two pieces of narrow ribbon across the inside of each leaf, one at the top and one at the bottom; these are to slip the photographs through. The ribbon should be about eight inches long, and must be sewed very neatly."

PHOTOGRAPH CASE.

The girls listened attentively, and watched Sadie follow out the directions of Brightie's aunt.

"Have you ever made a cracker sachet?" asked Aunt Jennie, as Sadie put the finishing touches to the photograph case. "Here is just the right material, and enough for a half-dozen, so you each can make one. Cut two pieces of thin pasteboard three by three and a half—the size of a soda cracker—and lay over each a thin piece of cotton batting, and over this a piece of cream-colored silk a trifle larger. Turn the silk over neatly all around and baste it down. Take some white sewing silk and catch it through in a dozen or so places on each piece to imitate the dents in a cracker. Sprinkle some sachet powder on the cotton (heliotrope is delicate for this purpose), place the two together, with the silk outside, and overhand them carefully. Now if you place them in an oven for a minute, your cracker will be a delicious brown, and will look nice enough to eat.

CRACKER SACHET.

"And here," added Aunt Jennie, in a confidential tone, "is just the thing for little Daisy to make, even the lettering, I am sure she can copy. This gray-tinted paper is the very thing. Cut two pieces two inches long by an inch and a half wide. You have no court-plaster, I am sure, but I have quite a supply. Now we will cut three pieces just the size of the tinted paper, and a bit of narrow red ribbon will tie all five pieces together at one end. Now draw the ornament and letters with a pencil on the tinted paper. Have any of you water-colors here? No? Well, then, red ink will do as well. Come over to the writing-table, and I will show you how to mark over your pencil lines."

"That is just the thing for Cousin Harry in his pocket," said Sadie. "I mean to make one, too, and I have some water-colors and some water-color paper. Wouldn't that make a pretty cover?"

COURT-PLASTER CASE

"Very pretty," said Aunt Jennie; "and you could tint the paper darker at the top and lighter at the bottom, having the letters and ribbon correspond in tint."

"But, auntie," broke in Brightie, "do show them how to make meal bags! they are too funny for anything."

"Yes, certainly," replied her aunt. "We shall need three pieces of different-colored silks or satins for those, full six inches long by five inches wide."

Mabel held up three pieces of silk, one of pink, one of olive, one of cream-color, nearly the same in size.

"These," began her aunt, "must be cut exactly alike, each folded on the wrong side, sewed up like a pillow-case, one end left open, and turned. The open end must be fringed an inch deep; then each bag filled with the softest cotton to about an inch of the fringe, plenty of sachet powder sprinkled in before tying each up with a narrow satin ribbon; then sew the three together."

"Now," said Aunt Jennie, "whoever can crochet nicely can make a most durable match end holder; it can be washed like a towel, and always kept fresh and clean; very simple, too. Take a plain thin glass tumbler—you can buy them three and a half inches high. Crochet with a fine needle and some white linen thread a little round piece to fit the outside bottom of the tumbler, then three stitches apart begin the ordinary shell stitch, four double stitches from one stitch. Continue this until you have eleven rows, or the top of the tumbler is reached.

"I forgot to say, half-way round on each side, between the shell stitches, make three plain stitches on every row, to allow of the satin ribbon to be run through on each side, meeting under the bottom with a little bow. This ribbon forms the string to hang by, sewed securely to the linen thread at the sides under the bows."

"Hang it on the gas-burner in my room," began Sadie; but Brightie held her cracker up, finished, then Mabel hers, and Mabel's cousin Nell held hers, and in less than five minutes three pale-looking soda crackers were laid on Aunt Jennie's lap.

"Now let's go down to the kitchen and bake our crackers."

"A very good idea," replied her aunt. "It is getting too late to sew any more, and you are all tired."

"Suppose you come again next week some afternoon, and we will continue this pleasant work."

TWO ARROWS:*

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XX.

A FULL CORRAL.

TWO ARROWS was a born horseman. About the earliest memory he had was of riding rather than of walking. The pony he was now on was one which had carried him many a time. As soon as he had cut and trimmed a very long and serviceable tree branch, all the other ponies and the mules perfectly understood what it was for.

Two Arrows was in a serious hurry. It was the most important affair of his life. So far as he could see, the only ponies now missing from the drove were the ones which had not been stampeded, but had remained in camp to be eaten. All the rest had been rescued and kept in good order by the genius and generalship of the wicked old mule.

hardly occurred to Two Arrows, in his eager determination to get his runaways home in the shortest possible order. Once they were headed in the right direction there was but little difficulty in guiding them, and now the old mule took his accustomed place in the advance. It was as if he had repented, and was even willing to get some credit for leading his reformed command in the way they should go.

The Nez Percé community had eaten a good breakfast that morning; there had been no vegetables, to be sure, but not a soul had missed them. With plenty of fish and fresh meat, they had all that red Indians expect to be provided with, and they asked for no more. Their kind of human life can be kept going upon a very narrow diet. The laziest brave in camp was well fed, but for all that there was a general air of dejection and despondency.

Long Bear himself sat in front of his lodge, cross-legged and moody, all the forenoon; his children were away from him, on a visit to the pale-faces; his ponies were away upon another visit, he could not guess with whom; his dogs, with the solitary exception of One-eye, had all visited the camp-kettles. His only remaining consolation seemed to be his pipe, and he was rapidly and

"THE ENTIRE BAND, SQUAWS AND CHILDREN INCLUDED, Poured OUT TO SEE HIM."

Two Arrows could but wish that a dozen or so of the best dogs had been stampeded at the same time. He rode busily hither and thither, shouting vigorously and lashing his charges away from every tuft of grass they lingered over. He knew exactly where to find his people, and he meant to find them quickly. The distance was nearly the same that had been travelled the day before by the mining party, but the loaded wagons had taken more time upon it than loose ponies would, followed by an excited boy with a long "gad."

The fact that he had eaten no breakfast was one which extravagantly using up all the tobacco he had obtained from Yellow Pine. The shadow of the mighty maple near him grew shorter and shorter until it had little more left to lose, and could almost announce the arrival of mid-day.

Just then there arose, at the edge of the woods, a long, ear-piercing howl, followed by such a volley of yelps and barking as can only be fired off by a very remarkable dog. One-eye was informing the camp that something great was drawing near, and was doing his best to make up for the absence of the other dogs.

The Nez Percé warriors went for their weapons instinctively but somewhat listlessly, until they heard a tremendous whoop join in with the barking of One-eye, and recognized the powerful voice of the Big Tongue. He could out-whoop any other brave he knew of, and he was now doing his best. He had been strolling out toward the open country when One-eye began, and had found and seized upon a sudden heap of unexpected glory.

* Begun in No. 303, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Away in advance of his command, farther and farther, had wisely trotted the long-legged, long-eared, long-absent wicked old mule. Not another quadruped was in sight when One-eye gave the alarm. The Big Tongue bounded forward as if he were charging upon a beaten enemy, and the mule did but whinny affectionately when he caught the remains of the lariat at the place where it had been gnawed asunder, and sprang triumphantly upon the back of the recaptured mule.

Whoop followed whoop as the happy warrior rode his prize toward the camp, and the entire band, squaws and children included, poured out to see him and to rejoice that they now had a mule as well as a dog. Long Bear came among the rest. Ha-ha-pah-no was not there to make unpleasant remarks, but the old chief knew that mule very well, and he knew that by no chance had he returned to his owners of his own free-will. He would have remained more contentedly with a man who had found or stolen him. Long Bear was positive that he had not followed his masters lovingly across the mountains, and that he need not now make any pretense of having done so. He could hardly have believed that the mule was there at all but that he could see him, with the Big Tongue sitting upon him to be admired.

The old chief turned and looked keenly and wistfully across the grassy rolls, and so did several others of the wiser warriors. There was quite a rise of ground at a little distance, and One-eye was making for it as fast as his legs could carry him. Suddenly, as if by a common impulse, all the woods rang with a full chorus of whooping. Over the crest of that green ridge came galloping pony after pony and mule after mule, in a confused rush, and then a shrill shout arose beyond, and they could shortly see Two Arrows, gayly ribboned, ornamented, mounted, dashing madly back and forth and lashing forward the rear-guard of that battalion.

Long Bear folded his arms and stood erect and still, as if he were trying to hold himself in. His own boy, and therefore he himself, had done another mighty deed.

"Ugh! Two Arrows! Young chief! Find pony all alone."

The Big Tongue tried hard to look as if he had found the mule, but he could not do it somehow, and twice he opened his mouth widely and shut it again in silence; there was no whoop ready to come. Every other brave had a score or more quite ready, but Two Arrows grew silent as he came nearer and rode more sedately. There was almost an air of stateliness about him when at last he followed the trail of his important cavalcade in under the shadows of the forest.

It was not becoming for him to volunteer, in boyish haste, an explanation of his utterly unlooked-for exploit. Even the gray-heads felt that he was entitled to a respectful and dignified reception, and Long Bear himself stepped forward and inquired, in due form, precisely how that wonderful rescue had been accomplished. Now that the question was asked of him, Two Arrows was willing enough to tell the entire story, and to point to all the animals as witnesses to the truth of it. As fast as he told it, the more or less distorted facts went swiftly round from lip to lip among the squaws and younger people. It was almost unlucky for the Big Tongue to remark, dignifiedly,

"Boy find pony. Warrior ride him"; for a half-grown warrior near him added,

"Boy there; Big Tongue here. Same way hunt buffalo."

It sounded a little like Ha-ha-pah-no, and the Big Tongue was silenced. He and the rest now listened to the answers of Two Arrows as to his visit, and he gave a full account of the good treatment he had received. It looked as if honors had fairly been heaped upon him and Na-tee-kah, and, for their sakes, upon Ha-ha-pah-no. Some of the older squaws shortly picked up the annoying fact concerning the latter that she had learned how to make coffee, and that her hair was now brushed and combed and made shiny. They knew what combs were. She would probably wear one now. She would never again be the same woman in her own estimation, they were sure of that. She had always held her head high enough, for her husband was a renowned brave, and her tongue was always in good order.

The drove of ponies and mules was the centre of attraction, after Two Arrows had finished his recital, and every Nez Percé searched it eagerly for his own. It was decided to send off several braves at once, with some squaws and pack-ponies, to bring through the pass the lodges and other materials they had hidden near the camp of their starvation. Two Arrows ate his breakfast and dinner in one meal, and was then bidden to mount a pony at once and ride away after his pale-face friends, with the strongest assurances that the Nez Percés regarded them as so many brothers. Long Bear also sent a handsome cougar-skin to Sile, as a proper acknowledgment of the fact that he had been a looker-on at the rescue of the quadrupeds from the misguided leadership of the bad old mule. Two Arrows rode gladly away upon his errand, and some of the braves set out at once after the "left baggage."

All whom they left behind them had now abundant subject-matter for conversation and unlimited "Ughs!" The entire future suddenly brightened up for that band of Nez Percés, and they were entirely confident of their ability to procure a new supply of dogs. As for One-eye, that sagacious brute wandered around the corral, from hoof to hoof, until he knew the facts of the case thoroughly. He would have followed Two Arrows, but for the stern refusal of Long Bear. He was needed at home all the more now that there would be additional watching and barking to be done. On the whole, he was well satisfied to have it so, for his accumulation of bone treasures was becoming an affair for any dog to think about seriously.

Sile was not exactly a hero when he reached camp, but he was an uncommonly hungry boy. It seemed to him that he could eat as many trout as Ha-ha-pah-no could broil for him, and he certainly worked at it steadily for a long time. Every other human being in camp did the same, although some had already made a fair beginning upon venison cuts and coffee. All had room for some fresh trout, and all said they would be glad of a little bear-meat for a change. Sile was in the saddle promptly enough after breakfast, to go and see his bear brought in. He would not willingly have missed that, and was only afraid lest it should have been stolen in his absence, in spite of the care taken by Yellow Pine to throw bushes over it, and give any roving coyote an idea that a trap was there. Said Pine, in answer to a question:

"Them critters is too cummin' for their own good. One on 'em 'd sit down in front of that there, and howl all day and all night before he'd make up his mind to scratch at the brush."

"How'd he guess at a trap?"

"Oh, they're laid on kind o' reg'lar, and he'd smell the bar too, and he'd know it was somethin' more than ordinary. There's jest one thing they ain't cummin' enough for, and that's a rifle bullet. They'd dodge that if they could see it a-comin'."

The bear was found all safe, and was brought in and skinned, and Sile said to himself,

"Now I've got something better than a deer to tell of when Two Arrows gets back again."

THE HOUSE THAT JIMMY BUILT; OR, THE FREAK OF A CYCLONE.

BY ALICE WELLINGTON ROLLINS.

"PAPA! papa! come and see my house!" Jimmy was quite out of breath with running to catch papa. He had seen him galloping over the prairie, and had run with all his might to attract his attention. He had been wanting to show papa the house for ever so long, but it was quite a distance from their own "real house" where they all lived, and this was the first time papa had happened to ride in that direction.

For Kansas children do not have to play in a "yard." They have miles upon miles of play-ground, and, indeed, could not probably walk away from their mothers' sight if they walked a good deal of the afternoon. The children had talked a great deal about Jimmy's house, but neither papa nor mamma had had leisure yet to go and look at it.

Now, however, papa, attracted suddenly by the wild little figure running after him making signs and screaming, turned his horse in that direction, and rode slowly round and round the house without saying a word.

It was a great disappointment for the children had expected him to be so pleased, as he was always sure to be when they had worked patiently and accomplished something really ingenious. They had prided themselves especially on their house, and it was very evident that papa disapproved of it.

"I'm afraid it isn't safe, Jimmy."

"Safe, papa? Why, just see how strong it is."

"I know it looks so; but if it should cave in suddenly, you would all be smothered inside of it, and you are too far from home for us to know anything about it in case anything did happen."

By this time they will want to know what Jimmy's house was made of.

It was only an old straw-stack that had been standing just in that spot for several years, and had settled gradually, so that it was almost as stiff as stone. But the cattle had eaten great holes into it on the sides, and one of these holes was so large that it had suggested to Jimmy to pull out more of the straw, and make a real cave in the middle of the stack. He had done it very nicely, and the straw had not loosened at all, apparently, except just where he had pulled it out; but papa was afraid it might fall in some time, and at any rate it would be too great a risk to run.

So the children were forbidden to play in it any more.

About a month afterward, when even the children had almost forgotten their disappointment, they were all terrified by the coming of a cyclone.

I can not hope to make you understand how awful a thing a cyclone is. You have read about cyclones, perhaps, but you can never begin to know what terrible things they are unless you have lived through one. It is not merely a frightful storm; it is almost like some great winged, living demon swooping down upon the defenseless earth in a whirling cloud, and gathering up in its terrible clutches men, women, and children, stone houses, great trees, barns, fences, cattle, iron implements—everything that comes in its way. Nothing is too heavy for it to lift, or too strong for it to break; it has been known to scoop up the water out of the wells and leave them dry.

Dazed with terror, Mr. Harris caught up the baby and ran out of the house; for they all knew that the stone house, firmly as it was built, would be no protection to them; and it would be worse to be buried under its ruins than even to be caught up by the cyclone and whirled away in its fierce grasp till it should be tired of holding them, and let them drop from its awful fingers, perhaps miles away, and certainly widely separated from each other. But once free from the dangerous house, what could be done? Almost every one in company, where they are liable to cyclones builds a "dug-out," i. e., a sort of little hut dug out from the side of a hill. The cyclone can not blow down a hill, and as it blows over it, the frightened inmates are quite safe. But Mr. Harris had unwisely kept putting off building a "dug-out" till after the ploughing, or the planting, or the mowing, or the harvesting; and now the dreaded storm was upon them and they had no sort of shelter from it.

"Papa," said Jimmy, suddenly, "come to my house."

To this day Mr. Harris can not tell exactly why he ran to Jimmy's house. Certainly, if he had stopped to think about it, it would have seemed absurd to expect safety in a straw-stack when you could not reasonably hope for it behind stone walls. But it was at least something to do, and there was nothing else to be done; so they all ran, ran, ran, as fast as they could to the deserted stack. There was room in Jimmy's house for the whole family, and they were soon sheltered in it.

Outside, raging around them, they could hear the fearful crash and din as the cyclone did its destroying work. But it was at least a comfort that they were all together, and that they could not see the sickening color, greenish-black, of the frightful cloud, more like a living monster in its wrath than merely a force of nature, flecked with curling white here and there at the lower edge, curving and whirling slowly, then swiftly writhing round in the hollow space above, and springing suddenly down upon the earth as a hawk pounces on a chicken, boring, boring, boring into the ground like a great cruel auger, sparing nothing, and seizing, not like the hawk, that which it wants and has been taught by instinct to try and get at any cost, but that which it has no possible use for, merely with a wild and terrible instinct to destroy.

They listened, listened, listened, as it seemed to them, for hours, though in reality it was only a few minutes. Then suddenly, with one swoop of its powerful folds, the storm cloud bent to the sturdy straw-stack doing its best to baffle its master and playmates. But it did not succeed in carrying off the stack. Why not, Mr. Harris can not imagine to this day, when far firmer foundations than even the slowly settling base of the straw cone had yielded to its grasp. It only lifted off the upper half of the stack, as if it had sliced it in two with a knife, leaving the frightened family still safe in the lower half, though now that they had no roof there came pouring in upon them a terrible deluge of black mud, while they were bruised by falling timbers loosened from the clutch of the whirlwind just over their little cabin. A whirl, a roar, the flash and report of fearful lightning and thunder, a moment of murky blackness, and the cyclone was gone!

Then, indeed, they looked tremblingly at each other. They were all there, and no one was seriously hurt, though they were so begrimed with the shower of black mud that they could hardly recognize themselves. It seemed to have been driven into their very skin; many washings only removed the worst of it, and even then, Mr. Harris assures me, there was a grayness left which had to wear away gradually.

"You see, papa," said Jimmy, proudly, "my houses never cave in; they always cave out."

"True, my son. After this I will always employ you for my architect," said papa, stooping to kiss the lad whose "house" had kept safe from harm even the little helpless baby in its father's arms, though when the storm was over, and Mr. Harris looked for the splendid new threshing-machine for which he had paid a thousand dollars the week before, it was nowhere to be found, though it was made of iron, and so heavy that I dare not try to estimate its weight. Several days after, it was reported that parts of the machine had been found scattered over the prairie, four or five miles from the place where it had been standing.

PERSONAL REMINISCENCES OF JUMBO.

BY HIS KEEPER, MATTHEW SCOTT.

IT was in December, 1851, that my name was entered on the books of the Royal Zoological Society's Garden, at Regent's Park, in London. I was then seventeen years of age, and my great desire to be constantly among the animals which I had visited over and over again was finally gratified.

My work as assistant keeper was laborious, but I did not shirk my duties for fear of discharge, and the pleasure I found in making friends of the dumb beasts made the working hours pass quickly by. The most ferocious and the wildest animals seemed to be the ones I liked best, and whenever an elephant arrived at the Garden I was usually the first to make friends with him. Sometimes I found it impossible to gain their confidence, and I might tell of many a struggle with a treacherous wild-cat or hyena.

I well remember when it was announced, eighteen years ago, that an African elephant, with immense ears like folding parlor doors, would soon arrive, and the managers decided to put me in charge of him. There was great excitement when the boat arrived from Paris, and it seemed as if all the boys and girls in London turned out to see him. The little elephant was a curiosity on account of his peculiar shape and big ears, and the members of several learned societies came to examine him. The name I gave him, Jumbo, had no particular significance; in fact, I don't think I had ever heard it.

From the natives where he was captured it was learned that Jumbo was five years of age, and I took delight in telling the visitors that he would grow to be the biggest elephant in the world. This I judged from the peculiar size and proportions of his bones in relation to the body, and I resolved soon afterward that I would make a study of feeding him. He was then sickly, and in a bad state of health generally. Jumbo and myself were fast friends the first time we met, and he would be governed by none of the other keepers. He was like a great good-natured boy, and he took a special fancy to children and ladies, and was never so happy as when he could carry a back-load of little ones around the Park. His passengers included children of royalty and nobility, and as he grew rapidly, a larger saddle was necessary every few months.

One day as Jumbo was passing through a crowd he suddenly stopped, and would not move an inch when I commanded him to proceed. From my seat in the saddle I observed that a lady below was much agitated as she came running toward Jumbo. Leaning over the side of the saddle, I saw that a child of two or three years had fallen in our pathway, and was lying between Jumbo's fore-feet. The beast would not stir until he had taken up the infant tenderly in his trunk and passed it over to the mother.

Mr. Barnum, ten years ago, saw Jumbo at the Gardens, and tried to purchase him. When he offered $50,000 for him, I was afraid the directors would let him go, and that I would lose my best friend. I didn't have much to say to the great showman, and was not at all anxious to exhibit the good points of my big elephant, until after the managers of the Garden had assured me that they would never allow the animal to go to America for any price. Six years ago, however, Jumbo had turns of fretfulness which alarmed the directors, and they even went so far as to purchase blunderbusses with which to shoot him if he became mad and unmanageable. I told them that elephants were social animals, and that what ailed Jumbo was the want of society with his own species.

As Mr. Barnum had a score or two of elephants in his great American show, Mr. A. D. Bartlett, superintendent of the Zoological Gardens, advised the sale of Jumbo at a greatly reduced price. Mr. Barnum offered $10,000, and the directors accepted it, on the condition that he should take him as he stood, as they would run no risks of removing him. The bargain was made, and it was one of the happiest days of my life when I found that I was to accompany my old friend across the water.

The journey is familiar to every boy and girl in the land. Even those who have not seen Jumbo on his travels through the country have read how Jumbo was boxed up and hoisted aboard the steamer Assyrian Monarch by means of enormous derricks, and how, on his arrival in New York in April, 1882, every paper in the land had columns of interesting news about the wonderful beast that had now grown to be the largest known animal in the world.

When Jumbo had got to be a good-sized boy, another African elephant was brought to the Zoological Gardens. This was a female, and we named her Alice. She is now there, and her age is twenty years, four years less than

MATTHEW SCOTT.

Jumbo's age. She is of the same build, and very affectionate, but does not display the same affection for children.

Jumbo and Alice always went out together, and whenever he was taken for a promenade she was uneasy unless she could go too. Her affection for me was very marked, and when I return to England I expect to be greeted by her with cordial demonstrations of elephant pleasure. She was growing fast when I left her, and she has six or seven years to grow yet. The children call her now, as then, Jumbo's wife.

Jumbo was unlike any other elephant in Mr. Barnum's great herd. It would never do to punish him or to force him to obey. Mr. Arstingstall holds sway over nearly fifty great animals (any one of which might pick him up and hurl him as a boy would a rat) solely because they fear him. Not so with Jumbo. He minded me because he loved me. Many years ago it was that he began to show his affection for me, and he never betrayed the confidence I placed in him. Whenever I could make my wishes known to him, he always obeyed. Like a child, he would sometimes be peevish and sullen, but at such times he would solicit me to pet him, and if I remained near, he would soon get over his ill feeling.

We have travelled many thousands of miles together in the magnificent car built expressly for our use. My sleeping apartment was at one end of the car, and my bed was near Jumbo. Unless I was in it he would not go to sleep, no matter what hour of the night it might be. Sometimes I would take a short walk around the city after the exhibition was over for the day, and before the cars started. Jumbo was always awake, and waiting for his bit of cake and beer, or whatever I had. He always shared my beer at night. Once I forgot to give him his portion, and after I had dropped asleep he put his trunk around me, and lifted me out of my bed. I then recollected the nip of beer I had left in the mug, not enough to wet the old fellow's throat, but as soon as he got it he was satisfied.

He was mischievous, too, and oftentimes he would wait until I had fallen asleep, and then carefully take off my bedclothes without awakening me. If it was cold weather, I would find the quilts crowded into the ventilator overhead. I recollect finding my coat and vest carefully tucked into the grating of the car, out of my reach. I looked for them for half an hour, while Jumbo swung his trunk like an enormous pendulum, as he always did when expressing delight. Finally he directed my attention to the grating, and at my request gave them back. Many times Jumbo has picked me up and placed me out of danger of various kinds to which he fancied I was exposed, and in several instances he saved my life. When the stampede of elephants took place last year, he caught me in his trunk, and held me a prisoner between his fore-feet until the general alarm had subsided.

An amusing instance occurred at Penn Yan of Jumbo's jealousy of the attention paid me by visitors to the great show.

A young lady from the rural districts took quite a fancy to me, and I suppose I took more pains than usual that she should know the whole history of Jumbo. She returned several times before the circus performance began in the big tent, and each time brought a bouquet or other small gift. After the exhibition she came again, and Jumbo concluded that I was either in great danger or else receiving altogether too much attention from the damsel. At any rate, he wound his trunk around me and drew me away from her. I freed myself, and again made myself agreeable, when Jumbo picked me up and placed me on one side, and then gently but firmly pushed the lady away from him as far as his chains would allow.

Poor Jumbo is now no more, and I shall probably return to England this winter. Mr. Barnum has repeatedly desired me to remain in Bridgeport, and go out again with the great show next spring. The trip will be west across the continent, and I expect to go; but I will first go to my old home in London, where my brother and sister reside.

I do not like to review the details of Jumbo's sudden death. He showed his affection for me to the last moment, and it seems that he realized the danger to which I was exposed. He first took care, as he saw the fatal train coming, that I should be saved, and quickly put me out of harm's way. Then he as quickly rolled Tom Thumb away from the track, and in so doing lost so much time that the engine was upon him before he could move away. He was a king, and he faced death like a king. The locomotive struck him on the head, fracturing his skull.

All the inhabitants of St. Thomas, Ontario, where the accident occurred, turned out to see the great animal as he lay stretched on the bank next day, and an enterprising photographer took a large picture of Jumbo, while I stood by his head. I have the first copy which was printed, and prize it as the only perfect picture of my dead companion of eighteen years, who was always faithful, and to me as devoted as a human being could ever be.

Jumbo's hide and bones are now in charge of Professor Ward, proprietor of the great museum at Rochester, New York, and he is preparing them for Mr. Barnum hereafter to transport through the country with his show. Eventually the skeleton will rest at the National Museum of the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, while the stuffed skin will be placed in the Barnum Museum of Natural History at Tufts College, near Boston.

Mr. Barnum sends the following short account of Jumbo's introduction to his herd of elephants:

"The day after Jumbo's arrival at Madison Square Garden we resolved to introduce him to the thirty-five Indian elephants which we had there. Some of us feared the result, but Scott insisted that Jumbo was too much of a gentleman to misbehave. So we placed our thirty-five elephants in a row, each being chained one leg to a post, and then Scott led Jumbo in. He passed in front of the string of elephants, looking at first a little surprised, as did all the other elephants when they first discovered him approaching. But Jumbo and all the other elephants at once looked kindly, and each extended its trunk as Jumbo passed, which he fondly took with his own trunk, giving each elephant a kind caress. Mutual affection seemed at once established, and it existed without interruption till the day of his death."

The illustrations on the preceding page show the treatment to which an unruly elephant is subjected. The animal in the central picture, which is trying to "bring the house down about their ears," is evidently a new arrival.

In the second picture he is shown strapped down to the floor, with his legs pulled out in different directions, so that he is a very helpless and unhappy monster. This treatment ought to show him that the slight young man standing near him is his master; but no sooner is he released, perhaps, than he forgets his late humiliating position, and begins to "cut up" again. Accordingly, his keeper proceeds to the third mode of correction. The huge beast is hoisted on to a pedestal which allows him just room enough for his four feet, so long as he keeps them close together. To make it worse, the keeper stands below, and addresses his great charge in terms of reproach such as a nurse might use to a naughty child.

A little of this kind of treatment usually goes a long way toward subduing the rebellious spirit, but not always. An elephant, it is well known, has a proper appreciation of his own bulk and weight. He will not cross a bridge until he has tested its strength. He has no confidence in anything but solid earth. Imagine, then, what his feelings must be when he is raised eight or ten feet in the air and left to hang there.

This generally reduces him to obedience. He finds it easier now to do what this man, his keeper, wants him to do, and follows him around the premises as meekly as any kitten.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

THERE was a soldier marching along the road, right—left—right—left, until he had come to his rich brother's house.

"Good-day, brother," said he, "and how does the old world treat you?"

But the rich brother screwed up his face and rubbed his nose, for he was none too glad to see the other. "What!" said he, "and is the pewter penny back again?"

The brave soldier said tut! tut! and was not this a pretty way to welcome a brother home, to be sure! All that he wanted was just a crust of bread or two, and a chance to rest the soles of his feet back of the stove a little while.

Oh, well, if that was all that he wanted, he might have his supper and a bed for the night, but he must not ask for any more, and he must jog on in the morning and never come that way again.

Over by the fire was a bench, and on the bench was a basket, and in the basket were seven young ducks that waited where it was warm until the rest were hatched. The soldier saw nothing of these; down he sat, and the little young ducks said "Peep!" and died all at once. Up jumped the soldier, and over went the beer mug that sat by the fire, so that the beer ran all around and put out the blaze.

At this the rich brother fell into a mighty rage. "See!" said he, "you never go anywhere but you bring trouble with you. Out of the house before I make this broom rattle about your ears!"

And so the brave soldier had to go out under the blessed sky again. "Well! well!" said he, "the cream is all sour over yonder, for sure and certain! All the same, it will better nothing to be in the dumps; so we'll just sing a wee bit of a song to keep our spirits up." So the soldier began to sing and sing, and by-and-by he made out that somebody was singing along with him.

"Hello, comrade!" said he; "who is there?"

"Oh," said a voice beside him, "it is only Trouble."

"And what are you doing there, Trouble?"

Oh, Trouble was only jogging along with him. They had been friends and comrades for this many a bright day, though the soldier had known nothing of that. Why, where had the soldier ever gone anywhere that Trouble had not gone along with him?

Yes, yes. This was all very fine; but there must be an end of the business. See! yonder was one road and here was another. Trouble might go that road, and he would go this.

"Oh no," says Trouble, "I will never leave you now; you and I have been comrades too long for that."

Very well. The soldier would see about that. They should go to the King, and he should know all about the business. Things had come to a pretty pass if one could not choose one's own comrade in this broad world, but must have Trouble always jogging at his heels.

So off they went—the soldier and Trouble—and by-and-by they came to the great town, and there they found the King.

"Well, and what is the trouble now?" said the King.

Trouble, indeed! Why, it was thus and so; here was that same Trouble tramping around at the soldier's heels, and would go wherever he went. Now the soldier would like to know whether one had no right to choose one's own comrades.

Well, the King thought and thought, and puzzled and puzzled, but that nut was too hard for him to crack; so he sent off for all of his wise councillors to see what they had to say about the matter.

When they had all come together the wise councillors began to talk and talk, and one said one thing and another another. After a while they fell to arguing with loud voices, and then they grew angry, and at last came to fisticuffs.

That was the kind of prank that Trouble played them.

Now the King had a daughter, and when she heard all the hubbub she came to see what it was about.

Well, the King told her how the soldier had come to get rid of Trouble, and how he had done nothing but bring it with him.

"Perhaps," said she, "Trouble might leave him if he were married."

At this the King fell into a mighty fume, for no man likes to have a woman tell him to do thus and so. He should like to know what the Princess meant by coming and pouring her broth into their pot! If that was her notion, she might help the soldier herself. Married he should be, and she should be his wife; that was what the King said.

So the soldier and the Princess were married, and then the King had them both put into a great chest and thrown into the sea. But there was room in the chest for Trouble, and he went along with them.

Well, they floated on, and on, and on for a great long time, until at last the chest came ashore at a place where three giants lived.

The three giants were sitting on the shore fishing. "See, brothers!" said the first one of them; "yonder is a great chest washed up on the shore." So they went over to where it was, and then the second giant took it on his shoulder and carried it home. After that they all three sat down to supper.

Just then the soldier's nose began to itch and tinkle so that, for the life of him, he could not help sneezing.

"At-tchew!"—and there it was.

"Hark, brothers," said the third giant; "yonder is somebody in the chest!"

So the three giants came and opened the chest, and there were the soldier and the Princess, there too, but the giants saw nothing of him.

They bound the soldier with strong cords, so that they might have him for breakfast in the morning.

And now what was to be done with the Princess?

"See, brothers," said the first giant; "I am thinking that a wife will about fit my needs. This lass will do as well as any, and as I found her, I will just keep her."

"Prut! how you talk!" said the second giant. "Do you think that nobody is to marry in the wide world but you? Who was it brought the lass to the house, I should like to know? No; I will marry her myself."

"Stop!" said the third giant; "you are both going too fast on that road. I thought of a wife long before either of you. Who was it found that the lass was in the house, I should like to know?"

And so they talked and talked until they fell to quarrelling, and then to blows. Over they rolled, cuffing and slapping, until each one killed the others, and they all lay as dead as fishes.

"See, now," said Trouble to the soldier, "who can say that I have done nothing for you? Listen! Over yonder in the field is a great stone, under which the giants have hidden stacks and stacks of money. Go and borrow a cart and two horses, and I will show you where it is."

Well, you may guess that that was a song that pleased the soldier. Off he went and borrowed a cart and two horses of one of the neighbors. Then he and Trouble went into the field together, and Trouble showed him where the stone was under which the treasure lay.

The soldier rolled over the stone, and there, sure enough, lay bags and bags all full of gold and silver money.

Down he went into the pit and began bringing up the money and loading it into the cart. After a while he had brought it all but one bagful.

"See, Trouble," said he, "my back is nearly broken with carrying the money. There is still one bag down there yet; go down, like a good lad, and bring it up for me."

Oh yes; Trouble would do that much for the soldier, for had they not been comrades for many and one bright, blessed days? Down he goes into the pit, and then you may believe that the soldier was not long in rolling the stone back into its place. So there was Trouble as tight as a fly in a bottle.

After that the soldier went back home again with great contentment. He had left one bag of money, but then it was worth that much to be rid of Trouble.

After that the soldier built a ship, and loaded it with the money. Then he and the Princess sailed away to the King's house, for they thought that maybe the King would like them better now that Trouble had left them and money had come.

When the King saw what a great boat-load of gold and silver the soldier had brought home with him, he was as pleased as could be. He could not make enough of the brave soldier. He called him son, and walked about the streets with him arm in arm, so that the folks might see how fond he was of the other.

Well, one day a neighbor came to the rich brother and said,

"Dear! dear! but the world is easy with your brother the soldier!"

At this the rich brother pricked up his ears. "How is that?" said he.

"Oh, the neighbor could not tell him. All that he knew was that the soldier was living over yonder with a Princess for his wife, and with a barn full of bags of gold and silver instead of barleycorn.

Well! well! this would never do. The rich brother must pick up acquaintance with the soldier again now that he was rising in the world. So he put on his blue Sunday coat and his best hat, and away he went to the soldier's house.

Well, the soldier was a good-natured fellow, and bore grudges against nobody, so he shook hands with his brother, and they sat down and had their pipes and beer together by the stove.

Then the rich brother wanted to know all about everything. How came it that the other was so well off in the world?

"Oh, there was no secret about that; it happened thus and so. And then the soldier told all about it. After that the other went home, but there was a great buzzing in his head, I can tell you.

"Now," says he to himself, "I will go over yonder to the giants' house, and will let Trouble out from under the stone. Then he will come here to my brother, and will turn things topsy-turvy, and I will get the bag of money that was left there."

So off he went until he came to the place where Trouble lay under the stone. He rolled the stone over, and, whisk! clip! out popped Trouble from the hole.

"And so you were leaving me here to be starved, were you?" said he.

"Oh, dear friend Trouble, it was not I; it was my brother the soldier."

Oh, and they were all very good friends. Now they were all very good friends, and the man who had found the gold was an end of it. So being young and strong of gold for it was 1829 time that they were going home.

So the rich brother took the bag of gold over his shoulder, and the two went home together, and if anybody was down in the mouth, it was the rich brother.

And now everything went wrong with the rich brother, for Trouble dogged his heels wherever he went. At last his patience could hold out no longer, and he began to cudgel his brains to find some way to get rid of his Trouble.

So one day he said, "Come, Trouble, we will go out into the forest this morning, and cut some wood."

Well, that suited Trouble as well as anything else, so off they went together, arm in arm. By-and-by they came to the forest, and there the man cut down a great tree. Then he split open the stump, and drove a wedge into it. So it came dinner-time, and then Trouble and he ate together.

"See, now, Trouble," said the man, "they tell me that you can go anywhere in all of the world."

"Yes," said Trouble; "that is so."

"And could you go into that tree that I have split yonder?"

Oh yes; Trouble could do that well enough.

If that was so, the man would like to see him do it—that he would.

Prut! it was little the man wanted; Trouble would do that and more, too, for a friend's asking. So he made himself small and smaller, and so crept into the cleft in the log as easily as though he had been a mouse. But no sooner was he snugly in the cleft than the man seized his axe and knocked out the wedge, and there was Trouble as safe as safe could be.

Dear me, that was a long, long time ago, or else some busybody must have let Trouble out of that log, for I know very well that he is stumping about the world nowadays.

SIAMESE CHILDREN BATHING.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THREE little stories, none of which is without merit, appear in the Post-office Box this week. The pretty cut at the head of the Post-office Box illustrates Harry's letter from Siam, which all will enjoy.

BANGKOK, SIAM.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Ada and I are having a very jolly time in Bangkok, and we thought I would like to hear about some of the strange sights. We go everywhere in boats, for the city, like Venice, is all out up by canals, and there is only one road in Bangkok, that is a path, over the tide. Mamma says pulling against the tide is hard work anywhere; she says you will agree with her about that.

You ought to see little tots of three years old swimming like ducks. Babies are thrown in the water almost as soon as they can move their limbs, and they like swimming better than walking. You can hardly drown a Siamese infant if you try. Of course nobody, not even Jimmy Brown, would really think of trying, but you know what I mean.

Papa came in one day, not long ago, and proposed something nice. "Children, let us go cheerily. I've a treat for you. I've just been talking to the Minister of War, and he tells me he is going to have a show at his place to-night, and he'll be pleased to see us if we care to come."

"Hurrah! how jolly!" shouted I. At about half past seven we were seated in our covered boat ready to start for the evening amusement. Four shrewy Siamese rowers, dressed in white sailor's jacket and trousers, and large straw hats, sent us up the stream at a fine pace. "It's just lovely, going everywhere in boats," said Ada.

"You'll have enough of it by-and-by," said I. When we arrived at the Minister's house, we were taken into a large hall. On a platform at one end of the hall were two strange-looking figures dressed in green, with long flapping tails, flying right on their faces. In the middle of the platform were a number of men with sticks, who chanted a story, and beat time with the sticks. These queer figures were mermaids.

Presently a king, queen, and a little prince came on the platform. Their dresses were costly, being of cloth of gold, and sparkling with jewels. They had crowns on their heads, and gorgeous rings on their fingers and ears. These people chased each other around in a very absurd way; the queen having lost the king and the prince went away supposed to be finding them. The mermaids helped her. It was very funny, yet very silly. After a while the king and the prince went to bed with their attendants. The mermaids helped her always had thought kings slept in their crowns, and now she knew it.

At this time papa said he thought it was too late for us to see any more of the show, so we went home. Papa is a missionary; that is the way Ada and I happen to be living in Siam.

HARRY.

AN OLD DOG'S STORY.

I am growing old and feeble, but as I think of the days of my youth, my eyes fill me with a joyful sense of consequence and pride. One day I was awakened from my nap by a sound of confusion. People were hurrying around in the wild est excitement; the room was filled with smoke, which almost suffocated me, and I could hear the sound of engines at work. I stood amazed. I thought then it flashed across my bewildered brain that there was a fire! I rushed into the open air to behold my own master's house in flames.

An excited crowd was in the street. Ladders were being placed at the windows, and barked with excitement. Suddenly the mother of the family shrieked in agony, "My child! my child!" The father rushed into the house, and ran from room to room in search of the missing one, until driven out by the smoke and flame. He suddenly dashed across me that the baby was in the parlor. Had I not been playing with him only an hour ago?

In a second I was by his side. I flew to the window, barking with all my might, and back to the baby again, but all my efforts all in vain; I could not make the stupid people understand me. At last a bright thought struck me; I ran to the baby, and seizing it by the neck and waist, I rushed into the house and, running to the widow, held it up so that it might be seen by the people in the street below. Once more the frantic father dashed into the house, where he knew I was. Claspng his child to his arms, he fled from the burning building. I dashed to the window and leaped out. A crash after the wall fell in with a crash. But the baby was saved.

BARRY M.

BAYONNE, NEW JERSEY.

MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

I am a little girl of twelve years old. I lay in bed for a year and a half with hip-disease. I can walk about now with a crutch and a high-heeled boot. I have two brothers and four sisters. A riot held in Manchester on account of the passing of the Ship-canal Bill. Two of my brothers assembled to the number of 40,000, consisting of trades societies, Odd-Fellows, Foresters, Ancient Shepherds, and Testaments. We went to Albert Square. I took an hour and a half for the procession to march out of it. I am glad to say that it was a fine day. We hope that the canal will be opened in four or five years. When I trust to have the pleasure of seeing large ships from America and other countries coming up to the Manchester docks with cotton, provisions, and other articles.

Your happy little correspondent,

ANNIE E. D.

MONTVILL, SEINE-ET-OISE, FRANCE.

From my journal, you may think that I am a French girl, but I am not; I was born in Turin, Italy. When I was eight years old we left Italy and went to England. I lived two years at Leamington, in Warwickshire; from there we went to Stratford-upon-Avon, Shakespeare's native place; after living there six years, we came here to France. I can not now give a full description of any of the places we have lived out if I write again I will do so. My uncle sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every month, and it is one of my greatest pleasures to receive it. I more than liked "Red Rover," and it is all to my sister and brother. I think Mrs. Little writes beautifully. We are six in family—five girls and one boy. My eldest sister is London studying for an examination. I am six, and my name is Anna. With love, I close.

A. L. F.

P. S.—A little piece of mignonette, with my best love from me. I hope it will not lose its fragrance ere it gets to you.

CARLISLE, ENGLAND.

I am a boy eleven years old. I live in Carlisle. It has a college and a grammar school. I like to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for one month. I take it very much. I have a kitten called Snugg; it is black and white. I think I like it very much, and I also like Jimmy Brown's stories. I hope to have my letter printed.

WILLIE D.

LOCKPORT, NEW YORK.

So many of the correspondents have told of their pets that I want to tell of mine, which are very different from most of those which we read in the Post-office Box. The pets I mean are my two little sisters, Ethel, thirteen, and Nelly, seven, years of age. They are pleasant companions, who love me as I love them. Besides my two sisters, I have two friends, who come over quite often to play with them. I often play with them too, and their games are quieter than those of the boys. I have also two friends, the YOUNG PEOPLE, since it was first published, and like the stories and illustrations very much.

WILLIAM B.

ED. DE JANSSEN, BRASSEL.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I wish you a better some time ago, and was pleased to see it printed. I have been living out here a few years with my papa and mamma, and I like it very much, the more so because I can see my dear friends. It did not seem like winter, it was so warm. Here the plants grow all the year round. We live up on a hill, and have a beautiful view of sea and harbor. We can see the ships coming in and going out. I read in some of the letters that the little girls say that they can hardly wait from one week to another for the magazine, while I have to wait four weeks for mine, and then I get two and three together. I go to a school here taught by American ladies. My studies are in English, Portuguese, and French. I have a very devoted reader,

EMILY S. L.

DENVER, COLORADO.

I thought you all might be interested in my pet. It is a white rabbit. I have had my sister write me very young, and it is very tame, for we have petted it a great deal. Bunny always knows when meal-time comes, and makes her own way in the dining-room promptly, quite sure he will be fed. He breakfasts on oatmeal and potatoes, and likes melons, corn, and cake, especially jelly with cream. I don't like to eat my caramels as myself. I wouldn't be surprised if he should learn to chew gum, but I shall not be the one to teach him. Strange to say, we have never before had a rabbit, and now we have given him a good many times. Our next neighbor has a Newfoundland dog, and he and Bunny are great friends. I don't know how long he has been about until he finds Bunny, then kicks him all over till he fur looks as if he had had it frizzed; then he picks him up by the back, as a cat does a kitten, and carries him to his little house. They eat together, and Bunny will follow Don all around.

WHITFIELD E. R.

A CURE FOR DISCONTENT.

One very wet day my sister and I were grumbling because we had nothing to play with and could not go out, and we were so tired of all our toys. Mother, who was sitting working and reading a magazine, and seeing that we were so discontented, said: "Children, if you like, I will tell you a little true story of what once happened to me when I was a little girl. I think you won't be so discontented then."

"Oh, do! do! your tales are always jolly, mother," we cried.

"So she began. "When I was about six years old, I used to stay, as you know, with my uncle and aunt. I had a great many nice toys. Among them a big doll, which my uncle had carried home from a hatter's shop, a wooden horse and cart, a Chinese puzzle, a wicker barrow, and a rake. Well, one day it was very wet, the same as it is now, and I was very cross. 'I wish I had something to play with,' I said.

"Where's your beautiful doll?" said aunt.

"Oh, I hate her; she's so ugly!"

"Why, it's too much trouble to set the animals out."

"Oh, well, come and play me a tune on your harmonium," said aunt.

"I can't play; it makes my hand so tired, and I've lost one stick."

"Bring your toys to me upstairs," said aunt, and she rang the bell and said no more to me.

"Mary came in. 'Mary,' said aunt, 'take the step-ladder to the landing, please. Now, Emily, bring your toys to me upstairs.'"

"I got up, wondering, and hugging my toys with my little fat arms. I followed her up the stairs, and in the landing ceiling there was a big trap-door, because there was a false ceiling, but the trap-door was always closed, and I had never seen it otherwise. Aunt made Mary place the step-ladder right under the great black trap-door, while I stood wondering what dreadful thing was going to happen."

"Now, Emily, bring your toys," said aunt; and as I handed up Bowdica, aunt gave her to Mary, and I saw my poor child's feet as they just disappeared in the big hole. One by one all my beautiful toys had been sent up into the roof, and the door was shut upon them."

"Now, little discontented child, for a whole month you shall have no toys to play with, and you will be obliged to be able to find out that your toys are not quite so dull and stupid."

"Oh, mother?" we cried; "what ever did you do?"

"Well, I hardly remember what I did, except that I cried till I did not think I had a single tear left. When I went to bed I had no Bowdica to sleep with me. Oh, my poor, poor doll! my the black hole? I kept saying to myself, and that made me cry more, I thought she would be so frightened. You know I was only six, and it was very hard for me to understand why they were much stricter than they are now. A month is very long to a little child, and I was of course, unable to keep count of the days, so I could only do myself by thinking how near I was to the end when the third week came.

Well, one evening I was sitting at the table with little and my mother, and she had the empty spoons. Presently aunt, who was busy writing, looked up and said, 'Emily, I don't know whether you know it, to-morrow will be the end of the month, and as you have been a good little girl, you may have all your toys out again.'

'Oh, how pleased I was! I jumped for joy, and was so happy when I was when I thought that next night I should have my dear Beadicea again!

Next morning after breakfast aunt and Mary and the steps went in a joyful procession up the stairs, with me following behind, too impatient almost to wait while the awful trap-door was opened. It was almost like having all the toys new over again. I quite forgot that Beadicea had only one eye, and that one stick was missing from the harmonium, and that the horse, unlike my mother's, had no visible eyes, but was filled with brilliant blue spots and had no visible ears. My aunt's cure for discontent, if sharp, was effective, and I think she never had cause to punish me—at least, I thought I was being disappointed after that, I took great care not to say anything about it.

My sister and I exchanged glances, and it suddenly struck us that after all our toys were very nice, and we wouldn't like them all to be stowed away in a certain cupboard we knew of, and afterwards, when mother looked up at the door from her work, she saw us playing with our dolls as happily as if we'd never hurried in our lives.

MABEL WHEATON (WELLS) (aged 11), EAST DESHER, NORFOLK, ENGLAND.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

I thought that I would write to you, as I have never seen a letter of my mother's. Our city is thirteen hundred eighteen miles from the Atlantic Ocean, on the Savannah River. There is nothing to say, except that we think it has the finest public-school system in the South, and the Southern Telegraphery company in the United States. I wonder what all the boys and girls are doing up North.

Some of them must write and tell you what they are doing.

LEARNING BY EXPERIENCE.

'I'm afraid that poor Dolly will have to learn by Experience,' said Dolly's mamma, shaking her head, and looking very grave indeed.

'What is Experience, mamma?' asked Bessie, who was a little younger than Dolly, and who in one way was a great deal wiser, for she always did precisely what the dear mother told her to do. Dolly was very fond of finding her own way, as you know some silly little children are.

'I can not very easily explain so long a word, pet,' said Mrs. Cox, 'but if Dolly should have one of Experience's lessons to learn, you will see it for yourself. Experience is not a very gentle teacher, dear. She always treats her pupils fairly, but she is sometimes very, very severe. And you don't understand one word of what I am saying either. Come here and let me hug you.'

So mamma gathered the good little Bessie up in her lap and kissed her, and told her she was a sweet little comfort, as she surely was. And mamma looked very wistfully and anxiously at the damp spots where the water had been, as if they had been pasted to the pavement, and where chill gusts of wind came spitefully from around the corners. Dolly's mamma had Dolly's overshoes from the floor beside the lounge, where heedless Dolly had left them, and she sighed softly to herself.

'As she walks she came tripping home. "Are your feet damp, my dear?" said her mother. "You took off your overshoes after coming to school, and then you went to Cousin Minnie's house you forgot to put them on again. I am afraid you will have one of those bad colds again."

'I feel perfectly well now, mamma,' was Dolly's reply, 'and my feet are not in the very least bit damp.'

'Mamma thought it well to look. So she made Dolly take off her shoes, and she felt the soft little stockings of fine merino with her own hands, and told Dolly that they were not quite dry, but she must put on another pair, and then change her shoes for her scarlet slippers.'

'Good, mamma?' said Dolly. 'I like to wear my scarlet slippers. Quilted shoes are so nice and warm.'

Mamma kept watching Dolly. By-and-by she saw that Dolly's cheeks were growing very red, and her eyes were very bright, and she was getting very hot. Then Dolly said that she did not feel well, but she thought she was only tired, and her throat hurt her a little.

'You see, Dolly,' said Mrs. Cox, 'you were a child who took cold very easily, and was subject to sore throats.'

'My darling, you are learning by Experience,' said the mother, sorrowfully, as she bathed the little feet in hot water, made quite sharp and stimulating with mustard, and gave Dolly a hot drink, and wrapped her up in the blankets.

Wide-awake Bessie, looking on, saw what her mother meant. And when Dolly, next day, felt better, but could not go to the museum with papa because, though the day was very fine, her throat was so delicate, and she must stay in-doors, and give Dolly a lesson, she would be careful in future, and let Madam Experience find somebody else to teach and punish.

WEST PITSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little boy eight years old. I have two pet cats—their names are Spot and Streak—and I have a big St. Bernard dog. I go to Sunday-school, and I get a great many papers and criss. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and I like it very much.

ROBERT P. C.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

I go to a private school here, and I am in the second class. We have two birds; we had four, but two of them died. One was found in the sea bay, and the other was found in the water on the 21 of November. I write with my left hand, but I am learning to write with my right. I have read all of Mrs. Lillie's stories, and she must stay in-doors, and give Dolly a lesson, she would be careful in future, and let Madam Experience find somebody else to teach and punish.

STAFFORD SPRINGS, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have three sisters and one brother. My oldest sister is six years old, the next four, the next two, and the boy is nine months old. Our names are Kitty, Gerty, Florence, May, and Alvan. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I like 'Baa! Baa!' very much. We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time.

KITTY R. S.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

My brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I read it and like it very much. We have a big dog that is named Lion. I have a play-house, a parson, a wash-stand, chairs, and a table. I have a set of dishes, and two big dolls. I am nine years old. Our dog is almost as old as I am.

ALICE S.

FERRY, MICHIGAN.

This is the first time that I have written to you. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE; I like it very much. I have a little dog named Fred; my second year's writing. I like to go to school. Will you let me ask a question in the Bible? I am afraid that my letter is too long. With love, I am your little friend.

LINDSEY P. (ten years old).

But you did not ask your question. Did you forget it?

INDROBOL, CANADA.

I thought I would try and write you a letter. This is the first letter I have written to you. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. We have lots of ice skating here in the winter. For my name is a little dog named Fred; my name is Buster, a horse named Frank, and numerous others. I send you some maple leaves, showing what the frost does to them in Canada.

HENDER L. S.

Thanks for the brilliant leaves.

TROY, N. Y.

I am a boy thirteen years old. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I like to go to school. I am studying at the grammar school; I study arithmetic, grammar, geography, spelling, drawing, writing, reading, and history. I have a dog named Duke; he is a Skye terrier; he will perform a great many tricks. I had two small fish and two turtles. The fish died, and the turtles ran away. I was very sorry. I have a little exchange several articles for a pair of small mud-turtles. I wish some of the boys or girls who have turtles would exchange me one.

AUGUST L. C.

Write out an exchange, with your full name and address, and it shall be inserted on the cover, where the boys will see and consider it, and you will receive a great many answers, I am sure, and very likely make a good exchange.

JEFFERSONVILLE, INDIANA.

I am a boy eleven years old. My father is a Methodist minister, and lives at Glenwood, Indiana, but I live at my grandpapa's. I have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and I like it as a Christmas present from my aunt and uncle.

The stories I liked most were 'Roy House' and 'Ten Days a Newshoy.' I like the story of 'Two Arrows' so far as it has gone. As I have no pets, I will have to look for another one. When I was about six years old I went to Niagara Falls with my grandpapa, grandmamma, and some of my aunts. At the Falls it looked like a large sheet of water falling over a high hill. As I went on the bridge which you cross to Goat Island, I stopped about the middle of the river and looked where the water was coming from, and it looked very beautiful and blue. I did not get over to the Canada side. It was all a very beautiful sight, and I will never forget it. I will tell you about our new levee in the next letter.

She was quiet and affectionate when we first got her,

But was apt to trip people up with her tether rope.

She displayed an unfortunate taste for rose-trees.

The children used to drive her in a cart

Until she became troublesome.

And got them into difficulties.

So they would not trust themselves behind her again.

But one day she got into the drying-ground,

And fell out with Mrs. Gubbins,

Who complained that she had been ill-used by her,

So we gave her away to the millman.

ROSELAND CASTLE.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

It is wonderful how much the birds know, not only about their beautiful nest-making, but about people. When the castle of Roseland was seized and sacked by Baron Bugbear, that cruel, wicked man, not a bird would build its nest in the trees near, though for ages past they had made the leaves quiver with their bursts of melody. Roseland was a fine old place, with its turrets and towers and moat and draw-bridge. Through its grassy meadows ran a sparkling river that wound down about the village of Ferndale, which is said to have been a favorite spot of the fairies for many years. The bold, bad Baron had been eager to possess Roseland ever since a certain fair lady had refused to smile on him; but with all his boldness, which was not true courage, he had not dared to attack the castle while there were many men about.

There had been a great war, and Lady Blanche having heard that her husband was wounded, and that the people he had taken with him were suffering, rode away to his relief. Nothing else would have induced her to leave Ronald and Rosa, her two dear children, alone with their aged grandmother and a few women-servants; but when the news came that the lord of Roseland's life was in danger, Lady Blanche could hardly wait for the horses to be saddled or the hampers to be packed.

It was not unusual in those dreary days for an enemy to use a ruse of this sort to get people out of the way when he wished to make an assault, and Baron Bugbear was equal to any treachery.

It was lovely spring weather. The meadows were full of buttercups and daisies, the lark sang in the early mornings, shaking the dew from his wings as he rose from the grass, and Ronald and Rosa watched the cavalcade leave the castle without a thought of fear. The children were used to war's alarms, and thought that just the sight of their dear mother's sweet face would make their father well and strong again.

The steward of the castle was old and feeble, and so Lady Blanche had bidden his son remain with him; but the son, a wild young fellow, had felt much injured at being obliged to remain at home, and was cutting up all sorts of pranks in consequence. The ladies-in-waiting had need of many wraps, and the young man's sister had given him a huge bundle to carry. On his head he had two or three velvet hoods, and on his back, overlapping capes and cloaks, so that his long legs were quite hidden. What did the master of the party do but seize him around the waist with a jerk, and mount him on a palfrey for one of the women-servants? The children shrieked with laughter, but not a word escaped the pretender's lips, and the order to march being that moment given, away he went, riding the side-saddle as demurely as any of the maids.

That very night, while the stars twinkled, and the frogs croaked, and the flowers were folded, there came a terrible thundering at the gates. The old steward had not strength to defend the castle; had his strong young son been with him he might have delayed and summoned assistance. As it was, he yielded his post, lost his life, and the beautiful castle fell into the hands of Baron Bugbear.

Terrible times followed. The place was filled with a wild, disorderly set. Everything of value was carried away. The walls were stripped of tapestries and armor. Big bonfires smoked the halls and burned the floors. Loud and coarse were the revels. The aged grandmother died from fright, and Ronald and Rosa were imprisoned in the top of a tower. Here they were kept by themselves, locked in, and only fed once a day. From their narrow windows they could look down and see Baron Bugbear's children quarrelling and teasing their pets, and doing their best to make the world a wretched place to live in.

After a while the children fell into a state of dull despondency, lightened only by one single ray.

They discovered a secret door in the tower which opened on a narrow winding stair that led down into the gardens. Down these steps they crept in the evening or just at dawn, and so got a breath of fresh air and a glimpse of the river. They were so small that they could easily hide in the bushes when they heard approaching steps.

A whole year had now passed, and it was spring again. Dandelions spotted the grass like golden stars, but all the birds had deserted Roseland—not one would sing on the boughs about the castle—but by the river their merry songs could be heard, and here poor little Ronald and Rosa loved to wander. They were especially afraid of the Baron's son Brian, whose coarse nature had shown itself in many a hateful deed. In the cold winter evenings when the two poor children were hovering over the few fagots which were allowed them, Brian had come to find amusement in their society, and had teased and taunted them with their misery. He it was who had taken Ronald's little reed pipe from him because it made a sweeter sound than any of his instruments, and had made Rosa cry by pulling feathers from her pet dove.

So they arose long before Brian thought of moving from his bed, and cautiously crept out into the fields of a morning on purpose to hear the birds sing.

They had wandered thus one day—Ronald in his velvet coat, which was becoming old and worn, and Rosa in the pretty damask gown which her own fingers had often to mend—when they heard a great commotion in the bushes. A wailing, sobbing cry went up, then an angry chatter as of magpies, and between these sounds another as of eager, hungry birds. Suddenly they stumbled over a nest full of young thrushes, and Ronald was about to pick it up, when he stopped in terror, and Rosa rushed to his arms for protection.

Every tree, every leaf, every insect, suddenly seemed to take shape of elf and fairy. Weird, wild, and horrible were some, others beautiful as the flowers themselves.

Between his pity for the birds, whom some one must have stolen and dropped, his alarm at seeing the enraged fairy folk, and his desire to defend Rosa, Ronald was sorely perplexed. Clasping his sister in his arms, he stood gazing at a dreadful creature who seemed to be the leader of the elfin crew.

"Vile miscreant!" buzzed the angry elf, "is this thy work? Can no one be happy where children exist?"

"Oh, what do you mean?" stammered Ronald.

"Are you the robber of these innocent fledglings? and if you are, do you expect peace and happiness to follow your footsteps while you thus rejoice in the misery you have caused?"

"I am no robber," said Ronald, bravely.

"We are determined to avenge this great wrong," screamed a waspish voice in his ear.

"The birds are our friends," said another.

"I tell you truly I am not the robber of this nest," maintained Ronald.

"We never dreamed of doing it," sobbed Rosa. "We love birds; we never take their eggs; we like their songs, and we try to imitate them—at least Ronald does."

Amid all the hubbub an old and solemn-looking turtle suddenly said: "Hush! If you love justice, elves, listen to this plea. These children once saw me crawling by the river-side on important business. I had far to go, but they did not know that. I heard them whisper hastily that Brian was coming, and they seemed consumed with fear; but before they hid themselves they covered me with leaves, saying, as they did so, 'He would tease it to death.' No wonder. This same Brian was an ugly fellow, and before he left the spot had stoned to death a dozen fine frogs. May not he be the culprit now?"

Silence followed this speech. Then a sweet-voiced fairy said, "Let them prove their innocence if they can."

"But how shall we do it?" asked Ronald.

"By going on some knightly quest," said another.

"You ask too much," said the turtle, who seemed to be of a legal turn of mind. "Remember they are only children. Let them take these young birds home, nourish them till they can fly, and then return them to us."

"Agreed!" cried one and all of the fairies.

"Agreed!" cried Ronald and Rosa; but remembering their desolation, and the possibility of not being able to hide the birds from Brian, they suddenly grew faint and pale, and Ronald said, "After all it is impossible."

"There! I told you they were guilty," screamed a horrible old goggle-eyed fellow. Again there was a confused cry of "Shame! shame!" But again came the turtle to the rescue as he said, "Tell us why you refuse."

So Ronald and Rosa poured out their tale of woe—how Roseland Castle had been captured, how they were prisoners, and what dreadful privation and suffering they had endured, but especially how they feared Brian. As they spoke, the fairies crowded about them, noting Rosa's tears, watching the indignant light that flashed in Ronald's eyes, and rustling their downy wings in evident agitation. One beautiful little being, who looked as if she might have sprung from the heart of a rose, perched herself on a spray near Rosa, and whispered: "Take courage; we will be your protectors; you should have sought our aid before," and leaning forward she touched the turtle, saying: "It is late. The cocks are crowing. Leave the birds to us. The children must be rescued. You will go home with them and await our orders. Depart!"

In an instant, like a flash, the fairies disappeared. The nest of young birds became a shining heap of pebbles, and Ronald and Rosa heard the bugle from the castle which awakened the troopers. They ran as fast as their feet could carry them to the castle gardens, for they feared they were so late their absence might be discovered. But the turtle crawled slowly after them. Once, hastily looking back, they thought they saw him make a motion as if to wait, but this they dared not do, and the next time they glanced in his direction he was gone. Then they thought they saw Brian's ugly eyes peering from the kitchen yard, where he often went to tease the scullions, who had much better manners than their master.

Sure enough, Brian had seen them, and when they tried the garden door it was locked.

"Come back to the woods, Ronald," begged Rosa, trembling like a leaf; "they may kill us, and if Brian looks for the nest of birds he will think we have hidden it."

"But what shall we do for food, Rosa?"

"The fairies will feed us," answered Rosa.

"No; they never appear at mid-day, I have heard; and did you not see how quickly they vanished because the cocks crowed? We shall have to wait too long."

Just then a beautiful pigeon which had been circling above their heads dropped on the greensward beside them, and, spreading its snowy plumage, seemed to invite inspection. Rosa's eyes were too filmy with tears to see what Ronald's bolder gaze discovered: tied to the bird's coral leg was a tiny golden key, which Ronald quickly seized and placed in the lock. The door opened, and they entered. None too soon, for they had hardly reached their prison when the cross old woman who served them brought their breakfast.

Fatigued with their exertion and fright, the children fell asleep after they had eaten, and woke to find the sun high in the heavens. All that had happened seemed a troubled dream. But it was no dream when Brian came in and asked Ronald in an angry voice why he had dared to touch the nest of young birds. There is no knowing what cruel blows might have been given had not the white pigeon again made its appearance. This time it sat on the window-ledge, and Brian, making a great rush to catch it, lost his balance, reached too far, and fell, catching on a projecting carving, which alone saved him from being hurled into the moat below. As it was, he would have fallen before assistance came had not Ronald and Rosa dragged down a bell-rope and lowered it to him. By tightly holding on to this, they managed to keep him until stronger hands could reach him. The pigeon, meanwhile, fluttered in and out, at last perching on the bed canopy, where no one saw it. (The carrier pigeon, whose cries had brought them to the rescue, was the first to be seen.)

"I wonder if it wants me," said Rosa, approaching and offering the crumbs of a hard dry crust. (The bird had been part of her own scanty meal.)

"I do believe this is a carrier," said Ronald, examining the bird more carefully.

"What is that?" asked Rosa.

"A bird that takes letters and messages to people far away."

"Oh!" cried Rosa, "let us send one to our mother."

"But we have nothing to write with," said Ronald.

Poor Rosa's bright look faded.

"I tell you what we can do," said Ronald; "we will cut off locks of hair, yours and mine, and send them."

No sooner said than done. The two pretty tresses—one light, one dark—were tied with a bit of ribbon to the coral leg of the bird, and whispering in its ear, Ronald tossed it high in the air.

The days dragged wearily after that, for there was no more going out to be done. Not even their aid to Brian in his peril brought them any relief. The little golden key had been taken from them, and their walks in the lovely cool dawns and fragrant twilights could no more be enjoyed. They thought they would never see the fairies again, and there was small chance that the pigeon would ever return.

They had reached this hopeless stage, and Rosa was quite ill, when, lying awake one moonlight night, a sound as of wind in the trees attracted their attention. Now it came nearer and nearer, and instead of a vague indistinctness, it became a regular thump, thump, thump. All Roseland was bathed in moonlight and slumber. Ronald gazed from the window and saw a troop of armed men. Were they friends or foes? Steadily came on the host. They have gained the moat. What are they doing? The draw-bridge is down. They cross. Bang! bang! bang!—down crashes the gate. A light flares up from within—hoarse cries are heard. The castle is at their mercy. The frightened sleepers dash here and there. Blows are given—groans are heard. The children cower in a corner; but presently their door is burst open, and they are in their father's arms. What joy was that!

There was a long tale to tell of the father's and mother's imprisonment and wounds and illnesses; of their despair at hearing their children were dead and their home burned to ashes; and then of the carrier-pigeon bringing those well-loved locks of hair and hope to them once more. Sufficient is it to say that Roseland became again the haunt of the birds, whose melody filled the air, and whose nests no one was allowed to touch.

BRIGHTIE'S CHRISTMAS CLUB.

BY ALICE M. KELLOGG.

II.

HE next Friday was stormy. The morning began with a cloudy sky, and at noon the wind was blowing hard and a heavy rain falling. Brightie was at home with a slight cold, and at four o'clock Aunt Jennie, after looking out of the window, remarked,

"I suppose your little Christmas Club will not meet to-day, Brightie."

"Why, I think the girls will be here," replied Brightie, confidently. "They don't mind the rain."

NEWSPAPER POCKET

"Here comes an umbrella and a girl under it!" announced Aunt Jennie, after a pause.

Brightie ran to the window. "That's Lulu Demming!" she exclaimed. "And here come Mabel and her sister. They'll all be here, auntie."

In less than half an hour the half-dozen girls belonging to the Christmas Club were gathered in Brightie's pretty room, warming their hands over the open fire, and talking briskly.

PEN-WIPER

ward, and tied about half-way up. This is a capital thing to hang in the hall or dining-room."

"Miss Jennie, do you know of any new way to make pen-wipers?" asked Lulu. "My father always likes one for Christmas, and I know he must be tired of the old kinds."

"If you have some small pieces of chammois, I can show you how to make a very pretty one, and it is very easy to make," replied Aunt Jennie.

Brightie tumbled over the contents of her work-basket

A HAT FOR HAIR-PINS.

hurriedly. "Here are some pieces mother gave me last week to clean my bracelets. They are fresh and new."

"For one pen-wiper," began Aunt Jennie, "you will need three pieces of the chammois, each six by four inches. Cut them carefully, Lulu, or they will not look well. Lay one piece flat on the table, and the others on it. Then fold them together like a book, and sew through the middle, like the binding of a book. Tie a piece of narrow ribbon over the threads. Now take a pen, and print on the cover, in pretty letters, 'Extracts from the pen of—' What are your father's initials?"

"R. W. D.," answered Lulu.

"Then add those, and your pen-wiper is finished."

The girls laughed at the unique idea, and wished that Santa Claus would furnish each of them a place for "extracts" from their pens.

"If any of you know how to crochet, here is a pretty way to make a hair-pin holder. It looks like a sailor hat when it is completed, and is very pretty and dainty."

"Take a small round box and remove the lid. Cover the bottom with silk or satin. Fill the box with hair. Crochet with worsted a round mat, widening to fit the top. Lay this over the top, and crochet rows down to fit the sides until the bottom is reached. Crochet flat again, and widen every third stitch on the first row; on the second row every seventh stitch; after this there is no need for widening. Seven rows are enough to form the brim of the hat, and this will roll up of its own accord. All this is simple chain stitch. Catch up one side of the brim with a rosette of worsted, and tie a piece of narrow ribbon around the crown of the hat, and leave the ends two inches long."

Bertha Browning was the handiest among the club with a crochet needle, and as Aunt Jennie gave the directions slowly she worked rapidly, taking in every step clearly. When Aunt Jennie paused, the sailor hat was well under way.

ALSO FOR HAIR-PINS.

THE SAME COMPLETED.

UMBRELLA POCKET.

"It's going to be lovely," cried Nell. "I wish I could make one, but I don't know how to crochet."

"If you admire the hair-pin holder so much," said Aunt Jennie, "I can tell you how to make another equally pretty."

Every eye was eagerly turned toward the speaker, who by this time seemed a person of endless resources.

"The effect of the whole when completed," began Aunt Jennie, "is of an orange hung up by a narrow ribbon; and, Brightie, if you will bring that gold colored worsted from the table drawer, I will show you how to make one. First, some pasteboard. Here is a blank-book cover. Very good. Now cut two circles of the stiff board, each three inches in diameter; then in the exact centre of each a round hole, which will measure one inch in diameter. Place the two pieces together exactly, and take one ounce of the worsted, untie the thread that fastens the separate skeins, and cut one end through for greater convenience in handling. Then take three or four threads of worsted together, and wind them over the card-board and through the hole in the centre.

"Wind tightly until the whole is covered. Use great care to make each layer even and straight. Continue this until the hole is so small that you will need a needle to draw the worsted through. Finally crowd a bunch of worsted about three inches long into the remaining space. Insert a sharp scissors through the worsted between the card-board, and cut the worsted all round. Separate the two pieces of board to enable you to pass a strong twine between. Wind round and tie as tight as you can draw it; two or three times tie it, to make it very firm and strong. Then cut the card-board from the outer to the inner circle, and pull it out. The ball is rough and ragged, so trim off with a sharp scissors.

"Now a yard and a half of narrow orange or olive-colored ribbon sewed on one side will, after tying in a small bow, allow you to hang it upon the side of the dressing-mirror." All the while Aunt Jennie had been speaking her hands had been busy; and the ball, looking indeed the counterpart of an orange, which composed and made up the ball. The six young people had gathered by, and had been looking on. "But, auntie," asked Brightie, "how will that hold hair pins?"

"Why, don't you see?" said Sade, "the hair pin from her head and pressing it in the soft wool. So you see it sinks in."

"Capital!" "How nice!" "Sweet as it can be," were only a few of the praises bestowed upon the daisy ball.

Daisy interrupted. "Do, please, tell me how to make a needle-book?"

"A very, very simple one, I suppose," said Aunt Jennie, "for a very little girl. Well, Daisy, a piece of crinoline three inches by six inches covered on both sides with fine brown linen, neatly over handed all round. Brown embroidery silk in loose button-hole-stitch will ornament the edge on the right side, and a fold or two of fine flannel, also button-holed, or cut into fine points, and sewed inside, will hold the needles. Two ribbon strings will fasten the book together."

"I think it should be ornamented, at least on one side," said Mabel, Daisy's sister; "or I could fasten a decalcomanie on for her."

Daisy's needle-book is shown in the ornamental initial to this article.

"One thing more before we separate," said Aunt Jennie. "I saw the other day a very good arrangement for holding umbrella, parasol, and rubbers, and you, Brightie, might make one for your mother.

"Buy a yard of brown linen about twenty-five cents a yard. Cut a strip of the width eleven inches wide; slope this piece carefully from end to end so that at one end it will be eleven inches and at the other end six inches wide. Line this with strong, stiff crinoline. Baste it all round to keep it in place. Cut another piece of linen twenty-eight inches by fifteen inches wide. Fold a hem on the wide end two inches wide, and hem it. Fold this piece exactly in half, lengthwise, creasing well the division line. Also fold the piece already lined with crinoline,

CHRISTMAS SECRETS.

ALICE. "Tell me what you are going to give me, Freddie, and I'll tell you what I'm going to give you."

and crease in the middle. Place these two middle lines together, linen to linen, and baste securely, making the wider linen meet the narrower at the bottom. The hem will be about ten inches from the top.

Fold the linen on each side of the centre in a box pleat at the narrow end, and baste the end and sides together. The upper linen or pocket piece will be a trifle larger than the under part at the top; that is right. Bind all round with worsted braid. Sew also with coarse silk a strong stitching or chain stitch, where you have already basted through the centre, quite through the crinoline to make it firm. Cut a band of linen and crinoline eight inches long by two inches wide, baste together, and bind with the worsted braid. Baste this band three inches below the top, in the centre of the space above the wide hem, and sew it securely about an inch and a half from either end. This band will hold the rubbers, the two pockets, umbrella and parasol.

"If you choose to decorate the pockets, you can do so by embroidering two or three brown birds flying on the linen, with a few slashes of gray silk in slanting lines to represent rain."

Here Aunt Jennie stopped, for the clock struck a silvery peal.

HOW RICK MADE HIMSELF A CHRISTMAS.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

IT didn't look as if there would be any Christmas at the Hayrick. Lucinda Ellen confided to Rick a dreadful suspicion that Ambrose meant to "turn" every one of the turkeys, so they shouldn't even have a Christmas dinner. The crops had proved a failure, and there was that mortgage, with its interest rolling up like a snow-ball! They had struggled with the mortgage all through their father's long illness, and now, three years after his death, it was still unpaid. There had been long droughts and untimely frosts and cattle distemper; it seemed as if everything was against them, and it was no wonder that Ambrose, the man of the family, although he was not yet twenty, was almost discouraged.

Rick was fifteen, but he was lame; he had hip-disease, and one leg was shorter than the other; it wasn't much: he only wasn't "a square trotter," they said at home; but what was the use to try to make light of it? Rick was always thinking bitterly; he was of scarcely any use upon the farm, he grew tired so soon: Lucinda Ellen, a girl, could beat him at hoeing potatoes. He was only a burden, limping about; but he had one comfort—there was no limp in his brains. He had "floored" the school-master with a mathematical problem, and the minister had asked his opinion of some Latin verses. And one needn't be "a square trotter" to be a great lawyer, a civil engineer, a statesman. If he could only go away to school, learn enough to teach, and make his way through college.

What was Christmas to him, since it would not bring him his heart's desire? Ambrose might "turn" all the turkeys (which meant in Danville change them for groceries and other necessaries)—all except the Duchess Griselda; he wouldn't think of touching her, any way, for she was Rick's especial property and his great pet. A turkey is a rather queer pet, but Rick had brought this one up from a seraway, featherless morsel, all neck and voice, the sole survivor of a large brood that had fallen victims to a turkey epidemic, and it had rewarded him by growing into the finest and handsomest specimen of turkeyhood that Danville had ever seen. Such eggs as the Duchess Griselda laid, and such broods as she hatched! Her fame reached all over town, and Rick had been able to buy all his Sunday shoes and jackets from the proceeds of her industry; but this year, alas! all Griselda's brood had been destroyed by Farmer Hodsdon's old sheep-dog, and when she had been almost ready to bring off another flock, a weasel had eaten her eggs. But the Duchess Griselda shouldn't make anybody's Christmas dinner—not though they themselves should go hungry.

The Sunday before Christmas the minister said something in his sermon that Rick remembered. The minister preached about Christmas, and he said, "Not one of us is too poor or too sad to make a Christmas for himself by giving to somebody poorer or sadder."

Make a Christmas for himself by giving! A great deal the minister knew about it! thought Rick. What could he give, who hadn't a cent in the world? Even his egg money had gone to pay the doctor who cured Lucinda Ellen's sore throat. Liph Wheeler owed him eight cents on their last "swap" of knives, but he couldn't collect it.

He wanted to buy a warm little worsted shawl for his mother, a new sled for Lucinda Ellen, a chest of tools for Ambrose. He might "make himself" something of a Christmas if he could do that, even without his heart's desire; but without one cent to spend for anybody, with Ambrose's shoulders all "humped up"—Ambrose always did hump himself up, unconsciously, when he was very anxious—and his mother struggling to keep the tears out of her eyes, it was easy for the minister to talk about making Christmas, but Rick would like to see him try it.

But Ambrose did keep a turkey for the Christmas dinner—the old purple gobbler whose bad disposition had always kept him lean—and a pair of chickens besides, and Mrs. Hayford said she would make a plum-pudding; but she looked all the time as if she were flavoring it with mortgages and hard times, and Rick didn't see how it could have a Christmas taste.

The day before Christmas Rick went to the village with Ambrose to dispose of the last lot of Christmas poultry. While Ambrose drove his bargains, Rick wandered about among the shops: the dusk had fallen, and they were all lighted, and gay with Christmas greenery and gifts. Rick was looking at a red and gilt sled that would be just the thing for Lucinda Ellen, when a boy, looking in at the next window, attracted his attention: a pale and pinched little fellow, very thinly and poorly clad; he didn't look as if Christmas had ever come to him. Rick had seen him before, and knew that he belonged to a family that had come to the town in the autumn, hoping to find work in the mills; but the mills were running on half time, and the family hadn't been able to find any work. Rick thought they must be foreigners, for the children had queer names; this boy was Fritz.

He was looking, not at the pretty Christmas knickknacks, but with longing eyes at the food in a provision shop.

"He looks as if he were hungry," said Rick to himself. With all his troubles, Rick had never known what it was to be hungry. "Poorer than I!" And there suddenly flashed into his mind the minister's recipe for making a Christmas.

"Are you going to have any Christmas?" he asked, stepping up to the boy.

The little fellow's lip quivered, and he drew his sleeve quickly across his eyes.

"We wouldn't mind if we had enough to eat," he said. "The little ones think Santa Claus will bring us a dinner because our little Nicholas was named for him, and we always called him Krischen; but I'm afraid he won't."

Rick turned away with a lump in his throat. Ambrose was calling him. He had not sold his poultry to very good advantage, and was all "humped up." He said he supposed by next Christmas they shouldn't have any poultry to sell, nor any farm to raise any on.

Rick didn't say a word all the way home, but he wasn't thinking, as usual, of his own troubles, but of those hungry children in the old house by the river. He had nothing to give them—nothing except the Duchess Griselda. He couldn't have her eaten; but he could change her for another turkey that would give the poor people a Christmas dinner. Judge Templeton, who had a country residence about half a mile from their farm, admired Griselda, and very often sent his man to buy her eggs.

As soon after supper as he could slip away unobserved, Riek went out to the poultry-house, took the Duchess from the roost where she had settled herself for a peaceful night's rest, and tucking her head under his jacket to muffle her voice, which was not one of the Duchess's charms, he hurried away with her to Judge Templeton's.

She was very heavy, but he was scarcely conscious of that, his heart was so much heavier. Only a turkey, but he had not been able to play with other children, and had never cared for any other pet.

He knocked modestly at Judge Templeton's back door, with the Duchess's mournful, muffled squawkings sounding from under his jacket.

"Give him another turkey for that one, and promise not to eat her—why, of course we will," Riek heard Judge Templeton say, in answer to the message he sent. And then the Judge himself came hastily out. It was he who held the mortgage on their farm, and he never troubled them about the interest, although it was growing so big as to deform poor Ambrose's shoulders.

"Bring a large fat turkey, Jenks," he said to his servant, "and a goose besides. She's worth more than a common turkey; and what do you say to a basket of my golden sweeties? You haven't any such apples as those on your farm." And when the basket was packed, the Judge ordered some great oranges to be put upon the top.

It was a heavy basket, but Riek went off with it as if it were a feather. He almost forgot the Duchess.

"I am interested in that boy," said the Judge to his wife. "I don't think they can be so poor as to lack a Christmas dinner, and I want to know what he is going to do with that basket." And in spite of his wife's remonstrances the Judge hurriedly donned his wraps and followed Riek.

"I like his looks. I've had my eye on him for a good while. People tell wonderful stories of his scholarship. If I find the right kind of stuff in him, I may do something for him," the Judge had said to his wife.

On went Riek, running as if his legs were all that could be desired, as if Christmas had really come. His heart was getting as full of Christmas cheer as his basket was of good things. And on went the Judge, who was portly, puffing and panting in his efforts to keep Riek in sight.

The choir boys at the little chapel were carolling,

"The first Noel that the angels did say
Was to certain poor shepherds—"

"The first Christmas was for poor folks; it always is something to them," thought Riek.

As for the Judge, I am afraid he was thinking just then, the chapel being at the top of a hill, that he had better have taken out his fat wallet and given Riek something, rather than take this "wild-goose chase" to discover "the kind of stuff that was in him." But he had perseverance—men who get to be judges are apt to have—and on he went.

Riek had begun to feel shamefaced about presenting his gifts. "I'll just leave the basket at the door, and knock and run away," he said to himself. "But no—Oh, wouldn't that be jolly!" as a new idea struck him. "It's an old farm-house; there's a great wide chimney and an open fire-place, and it isn't likely they have much fire. And it would be easy to climb up by the wood-shed."

Riek fairly kicked up his heels with delight at his bright idea, and with the Christmas jollity that had taken possession of him. And the jolly old Christmas moon, with a knowing look on her face, shone her very brightest, and showed the Judge the boy he was following climbing with his basket on the roof of the little old house.

In the living-room of the old house a sad group was gathered—seven children from tall boys down to Krischen, and their pale, care-worn mother. There was no sign of Christmas cheer; there had been but a few days enough for all that day. And yet the feather-sticks, gathered around the great fire-place, and the wooden sticks burned, were clamoring to be allowed to hang up Krischen's stocking!

"Why not let them, mamma? It will cheer them now, though they will be disappointed in the morning," said Lena. "Oh, mamma, if your family knew how we were suffering, they surely would help us now!" Lena had come her mother's confidante, and knew that her family had cast her off when she married a poor German musician.

"Horace, my brother, would; he was not so hard as the others. I would ask him now, for your sakes, but I do not know where he lives."

Lotchen, who was seven, thrust her curly head into the fire-place and called up the chimney: "Kris Kringle, if you don't come down this chimney and put something into Krischen's stocking, he sha'n't be called after you any more! Something good to eat, if you please!"

Rush! thump!—almost before the words were out of her mouth down the chimney came a great fat turkey; a plump goose followed; then came a shower of great yellow apples and golden oranges. The children laughed and clapped their hands.

Mamma opened the door; she had heard sounds on the roof, and she seemed to want to see Santa Claus.

The Judge stood there, portly and dignified. Lotchen caught sight of his white beard, and immediately seized him by the skirts of his coat.

"Come right along in, you good old Kris Kringle. But you oughted to have come down the chimney," she said.

Mamma was white in the face, and clung to the door for support: was she afraid of Santa Claus?

"Katharine, my dear, dear, lost sister!" said the Judge, in a husky voice.

And the next moment mamma was sobbing out, "Horace, my brother!" with her head on his shoulder.

It is undeniable that Lotchen and Krischen were a little disappointed to find that he was their uncle, and not Santa Claus, but the others were old enough to understand the joy in their mother's face, and to realize that their dark days were over. Santa Claus upon the roof had hidden behind the chimney when he saw the Judge, and now he came down looking very shamefaced.

"How did you happen to bring that basket here?" asked the Judge.

"I saw him" (nodding at Fritz) "looking in at a window, and I knew he was hungry," said Riek.

"To think if it hadn't been for him I might have gone back to the city without finding you!" said the Judge.

Riek told them all about it at home, and his mother hugged him, and Lucinda Ellen wiped her eyes. Ambrose said he thought they were about poor enough without hunting up poorer folks. But Ambrose wasn't as hard-hearted as he pretended to be.

Riek went to sleep that night with a pretty good opinion of the minister's recipe for making a Christmas; but he hoped they should not lose the farm before another Christmas, as Ambrose prophesied, and he did hope that the Duchess Griselda wasn't homesick.

Just as they were sitting down to breakfast the next morning there came a great box from Judge Templeton for Riek. They heard the Duchess's ear-splitting squawk; Riek actually thought it melodious. But there was something else in the box—a large envelope with Riek's name on it. Inside was the mortgage, torn in halves, and a receipted note for all the money owed by them to the Judge. More! the Judge's check for an amount that made all their eyes round with wonder—"to be expended upon Riek's education."

"A GREAT FAT TURKEY AND A PLUMP GOOSE"

Ambrose sat down with the torn mortgage and the receipted note in his hands, and straightened his shoulders, and swallowed what seemed to be a very hard lump in his throat. "It does seem to be considerable of a Christmas that you've got up, Rick," he said.

Rick was invited to a Christmas party at the Judge's that night. He felt shy at first in the gay assembly, but he was made such a hero of that the feeling soon wore off; and Fritz seemed like an old friend.

Rick danced; they took such pains to help him that it seemed quite easy, and he felt as if his legs were just like any boy's. He kissed Lottchen under the mistletoe, and he had presents on the Christmas tree that made him wonder how they knew just what he wanted, especially a sled that would just suit Lucinda Ellen. But perhaps, after all, the very best moment was when the widow put her hands upon his head and solemnly blessed him.

"What if I hadn't done it?" he said to himself, with a gasp. "If I should always be poor, I'll remember that I can make some kind of a Christmas."

Just then the choir boys began their carol outside the window:

"The first Noël that the angels did say
Was to certain poor shepherds in fields as they lay,
Watching their flocks on a cold winter's night,
When the moon was so bright."

TWO ARROWS:

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE GOLD MINE.

A PROUD girl was Na-tee-kah that bright September day, and she took an extraordinary amount of pains with her hair. So, for that matter, did Hu-ha-pah-no, and Sile could but discern that both treated him with much more respect than at first. He had been with Two Arrows at the recovery of the ponies, he had killed a buck and a bear, and was evidently able to use the weapons of grown-up white braves. He was therefore not a boy to be snubbed; and if it had not been for his unfortunate light complexion, he was almost good-looking. At all events, he was disposed to do his best to be polite, and they were willing to meet him as nearly half-way as was consistent with dignity and propriety. They were under the especial care of the Judge himself, however, and Nateskah derived a vast amount of comfort from an occasional look at his very fatherly and benevolent face.

"THE CRAGGY MOUNTAIN AROSE AGAINST THE SKY."

"We'll git to the mine afore night, Jedge," said Yellow Pine, when they halted for their noon luncheon.

The camp of the Apache marauders broke up at sunrise, with a considerable amount of discontented grumbling.

A man familiar with their habits, as well as their numbers, it could easily have gathered that their coming might have been news which did not come and for several days would not return. Not all of them, to say the least, were likely to come into that or any other group among the mountains. In the absence of any other possibility, it was not surprising to push forward even farther than usual, as a goodly number of the men in blue.

There was a good deal more than a mere supposition about that pursuit, for Captain Grover and his men were on the trail at as early an hour as was consistent with a proper care of their horses, and a hearty breakfast all around. They were a fine-looking lot of men, bronzed and weather-beaten and soldierly. Their uniforms were not exactly in "parade" condition, but there was nothing slovenly about them, and their weapons were in excellent order. They had several "led horses," to make good the places of any that might become overworn, and every animal in the troop showed signs of careful grooming. A captain, a lieutenant, and thirty men did not seem an overpowering force for a hundred and more of Apache warriors to run from, but neither of the two parties could have a correct knowledge of the strength of the other. Besides, the main object of an Indian raid is never a hard fight, but rather to pick up scalps and plunder and get away without serious loss.

As for Captain Grover, he had been ordered to follow and "strike" that band of Apaches, and compel them to return to their "reservation," and he had no other purpose in mind than to obey thoroughly.

"I'll follow them," he remarked to the Lieutenant, "as far as they choose to go. We've wiped out six of their scouts already."

"Garry," said one of the men at the same moment, "reckon them 'Paches 'll begin to think this 'ere's an unhealthy crowd to creep in on."

"The more of 'em we can pick off," said Garry, "the fewer we'll have to fight at the close."

"Sharp work when that comes, or I'm mistaken; but they can't take hoss plunder into the mountains."

As they rode along so cheerily and confidently, it became plainer and plainer that those men had small doubt of their ability to deal with any ordinary band of red horse-thieves if they could meet them fairly. It would hardly have seemed so to an unprejudiced observer of the Apache cavalcade that morning. Every warrior was a perfect horseman, and was well mounted and well armed. There were lances instead of sabres, but the pistols and carbines, or rifles, were just as good as those carried by the cavalry. The red men were all trained and experienced soldiers, under capable leaders, and it looked as if all they had to do was to choose a good position and wait for Captain Grover and his men, and destroy them all. As it was, all they seemed to think of was to urge their drove of stolen quadrupeds forward. They could not make the best of time so encumbered, and when they again halted for the night, the men in blue were several miles nearer, without one Apache knowing exactly where they were.

"Beginning to break down, are they?" said the Captain. "I'll strike them among the foot-hills of the ranges within three days."

All that exciting chase was as yet hidden from the red and white men in the upper valley, and it was quite possible that they would never know anything about it. That depended, in fact, upon whether the Apaches should turn to the left or the right when they reached the "forks" of the little river.

It was pretty late when Two Arrows again caught up with his pale-face friends, and his pony showed signs of very hard riding. If he had been a grown-up brave he could not possibly have had so warm a reception, except from Na-tee-kah and Ha-ha-pah-no. These two considered him the tallest kind of a young chief already, but all the rest regarded him very much as Yellow Pine did, as "the likeliest young red-skin he'd ever come across."

"I believe he is," said Judge Parks. And Sile had added: "Father, what wouldn't he know pretty soon if he could learn to read and write? He understands everything he sees right away."

"I'd like to try the experiment, Sile, but I don't believe he would ever take kindly to books. I'll talk about it some other time. There is something else on my mind just now."

There was a good deal upon everybody's mind, and even Sile ceased to admire Long Bear's present when Yellow Pine rose in his stirrups and pointed forward, shouting,

"There she is, Judge—right back in that there notch!"

Away to the right of them the craggy mountain arose against the sky, facing the valley with an uncommonly precipitous wall. In this grim face of granite could be seen what looked like a mere indentation. When they came to it, however, they discovered that Yellow Pine's "notch" was much narrower at its mouth than beyond it, owing to some ancient overturn and "landslide" of great rocks and small, which almost shut it in. Beyond this barrier, the opening through which was a mere roadway, there were several acres of good grass and trees. There were springs of water, also, and the whole place was a good one to camp in, so long as no more bowlders should break loose from the slopes above and come crashing down into it. It was plain that none had done so for a long time past, and the wagons were hauled fearlessly in. There was nobody with them but their drivers, for every other human being had galloped on after Yellow Pine and Judge Parks, until the old miner drew rein in front of a great mass of shattered, ragged, dirty-looking quartz rock. In the front of this a deep hole had been dug by somebody, and near it were traces of old camp fires, bones of deer and buffalo, and a worn-out pickaxe.

"That's the lode, Judge. It's all I ever told ye it was. Safest place in the world, too, now the 'Paches are gathered into their reservation."

Judge Parks was at that moment examining some bits of quartz he had picked up. He took from his pocket a magnifying-glass, and closely inspected stone after stone.

"It looks like it, Pine. I haven't a doubt of the value of that vein. Look at that, Sile."

"Why, it's exactly like Yellow Pine's old specimens, so far as I can see; no more gold in these than in them."

"That's just the point, Sile. He brought me fair specimens. There isn't any humbug or delusion about it. It's all right, Pine, so far as I can see. As for safety, the mouth of this notch could be made a perfect fort of, if we had to quit mining and go to fighting."

"Guess we won't ever have to do that. Game's plenty, and so is fish, and we won't have to use up our provisions. Chance for you, Sile. You can keep the camp fires going. Fetch in some fish first thing in the morning, and then go for all the fresh meat there is. What we don't eat we can cure and put away."

"I'll do the hunting," shouted Sile. "What are the men all chopping for? There's plenty of dry dead wood."

"I'd call it!" exclaimed Yellow Pine. "If they ain't struck with the mine-fever now. Jest look at 'em, Judge."

"Pine," shouted one of the men, "this shelf by the spring's the spot you marked for the shelter, isn't it?"

"All right, boys," he responded. "Thirty feet by twelve, and an ell for cooking and an ell for stowage."

"Nine feet high to the front, and slope to seven and a half, and lay on the mud as you go?"

"That's it. Pitch in, boys."

"I declare," said the Judge, "they haven't eaten a mouthful, and they've begun building."

"They're old hands, and the sight of that show of pay-rock has kind o' stirred 'em up."

CHAPTER XXII.

A NEW SETTLEMENT.

THERE is nothing like enthusiasm. That band of bearded miners went into their work like a crowd of boys building a snow fort. Ha-ha-pah-no and Na-tee-kah took full possession of the camp fires and cooked for dear life.

Judge Parks and Yellow Pine finished their inspection of the hole in the rock and of the ore which had been dug out of it, and then they went to help Sile and Two Arrows care for the horses and mules.

"We won't unpack much until the house is up," said the Judge.

"You're satisfied with the outcrop, are ye?" asked Pine, a little proudly.

"It's all you said it was, and that is all I could ask for. We can run a tunnel right in now, so we can work straight along, under cover, in bad weather."

"That's the thing to do. I believe it will pay for itself from the very start."

"If it does," said the Judge, "it will be an uncommonly good mine for a gold mine. Not one in ten but what empties the pocket of its first owner."

"This one won't, then. It's as good a property as there is, and we can cover all the ledge with claims and get a good title to 'em. It's fresh ground, and no kind of interference—"

"Unless the Apaches interfere."

"They don't often come east so far as this, specially now that most of 'em have been cornered. Mining in these parts isn't the risky kind of business it used to be. Must say, though, that I felt kind o' streaked sometimes, last year, when I was prospectin'."

"There was risk in it, all alone; but nine rilles and a good breastwork will make a tremendous difference."

"They will that, and there's no seeh thing as takin' us in the rear. They can't climb over that ridge, nor that one."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE CLEW FOUND IN THE ROCKS.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

MORE than sixty years ago there lived in a fishing town on the northeastern coast of Scotland a boy who afterward became a very famous man. When he was only five years old, his father, who was a sailor, was lost at sea. His mother, though very poor, managed to send little Hugh to school, and there he learned a good deal from books; but if he had learned no more than to read and to write, he would probably have still been a great man, for in the mean time he had found something else worth more to him than many books. He had learned to read another language. He had found out that he had two eyes, and how to use them. The rocks about the Firth of Cromarty were waiting for just such a pair of eyes to read their open secrets. Thousands of boys had played about those rocks, and thousands of men had fished and spread their nets and loitered there, but no one of them all had read the riddle of the stones till Hugh Miller came.

The boy used to go down to the beach with his uncle Sandy when the tide was low, and look at the ripples left in the sand by the water. He would gather shells, half buried in the sand, and sea-weed lying upon it. His uncle had eyes that saw, too—it seemed to run in the family—and he helped little Hugh to see the wonderful life of the sea-shore, and to think about what he saw. These lessons, far more than anything he had read in books, helped him in after-life, though he was a great reader of books too.

When Hugh grew to be a tall, lanky boy he chose his work in life; he chose to be a mason. His work lay in a quarry near Cromarty, close by his beloved sea. One day, as the men were lifting up the great slabs of sandstone, Hugh saw some markings on the piece of rock hid den. These were the first markings he saw on solid stone, just such markings as he had seen on the sandy beach. He did not say. He forgot all about it. He began to think of other questions. Could it be that this was the first discovery? How could it be, under those low, grey, overcast rocks? The answer came to his wandering, restless mind.

Striven along the water's edge, washed truly by the waves, were curious roundish pieces of limestone rocks. One day, hammer in hand, Hugh strolled along the beach. He struck one of these lumps, and it broke open, showing imbedded in part of the stone a creamy white shell, beautifully curved, and showing tints of color like the pearly lining of many of our shells. Another and another of these stones were broken open (Fig. 1). In some of them he found scales of fish; in others, fern leaves (Fig. 2); in others, again, bits of decayed wood—all in solid stone.

Now he could answer his questions. These things had once been alive. He had spelled out one word from the tables of stone written upon by the finger of God himself. He had found the clew in the rocks, and he never rested until he had followed up this clew, and found, by examining the rocks themselves, and by reading about what other men had discovered, how the earth as it is had come into being.

If you have never carefully looked at the rocks of a railway cutting as your car went through it, be sure that you do so the very first chance that you have. You will probably see that the rocks are in layers. Sometimes these lie level with the ground; sometimes they are very much bent or tilted (Fig. 3).

To understand how those came to be so, we must understand some things which are very simple, but yet they are things that we would not naturally think of. What we call earth or soil is only rock finely powdered, mixed up with some of the dust from the dried parts of dead plants and animals. Earth is to rock about what the pulverized sugar you sprinkle over your berries is to the block sugar your mother drops into your tea.

The surface of the earth was once rock which had no layers in it, like granite. Part of the round globe was covered with water, and a little of it was dry rock. The beating of this old ocean's waves, year in and year out, helped to grind the rock to powder, and wash it out with the sea water. Take a tumbler of water, and rub it with a paper spoon full of finely ground earth. Your muddy water is some thing like the sea-water was then. Now watch, and you will see what happened. The fine powdered rock settled in the bottom of the sea-bed as the earth settles in your tumbler, and the first layer was made. Layer after layer was formed in this way. After a while "the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." A feeble life stirred in the bottom of the sea. Some very simple animals lived there, and we can find the curious shells in which they lived in those deep-down rocks. We know that plants must have come first, because plants are the only fairies that can turn rock and earth and water into the food that all animals need to feed upon; but the soft, delicate sea-weed had died and left no sign. The early animals, however, had hard glassy shells, and when they died these shells sank to the bottom of the sea, and the next layer of powdered rock settled over them and preserved them—some of them until now.

You can see how this would be, and that when we lay open the rocks, as Hugh Miller did with his hammer, we might find the shells. Here is a drawing of a bit of such earth that was turned into stone, with its corals and shell lying thick in the layer which is half broken away (Fig. 4). This was picked up just below my house on the shores of Newark Bay. The work went on through thousands of years, the sea laying one upon another these wonderful beds of rock of different kinds.

All this was not an adding to what already existed, but only a new arrangement, with some change in the character of the old materials already there. How this great earth came to be, is one of the secret things of God. The Bible begins with, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." That is all we know. A guess here and there has been made as to how it was done, but no one knows, and no one probably ever will know.

But we can tell the way the crust of layers was put on, because we can watch the same things going on now which went on thousands and thousands of years ago. At the bottoms of shallow seas and lakes, at the mouths of rivers, in the coral islands of the Pacific, the earth is still a-building.

About a hundred years ago men began to be interested in these strange things found in the stones. They hunted up pieces of such stone, and wrote out all they could find about it. They arranged the facts, and called the new science geology, or the science of the earth.

It is very easy to see that if the seas had staid all the while in the same place, with no disturbance going on, that the layers would have settled one on top of the other, according to age, the oldest being the lowest, and so on up.

FIG. 4.—SHELLS IN BROKEN ROCK.

But you must remember that the earth was then, as it is now, part dry land and part water, though there was much less land in proportion than there is now. It was only under water that the layers were formed. But there were other things at work besides this gentle wearing away of the rocks and building up of the sea bottoms.

Long ago people believed that under the volcano of Etna, on the island of Sicily, a giant was imprisoned, and that the trembling and cracking of the earth before an eruption were his struggles to get free. This had a meaning in fact, though it was only a fable. Under the whole earth the giant fire has been imprisoned. When the crust of the earth was thinner than it is now, the giant's struggles cracked and bent it; sometimes the bottom of the sea would be suddenly lifted up, and the dry land would sink and be covered with the waters of the ocean (Fig. 5). On the left side of the picture are the level layers of rock, broken up so that they look like a stone wall. After a while we will see just why these are so broken. On the right-hand side you see the layers are lifted up by the curious, curly-looking rock which boiled up out of the earth beneath as lava comes out of a volcano. Whichever part of the earth happened to be under the water would be covered up with layers of mud, and in them plants and shells, fish and animals, would be buried, and their hard parts preserved. The other part, the dry land, would not be very much changed; the plants and animals there would die, and mostly be blown away as dust.

This history of the earth written upon the rocks, you can see, is not a very easy history to read. Its leaves were all scattered and torn and twisted, and the writing on them often rubbed out, and many of them lost. It had to be gone over again and again, in many different places and by many different men, before these stone leaves could be put together in the right order.

If these layers, or strata, as they are called, had remained just as they were placed, there would have been no way to reach them but to dig down to them, for twenty miles in some places, and that would have been impossible: nobody has ever been down, in the deepest mine, more than a mile. But the movements of the earth's surface, caused by the struggling fire underneath, would tilt and break through the layers, and so the broken edges would be on the surface (Fig. 5), and the geologist could in places study the very bottom layers without digging down to them.

THE DEAD BIRD.

Birdie is dead, little maiden,
Gone to the Dead-bird-land.
He never will perch at your casement,
His bright little eyes are closed,
Still is each weary wing;
There is only a far, faint echo
Of the song he used to sing.

But at night when you sleep, little maiden,
There will come to your dreaming ear
Such a chorus of magic music,
Such a wonder of birding clear,
It will sing at your moonlit casement,
It will float round your little bed—
'Tis the song of your dear lost darling,
The heart of your birdie dead.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

A UNIQUE and very beautiful book has just been published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, with the attractive title, Dancing, and Its Relations to Education and Social Life. Its author is Mr. Allen Dodworth, the veteran dancing-master of New York, and though its subject concerns the lighter pleasures and gayeties of life, it is written seriously and with a valuable purpose. To dance well, in Mr. Dodworth's view, enables one to walk well, to have a graceful carriage, to move with ease in a throne, to bow courteously, and to possess the charm of manner which distinguishes the gentleman and gentlewoman from the boor. Those who have received the discipline in the dancing school lines to impart should be distinguished for politeness, affability, and social tact.

Probably most of the young people who read this paper enjoy this innocent and healthful pleasure, as they ought, and are anticipating many delightful social evenings, now that the season for indoor recreation is so near at hand. Those who are about to form societies or neighborhood clubs, in places remote from the larger towns, this volume will prove invaluable, for it gives full and clear directions how to dance quadrilles, waltzes, polkas, galops, etc., and enters so minutely into every detail from the first positions and movements to the most difficult and complicated measures, that an intelligent person following it implicitly may almost acquire the art without a teacher. It includes within its pages a complete guide to the German, giving two hundred and fifty figures. Parents who are in doubt as to whether their children are being properly taught would do well to read carefully this book. Its pages are sprinkled with useful suggestions and bits of cheerful philosophy, and in the chapter addressed specially to professors of dancing may be found hints which none, whether parents or teachers, can afford to ig-more. A book printed and bound so beautifully is a pleasure to handle, and will make a very timely holiday gift.

LAKELAND, PAINEER.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—Your other correspondence tell you about their pets, but I have none to tell you about. If you could tell me of some nice ones suitable for a town house, I would be very glad indeed, for I like them exceedingly. I had a little black kitten, but I lost it a few days after I got it, and I was very sorry. I would like if you would tell me of some nice books to read, for I read a great many. I am at present engaged with Quincy, by Miss Wetherell, and like it very much. I can say nearly the whole of "The House that Jack Built" by Mrs. Hemmell, and can converse a little in that language. I also study Latin, Roman history, and a great many other English lessons.

HELIXA A. HELIXA A. HELIXA A.
The Bible, by Miss Wetherell, by Miss Wetherell, Little House, by Miss Abbott, Ann, by Mrs. Little, Tales from Shakespeare, by Charles and Mary Lamb, will all please you. The last book ought to be in every child's library, and so too should be Dickens's Child's History of England.

How would you like gold-fish for pets? And everybody likes a canary. Don't you think so?

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I have one brother, named Ollie, younger than myself, and when we have finished studying our lessons in the evening we spend the time we spend in playing games. We have a spelling game with over three hundred letters, and we have a great deal of fun in forming these letters into words, and these words into sentences, and so on. I go to school every day, and am in the Second Grammar Grade, and in addition to my studies I take music lessons. I have plenty to do, but always spare time to read my paper. I have been taking it since last August, and find great pleasure in it. We are beginning to talk of going to the mountains and skating this winter. The boys and girls have good times on the ice. I am fourteen years of age.

LUCY O.

LILY AND THE FAIRIES.

Once upon a time there was a very nice little girl, and her mamma was very fond of her. Her name was Lily.

One day she asked her mamma if she might get a walk for a while. "Certainly," said her mamma. "Thank you, mamma darling," and off Lily ran to the nursery to put on her hat and coat. She used to have a nurse, but her father having died, and her mamma and her being so poor, her father bank, she had to leave them, and Lily had to attend to herself. So as soon as she had got on her things, off she ran.

"Where shall I go?" she said. "Oh, I know! Down by that lovely little lake where there is a boat that any one may go in."
She ran so swiftly, for it was a beautiful day. It was a long way, but she liked it all the better. She soon got there, and thought it looked prettier than ever, for the sun was shining upon the water, and the branches of the pink lilies, and the birches, with their long green leaves, long stalks, and dark brown tops, seemed to enjoy the day as much as Lily herself. On one side, facing the prettiest part of the lake, was a rustic seat, upon which Lily seated herself, and feeling tired from her long walk, soon fell fast asleep.

She sat on the seat for some time, and pretty soon she looked up, with her fluffy dresses and transparent wings!

"Come, come with us to our Queen!" said one of the fairies; "for she wants to adopt a little girl, and you look like just such a one as she would like."

Lily ran willingly, and they took her to the boat, and rowed across to the other side of the lake. When they landed, two of the fairies led her to the Queen's palace. "Oh, how beautiful it is!" thought Lily. And so it was, for it was cut out of a single pearl, and all the doors were made of pure gold.

The Queen kissed Lily, and asked her if she would like some bread and butter, for it was very glad to accept it, for by this time she was feeling very hungry.

The Queen then told the fairies to take her to bed, and the way to a lovely little room hung with white lace, and upon daisy chains. The coverlet of the bed was made of butterfly fly, and they threw her out upon the bed and fell fast asleep.

"Lily dear," Lily, do wake up, there's a good girl."

"Oh, mamma! It is only a dream, then? I thought I was in fairy land!"

"What was your dream, dear?"

"Well, dear, e-me home to tea."

When Lily had finished, she told her mamma all about it, and she said, "What a delightful dream!" and as it was Lily's bed-time, wished her good-night, and said, "I hope you will have just as nice a one."

EVELYN RANDOLPH L. (aged 10 years).
A beautiful story for so young a writer.

SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA.

I have read several letters in the Post-office Box, so I thought I would write to you, and I write very few letters; they were sent to my sister Eleanor, in London. My sisters are all older than I. My pets are a pair of white cats, and three pretty pigeons. We have also a pretty little Jersey cow and calf. The cow's name is Pansy, and the calf's Blossom. My sister Susan has some pretty little school birds, and I have some downy chicks. We have two large ducks, and when the calf lies down they pick the flies out of her, it seems to tickle it very much. My sister Mamie thought it was so funny, she sketched them. If you would like to see how they looked, I'll try to have her draw a picture for you.

JAMES E. C.

PRINCE CUP, MISSOURI.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I am a little girl eight years old, I have in history a paper of my fifteen years old. I go to school, and am in the Third Reader. My favorite stories are "Two Arrows" and "Roll House." I have some barnyard chickens, some canary birds, but as sweet as they can be, two cunning cats, Betty Buttercup and Kitty Oomahie, and a dog named Dick. I have five dolls. Can you please send me some pretty names for dolls?
JENNIE B.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

How I love your paper! I think it is a splendid paper. I am so very fond of reading it, and I can hardly wait for Wednesday's paper to come. I have you read Little Men and Little Women, by Louisa M. Alcott? I have read all of the books in the Chicago Public Library, and I have read all of the books in different languages. I have read a number of books from this library, and I am and my paper is getting too long.
EMILY A. K.

I too have read all Miss Alcott's books, and am glad whenever she has a story in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

HARTFORD, MASSACHUSETTS.

This paper was a New Year's present to me from my dear mother. My favorite serial stories have been "Wakulla" and "Roll House." My school is now having a vacation of five weeks. We have a kind teacher, and we are very happy. The summer I have been doing house-work and visiting friends in several cities and towns. How I would like to visit New York, and especially to see the great publishing house of Harper & Brothers, and also to see the lady whom the children love so much! In HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE I lately saw a letter from you, and I was very glad to see it correspond with an American girl, so I have written her. I like to read letters from China, England, Australia, Iowa, California, and Texas. Perhaps you would like to know my favorite authors: they are Mrs. Lucy C. Lillie, Kirk Munroe, and James Otis. Last August mother presented me with a copy of Roll House, and History of England, which I prize very much. I think I may have a canary-bird given me this winter. The summer visitors have nearly all left for the winter homes in the cities from a home they came. About three weeks ago I took a ride with a friend of mine among the mountains and villages of Falmouth Heights, seven miles from here. We rode down to the salt water, and then up Round to smell the braising air. I was visiting at my aunt's, four miles from my home; I enjoyed the winter homes in the cities from a home they came. LENA A.

LAKELAND, NEW JERSEY.

Last summer our family camped out on a point in the upper Saranac Lake, among the Adirondack mountains, for seven or eight days, and three guides. One day we went on a picnic to Rollin's Pond. We had several "carries" to cross. I suppose you all know that "carry" is the mountain way of carrying our party, and it is done another or between lakes. The guides carried the boats on their heads over the carries. The "dancing" was done on the mountain, and by the frost of several nights. We took our dinner on a patch of land between Rollin's Pond and a smaller one, which had been burned over years ago, and which was very soft and spongy as regards its firmness. One of the guides made a fire at the foot of an old stump, and then he broiled a young chicken, which, with hot coffee, eggs, corn, biscuit, apples, crackers, and cheese, made us a very nice dinner. After dinner two of the guides went to the little pond near us to fish, and I went with them, but we were careful not to disturb the fishermen. Soon papa called to us that it was time to go home; so we landed, and were waiting for the guides when we saw one of them.

Then the guide, who was six feet in height, stood up in the narrow boat and let the fish "play." Sometimes the fish would almost "leap" out of the boat, and the guide would dart in the opposite direction. When it was tired, James the guide pulled it in. It was a speckled trout, weighing about a quarter of a pound, and was of a dark salmon-color. Soon they caught another, and then we started for camp. We saw quantities of wild cranberries and pitcher-plants growing in the swamps.

I am thirteen years old. Papa has given me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for five years, and I think it grows more interesting each year.

ELEANOR F.

BOSTON, MASS.

This is the first time I have written you since I have been taking the paper. I have been taking it since 1880. I think "Infer Unknown Seas" is a nice story. Hobson is a busy town of 35,000 people. For papa I have a little dog, which is three months old, and weighs two pounds. Do you know a good name for it? I was thirteen in September.

A short, crisp name like Prince, Stot, Major, Lion, or Turk is a good name for a dog.

Is he a mischievous monkey?

ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

I read in last week's HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a letter from Dorothy M., asking some one to write and describe some things that I know of some things which I hope will be of use. A pocket-penmanship may be made by taking a visiting-card and cutting two round pieces; cover with a piece of fine silk or satin, sew the pieces together, and sticking pins all around. It is very pretty to embroider something on both sides. To make a match-receiver, take an old tin, and cover with a piece of visiting-card-board, with some pretty pattern worked on it. A satin ribbon to hang it by is very pretty. To make a pretty fly, take two yards of albatross cloth, and outline a pretty pattern on either end, with lace on the edge, put a pretty feather-stitching all around, and tie it in the middle with a bow of ribbon. Bureauc sets are very pretty when lined on unbleached muslin or cheese-cloth. Take a spool of thread, and with one end draw with a pencil round a joint of a stick, and with the other end draw in pink, blue, red, orange, or any pretty color of washing silk. Lace all around is very pretty.

JULIE F.

CONROSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I would like to see you very much. I am ten years old, and I am at boarding-school my home is in Philadelphia. I have a kitten named Phoebe, and I have a dog named Easy. We have a very nice one touches him by means. He is very cross and snappy, but I love him. I have a brother who is fourteen years old, but he looks only about ten years old. He lives in Washington Territory, a great distance from me. My father is dead. I have to wear glasses for farsightedness.

KATIE P.

COTTON, NEW YORK.

I live in the country, and go to school. I have had vacation since the middle of July, and have assisted in picking up apples, walnuts, and butternuts. We have a great many flowers, and sometimes we have 1200 tulips in blossom in one day. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. I have a very much, but I am thirteen in the continued stories and the Post-office Box. Oh, dear friend, I wish you could see the colors of our woods, they are so pretty!

ELVA C. B.

MORTON, NEW YORK.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Papa always asks me what I want for a Christmas present, and I always say, "HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE." I have no mother, and I have a step-father. Last December I had my birthday, and sisters all of them younger than myself, and I am only thirteen, and now I have none. A diplomat carried them all off. Papa says that he could have had it if I had not been at school in New York.

It was told that prompted me to write this letter, and if you can find room for it, please put this in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and as soon as possible. My name came from my mother, and brought me a great many curiosities, and gave them to me. But a short time ago she put an advertisement in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and she thought she would like to see some of them, and in a short time we had a great many correspondents, among whom was a correspondent who gave me a very fine one. He told me to send on the required articles, requesting me to send on mine; but as he did not give me his full address, I could not do it. You will kindly send this letter. I will be much obliged to you.

HOW BANGLERS ARE MADE

It may be very interesting to many of the boys and girls who read this paper to know how banglers are made. We take a ten-cent piece and put it in a fine file, and when it is smooth, we use, of course, very deep file-marks, which are now removed with a much finer file, which leaves very fine file-marks. After we are through with the fine file, we use a very fine emery paper, which removes the file-marks. We now use charcoal, which is prepared for removing very fine scratches, and we use it very carefully. After this we use three different kinds of brushes; first a rotten-stone brush; secondly, a rough rouge brush; and last a fine buff. The bangler is then given to the engraver, who puts the letters which he wants. The engraver engraves this bangler on a block of wood, so that he can engrave it; after it is engraved he takes it off the cement, and puts it in a cold, so as to set off the cement. The jeweller strikes a hole and puts in a silver ring. The polisher puts on the finishing touch with the fine buff, and the bangler is done. Now, my dear readers, don't you think there is a good deal of work on a bangler?

We are two little friends, Daisy and Annie. Annie is ten and I, Daisy, am nearly twelve years old. Perhaps you remember me. I composed a little poem named "Summer," and my sister sent it to your paper; it was five years ago. We are writing this letter to tell you of an afternoon walk instead of a morning walk. It was Saturday, and Annie came down to spend the day. She lives in the country. After dinner we thought we would take a walk in the field, and see if we could get a few walnuts. I thought I had seen some walnut trees in the lot, but only from a distance, so I was not sure. We thought we would go there and find out, and on the way we passed a small pond with a little tree in it, which had gathered some everlasting—a white, fuzzy weed which lasts as long as you want to keep it; it looks very pretty in bouquets. When we were in the lot, we found quite a lot of walnuts, and as we had not come prepared to gather any, Annie had to take off her cap to put them in. I did not dare to take off my cap, but I did. When we were in the lot, we had gathered all on the ground we started for home—we could not get them off the trees, they were so high. We were walking along when Annie suddenly stopped and called out with an exclamation of delight, for there in our path was another walnut tree, full. Was not that nice? The ground under the tree was small enough to climb. We reached home safely just before sundown. Mamma praised them, and there were six quarts, of which we each took three. Don't you think we did well? Did you ever go nutting? if so, did you like it?

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are two little girls, eleven and ten, and go to school. We thought we would write you a letter. We are good readers, and we are in the same classes. We study spelling, third arithmetic, mental arithmetic, grammar, reading, geography and history. We like writing and drawing the best. We must close, as our letter is getting rather long. Hoping this will be printed.

Your little friends, NELLIE and ELDA.

DES MOINES, IOWA.

I live in Iowa, and in summer it is very nice, but I fancy some of our little Southern cousins would shiver to think of our winters, which are so cold. My papa is a doctor, and he says that if we are punished as well we can be comfortable, though we look like polar bears. I wish some of the English or American cousins would write to me. I am learning to talk German never learned when she was little, and when she was married she could not cook meat; so she says I must learn.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have admired you from a distance for some time, and have at last concluded, if you will permit me, to join that most delightful circle—the Post-office Box. I am a member of the Little Bessy-club, a nice little club for girls, and, as some one suggested some time ago, I think it would be nice for the boys to have a club also. Now, I hope the boys will set their wills to work, and that they will also send to me a line about it. I am sure you will plan to answer it. I would like to know how you get on in your time, and how you like to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I would not mind to have 2000 subscribers.

M. OGDEN.

There is a reason in the world why boys and girls should not read our paper. It is because the father says about which I shall have some thing to say before long.

WHAT YOU SHOULD DO

I am a boy eleven years old. I go to school in Fishing, two and a half miles from here. White Sulphur Springs is a town about five miles from here. It is directly opposite Troopers Point, an Westchester County, New York. I have no pets except a turtle, which I share with my little brother. One day I was reading on the veranda, when a little brother, who was playing about, called out to me, "Oh, John, look! There's a turtle!" I went and caught him, and boring a hole near the edge of his shell, I put a string through it, which I fastened to a stake outside. I am trying to tame him, but do not succeed very well. JOHN D. C.

BUMPS OF EXPERIENCE—A LESSON IN GRAVITATION.

A SCHOOL-GIRL'S DRESS IN THE OLDEN TIME.

THE name of Mary Lyon, the founder of Mount Holyoke Seminary, is familiar to many of the mothers and grandmothers of the children who read this paper. Perhaps some of the girls who are going to school to-day would like to hear how the little Mary Lyon dressed for her simple school life seventy years ago. I am often sorry that dress occupies so much of the time and thought of the girls of to-day. I observe that when Eva or Gracie is invited to a little party, the first question is almost always, "What shall I wear?" and mothers and aunts are often quite perplexed to satisfy all the demands which even a school-girl's wardrobe makes.

In Mary Lyon's day, on the little mountain farm in New England, the child saw the flax grow to make her single summer dress, and herself petted and fed the lambs and sheep which gave the wool to keep her warm in winter. The fairy flax-flower, blue as heaven, delighted her eyes, and by-and-by she watched her brother break and swingle or beat the flax clean, or perhaps hatchel or comb it on a board set with strong iron teeth. Then her mother would spin it on the little wheel, Mary herself standing at the great wheel and spinning the filling. After this the busy mother, who, like all the notable housewives of the period, did almost everything that was done in the home, would send for peach leaves and birch bark and indigo, and dye the fabric she had woven, and at last the new dress, stout and strong, would be ready, complete for school wear only when the blue-checked gingham aprons were finished and put on to save it. White aprons were not even thought of by ordinary little girls in those days, although as a piece of luxury a black silk apron with frilled pockets was sometimes a part of one's very best dress.

When I was a little girl, and sometimes too pleased with my adornments, I was advised to read a piece of poetry beginning:

"How proud we are, how fond to show
Our clothes and call them rich and new,
When the poor sheep and silk-worm wore
That very clothing long before!"

The thick flannel of which Mary Lyon's winter dress was composed was dyed a bright warm red, and it was just the thing to keep out the cold. When she was spinning the wool, and the wheel became unmanageable, as it sometimes did, her mother would sing to her,

"It's not in the wheel, it's not in the band;
It's in the girl who takes it in hand."

The capable girl who took the wheel in hand was always at the head of her classes, and the spelling-book, arithmetic, and grammar presented no difficulties which she did not overcome.

BENNY'S "EXTRY BITE"

BY MARY D BRINE.

HIS name was Benny—Benny O'Moore—
 And he kept the "wolf" from his dear mother's door
 By trotting around on his tipless feet
 And crying "Paps" about the street,
 Though cold the days and though cheerless the skies,
 Bright summer looked out of the lad's blue eyes.
 And though hands and feet and little pug nose
 Were often, as Benny declared, "mos' froze,"
 Yet love for mother, so sweet and so true,
 Kept warming his heart all through and through.

Thanksgiving drew near. "Oh dear," sighed he,
 "Sure a turkey 'd taste good to mother an' me,
 But it's niver a taste of that bird we'll get,
 An' it ain't no use for a feller to fret."
 So "Paps! paps!" cried Benny O'Moore,
 Poking his head into many a store,
 And boarding the cars as they passed his way
 On that cheerless, rainy November day,
 Always thinking—the brave little lad—
 Of "mother, the dearest a boy ever had!"

Thanksgiving Day came, and our Benny arose
 From his bed on the floor. "Cheer up, mammy! who knows
 But I'll bring home a bite that is extry, you see,
 To make a Thanksgiving for you and for me?"
 Then he kissed her good-by, and was off and away
 Attending to business on Thanksgiving Day.
 "For," says he, "there are folks as I know won't refuse To season their dinner wid readin' the news,"
 So he shouted out loudly in passing each door,
 "Here's all kinds of paps—an' Benny O'Moore!"

'Twas noon, and poor Benny began to feel blue,
 For business was dull. "Sure there's nothin' to do
 But jist to go home," thought the lad, when, oh, joy!
 He heard a voice calling, "Look here, little boy, Here's a nice piece of pie—don't you want it?" Oh then,
 What a world of delight filled the heart of our Ben—
 As he sprang up the steps, to the sister and brother—
 "Oh, God bless you, miss! 'twill taste good to me nother,
 An' I'll ate it wid her, if yer please, for ye see
 It's a bit of Thanksgiving for her an' for me,"
 Then he pulled off his cap with a bow for "good-by,"
 And dined with his mother on good mince-pie.

TWO THANKSGIVINGS IN THE ARCTIC.

BY LIEUTENANT FREDERICK SCHWATKA.

MOST of my young readers, and the old ones too, for that matter, may think that the proper time for a real heart-felt Thanksgiving on the part of an arctic expedition should take place just after it is all over, if they have returned in safety. Yet, after all, an expedition in the frozen north-land can have a Thanksgiving just as well as the more favored ones at home; and although a person viewing both, were such things possible, would say that the gathering seemed a little more cheerless "way up north," yet I am sure that those who took part in it, so extremely cold and uninviting is everything around them by contrast, would remember their arctic Thanksgivings as the most pleasing and cheerful of any they have ever had.

There is one curious thing about an arctic Thanksgiving, and some of my readers may think it would at once deter a party from observing the day in that region: you can not tell exactly when Thanksgiving comes. We folks at home have no trouble in this respect, for the President of the United States fixes it by proclamation, and the Governors of the different States and Territories follow him with their proclamations, naming the same date, and thus we know just when to kill our turkeys, and, more important than that, just when to eat them.

Thanksgiving Day is usually, by a sort of unwritten law, the last Thursday in November, but there have been departures from this rule, and there is no knowing when one will occur again. A party in the arctic, therefore, far removed from post and telegraph offices, are never certain just when to bring their can-opener into play in order to "kill" their turkey. In the polar regions we were compelled to keep the turkey in such a little pen that that kind of an instrument was needed to allow it to see daylight; and very little did it see then, with only an hour or two of twilight at noon. So the only way out of the dilemma, if a polar party must have a Thanksgiving, is for the commander to appoint a day himself, and if it does not agree with the date fixed at home, he can not help it if the President does feel badly when they return.

We spent two Thanksgivings in the frigid zones, and as one was while we were "at home" in north Hudson Bay, and the other while we were travelling with dogs and sledges, I will briefly describe them both.

Our first one in northern Hudson Bay found us living like Esquimaux in houses built of ice and snow. We had plenty of civilized provisions with us, however, and among them were some canned turkey and chicken, both mixed together, but unfortunately the labels had become wet in the long sea-voyage, and had dropped off, so that we could not tell the difference between the true chickens and the chickens put up and labelled as turkey, as one of my party expressed it. We had no place to keep our provisions so as to protect them from the cold, and as the thermometer had been down to forty degrees below zero, everything was frozen solid and stiff. In this condition I would defy any one to tell the difference between canned frozen turkey and chicken. It would be like asking a boy to shut his eyes and tell which end of an icicle he was chewing upon. So our Thanksgiving turkey was a little bit uncertain.

Eberbing, our Esquimaux interpreter, had told all the natives roundabout that an important day with the white men was about to take place; and as the Esquimaux had been in the habit of assembling at our snow-house after meals for such little morsels as they could pick up—generally a small panful of boiled hard bread or sea-crackers well sweetened with molasses—they naturally associated an "important day" with one when they would get an important addition to their usual rough rations. Accordingly they were on hand in full force, and knowing of their coming, we prepared for them accordingly. The canned turkey, or whatever it was, was placed aside, a nice saddle of reindeer meat was picked out of the many we had in another snow-house alongside, and a half-dozen ptarmigan, or arctic grouse, were gotten ready, being a present from a couple of Esquimaux boys, although we did not forget that a present from a savage means that you must give something in return.

A huge walrus flipper was allowed to simmer for a whole day in one of the curious little stone kettles of these curious people, this part of the cooking being left with some native women employed for that purpose, and in a snow-house not far from ours. Cooked in this manner for so long a time, flipper tastes like some sort of jellied meat, served hot; but as the walrus lives on clams, this flavor is the foremost in this dish. To those of my readers who live along the sea-coast, and delight in clam bakes and clam chowders, I am sure walrus flipper would not prove an unacceptible dish. A big sirloin of seal was fixed up as a roast, and we did not forget to have a steak or two from the round of a musk ox, and as this is sometimes called the musk sheep, we dressed it as mutton with capers. Two large arctic salmon, caught by these fishermen of the frigid zones through ice four or five feet thick, and looking like wooden Indian clubs, they were frozen so stiff, were dressed for the meal.

None of our native hunters had been successful in killing a polar bear in time, so we had to do without this kind of arctic food; but when I tasted it, some months afterward. I was perfectly willing to admit that we had lost no great luxury. In the winter-time the bears are as lean as a knife-blade, and in the summer they live on seals which are not very fresh, and a person wants to go without his breakfast and lunch to partake of bear-meat for dinner and enjoy it.

Such was our bill of fare, and enough there was for both white men and Esquimaux, although the latter thought that the best part of it all was the boiled crackers—"seouse," as our whaling cook called it—covered with pork grease, over which an ample supply of thick molasses was poured. This, washed down with tea or coffee, made our Esquimaux friends give great quantities of thanksgiving in "Ma-mook poo! ma-mook poo-u-ad-lo!" (good! very good!), and no doubt wished that Thanksgiving came seven days in the week, and at least twice a day. After the dinner was over, and for which our Esquimaux gave more thanks than for any other part of the proceedings, they slowly dispersed to their snow-houses in the village that was clustered around ours as a centre, and turning in between their warm robes of reindeer-skins, dreamed away the rest of the day, while the white men tried to spend the day as they would in more civilized lands.

The next Thanksgiving, one year later, we spent on our sledge journey returning to Hudson Bay, which we spoke of as "home," from the islands in the Arctic Ocean near the mouth of Back's Great Fish River. The last Thursday in November found us crossing a broad peninsula passing from one large arm of the Arctic Sea to another, where the Back's River empties, and which we were extremely anxious to reach. That day we came upon a river some sixty to seventy paces broad, and it was named Thanksgiving River to commemorate the event.

It was of a great deal of importance to us to know just which way it flowed, for should its waters run eastward, all we would have to do would be to sledge along its icy covering, and it would take us by an easy grade to Back's River. Usually the Esquimaux can tell which way the current of a frozen river trends by lying flat on the ice, and placing the face close to it, and turning the eyes alternately to the right and left, or up and down stream, sighting along the level ice; but although two of the keenest-sighted of the Esquimaux young men tried this plan on several parts of Thanksgiving River, they gave it up in despair, shaking their heads, and informing me that if the ice was off the river so that we could see the water flowing it would be a very sluggish current. The only way to settle the matter was to dig through the ice, some five or six feet thick, and sink a pole in the ice-well, first on one side and then on the other, until the force of the current, however sluggish, would carry it across to the other side, and determine the direction of the current.

This cutting an ice-well is very interesting, and is done with two instruments, each on the end of a long pole. The first is a chisel, a sharpened spike, a bayonet, or any such instrument, with which the native cuts a hole about a foot deep in the ice, and probably a foot and a half wide. This chopped ice made by the ice-chisel is then scooped out by a sort of a ladle made of musk-ox horn on the end of another pole, and this alternation of cutting and scooping is kept up, digging out from six to twelve inches each time until the water is reached six or seven feet below. The farthest I ever saw them dig an ice-well to get to fresh-water was eight feet and a half.

After we had dug a well about a foot and a half in diameter, I put down the scoop beyond the bottom of the ice on the western side, and there it remained; then on the eastern side, and it lazily floated over to the west, which showed that the current flowed that way, or in the direction from which we had been coming. It was a great disappointment to us, and a river that we could hardly be thankful for; so it was abandoned next day.

Our Thanksgiving dinner that day was nothing but reindeer meat, the same as any other day, for the good and sufficient reason that we had nothing else. For breakfast we had three or four pounds of broiled reindeer meat, drinking the soup afterward. For lunch while travelling we had raw frozen reindeer-cut in chunks about half as big as one's hand, and then beaten into brashy shreds with the back of the hatchet. For dinner, as soon as the snow-house was finished, we had the same frozen meat, and a hot dinner of boiled meat and soup about an hour after. Now that the intensely cold winter weather of the arctic was coming rapidly toward us, we ate large quantities of reindeer fat to help us keep warm, oftentimes as much in quantity as the meat itself. Just about this Thanksgiving we were living on reduced rations, however, for we had but little reindeer meat, and could not see our way clear to Back's Great Fish River, where we could procure fish. Our poor dogs! they had even less to be thankful for than we, as they were being fed only about once a week.

BRIGHTIE'S CHRISTMAS CLUB.

BY AIBCE M. KELLOGG.

III.

EXT Friday found the same girls at Brightie's house who had made their preparations for Christmas the two weeks previous.

"Ready for work?" asked Aunt Jennie, coming into the room with a sunny smile.

The young faces responded as if by magic: Aunt Jennie's smile was always magnetic. Lulu and Mabel held up their hands to show thimbles on and needles threaded, Nellie and Mabel's sister displayed their work-boxes and baskets, and Cora Stuart stitched busily on a photograph case that she had begun during the week.

"I bought several yards of scrim when I was downtown this morning," said Aunt Jennie, after the girls had drawn their chairs a little closer; "and if you would like to make some pretty aprons with it, I shall be glad to show you how."

"What is scrim?" asked Nellie.

"This open-work material; it looks like fine canvas," replied Aunt Jennie, unrolling a bundle. "It is used sometimes for curtains, but is very pretty for fancy aprons. It is nearly a yard wide, you see, and the selvage may be used for the sides. We will cut it the length you wish the apron to be, allowing enough material to make a hem three inches wide at the bottom and an inch wide at the top. Through this one you can run a ribbon which will gather it around the waist. This makes a plain apron, but if you wish to add more work, and make it a great deal prettier, I can tell you two or three ways of doing it."

"Please do," said a chorus of voices, persuasively.

"An inch above the hem, then," Aunt Jennie continued, "draw out the threads that run across for an inch. Then run through this row of very narrow ribbon—lute-string, I think it is called—allowing the ribbon to show every quarter of an inch. Different shades of yellow, beginning with canary and running to a deep orange, are pretty for this purpose; or blue or red if it is a favorite color. I saw the different colors of the rainbow—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet a row of each, used in this way, and the effect was very pretty.

"Another way to trim an apron of this kind is to embroider various designs with silk of the same color or as that used for the strings. I will give you two or three, and you can choose which you like best. These can be repeated row after row to suit your own fancy. It is also pretty to draw a certain number of threads at regular intervals, and then darn a pattern with darning cotton."

EMBROIDERY FOR AN APRON

"Do you know of anything I can make for my father and Uncle Harry?" asked Cora Stuart. "It is so hard to find something that a gentleman can use, and that will be pretty too."

"Why not get one of those small palettes made of white holly—they can be bought at any art store for fifteen cents—and fasten a calendar on? Then decorate with a verse or quotation put on in quaint letters; or buy a panel made of wood, and fasten a small thermometer on it, and if you can draw or paint, Cora, add some of your work. [See initial design.]

"You might make a match scratcher of holly-wood cut in diamond shape. Paste sandpaper on one side, and make a silhouette on the other by drawing a head or figure and filling it in with black paint or India-ink. At the upper corner fasten a loop of ribbon to hang it by."

"Don't forget to tell them about that other present for gentlemen we were talking of last night," said Brightie.

"I must not, indeed," said Aunt Jennie; "that is one of the very best we have. It is a shaving case. Take a piece of water-color paper, or tinted paper of any color you prefer, four inches by six. Cut also three dozen pieces of tissue-paper the same size. Lay all together evenly, the tinted paper uppermost. Take a piece of ribbon four inches wide by seven long, of any pretty color, fold it with the two edges together, and lap one edge over the tinted paper about half an inch; the other edge will cover the tissue-paper the same distance behind. Baste it down carefully, and sew with a coarse stitch on the machine close to the edge of the ribbon. The stitch will go through all the paper, and enable you to tear off the pieces one by one. Fringe the ends of the ribbon, sew a narrow ribbon at the corners to hang up by. The letters 'A Clean Shave' can be as fanciful as you choose, and so can your decoration be."

"I think there couldn't be anything nicer for a gentleman than that," exclaimed Brightie, enthusiastically.

"Suppose," said Bertha Browning, airily, "your father gets shaved at the barber's; what then?"

There was a laugh at this ingenious question, but all agreed that the article was both pretty and useful.

The daylight was fading fast, so they reluctantly gathered their things together and started for home.

FRIENDS AT LAST.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

"TOMORROW is no holiday for me," thought Eugene Mason, as he walked slowly home from school the day before Thanksgiving. "We don't seem to have anything to be thankful for; everything is so gloomy at our house!" Here his unpleasant thoughts were interrupted by the sound of wheels rattling upon the road behind him. Eugene turned, and saw approaching a child's wagon drawn by two sturdy goats. In it sat a little boy not more than four years old. In one hand he held the reins tightly, and in the other a toy whip with a red handle.

As he passed Eugene he called out, "How de do, Cousin Gene?"

"Where are you going so fast, Bob?" asked Eugene, smiling.

"Only think! mamma has forgotten that to-morrow is Thanksgiving Day," replied Bob; "so I am going to bring home the biggest turkey I can find in all Turkey-land."

"Where's Turkey-land?" asked Eugene.

"Over there, I think," replied Bob, in a rather doubtful tone, pointing before him with his whip. "I'll get two, if I can—one for you, Cousin Gene. Good-by." And whipping up his team, he rattled away, and was out of hearing before Eugene could answer.

"I suppose they don't keep holidays at Uncle Benjamin's either," thought Eugene, as he resumed his walk. "How different everything would be if father and Uncle Benjamin were friends again! Then grandma and Aunt Mary, Tom and all the others, would come from the city, and we would have just as pleasant times as any one. I wish the quarrel was made up."

Eugene reached his home full of this thought, and as he opened the door of the room where his mother sat in a low chair, close by the fire, sewing, he said, suddenly, "Mother, don't you think it would be much pleasanter if father and Uncle Benjamin were friends again?"

His mother glanced up quickly, and presently she answered, "Yes, dear, it would be; but what made you think of that just now?"

"Nothing much," said Eugene, hesitating a little; "but to-morrow is Thanksgiving Day, and all the other boys are going to have such nice times, uncles and aunts and cousins coming to see them, and turkeys and pumpkin pies for dinner, and—all that."

"Yes," replied his mother, with a sigh, "it is a great day for family reunions. When I was a child the house where your uncle Benjamin resides was my home, and once a year, on Thanksgiving Day, all father's and mother's relations and connections came from every direction to meet at our dwelling."

"That must have been jolly!" cried Eugene.

"Yes, it was very, very pleasant," said his mother.

"The great dining-room was filled so that you could scarcely turn about in it; but father always said there was room for one more."

"Uncle Benjamin is your own brother, is he not?" asked Eugene, after a few moments' silence.

"Yes, dear."

"What made him quarrel with father, then?"

"Never mind, Eugene," said his mother. "I would rather not talk about that."

"Oh, very well," said Eugene; "but I wish they were friends again, that's all."

"And so do I," replied his mother, sadly. Then she added, quickly, "But, Eugene, if you would like to have turkey and pumpkin pie for dinner to-morrow, you shall."

"No, I thank you," replied Eugene, rather sulkily. "I think I'll fast, as the Puritans did on the first Thanksgiving Day in New England. I don't care what I have for dinner, if I can't have a good time; for it is not so much what you eat as the way you eat that makes a dinner pleasant."

"You are right, Eugene," said his mother, smiling, "but if I remember rightly, even the Puritans did not despise turkey when it was sent to them after their Thanksgiving fast. I have heard that they were both thankful and delighted when a flock of the birds was discovered at the edge of a thick wood near their settlement."

"Then that is the reason people always have turkey on Thanksgiving Day?" said Eugene, forgetting his grievances for a moment. Then he added, "But I suppose even the Puritans did not go and shut themselves up all alone to eat their dinner."

"I am sorry, Eugene," said his mother, with a pained look, "that your holidays are not more pleasant."

"Never mind, mother," said Eugene, quickly, as he noticed how sad her face was. "Perhaps some day the quarrel will be made up, and then things will be changed."

That evening as Eugene went out to the barn to help Luke, the hired man, feed the horses, he happened to look across the brown, barren field, over which the full moon was just rising. He was surprised to see a number of lights dancing about in a singular manner in the direction of his uncle's house. At first they were grouped together closely, then presently they separated, and singly or in couples moved toward a thick wood behind the house.

"What is the matter over there, Luke?" asked Eugene.

"Haven't you heard?" replied Luke. "Why, I reckon every one in Silver Fall knows about it by this time but you and your folks here. We don't take no stock in—"

"Knows about what, Luke?" interrupted Eugene, impatiently.

"Why, the little one over there is missing, and all the neighbors have turned out to hunt for him."

"Do you mean my little cousin Bob?" asked Eugene, very much startled.

"Yes, that's just it. He has been missing ever since five o'clock, they say. He went out in his goat carriage, and the goats, with a piece of the wagon dangling after them, were found in the woods. So folks think that they must have run away and thrown the young one either in the woods or among the hills."

"The poor little fellow!" exclaimed Eugene, watching the lights as they flashed here and there in the distance. "Has any one looked along the river-bank?"

"Why, no," replied Luke, slowly; "you see, the goats were found in the woods, so naturally the folks look to find him thereabouts."

"But, Luke," said Eugene, "I met little Bob this afternoon about four o'clock. He was in the road leading to the river, driving toward the bridge as fast as he could."

"Hello!" exclaimed Luke, dropping the bundle of hay he was carrying. "I guess I had better go and tell some of them before they all go off to the woods." He locked the door hastily as he spoke, and climbing over the stone wall, started across the stubble field with long, quick strides.

Eugene started for the house, but at the garden gate he met his uncle Benjamin coming toward him. His face looked drawn and white, as the full moon shone down upon it.

"Eugene," said he, in a hurried voice, "have you seen Bob?"

"I saw him about four o'clock, driving toward the river," replied Eugene.

"Toward the river!" exclaimed his uncle, clutching at the fence for support. "Did he say where he was going?"

"He said something about going to Turkey-land to buy a turkey."

"Oh, my poor little boy!" murmured Uncle Benjamin. "Will you come in and speak to mother?" said Eugene, very much affected by his uncle's distress.

"No, no," he replied, hastily. Then he turned and hurried down the road. But he was no sooner out of sight than the meaning of little Bob's words flashed across Eugene's mind.

On the other side of the river some one had built an extensive poultry-yard, inclosed in a high wire fence. Lately there had been a great number of turkeys in the inclosure, and Eugene remembered having heard the children call it Turkey-land. This must have been where little Bob intended to go for his turkey.

"No one will think of looking there," thought Eugene. "I will go over myself."

He ran out of the gate, and across the fields toward the river, which was rather narrow, but deep and swift flowing, falling in one place twenty feet down a mass of rock, making a beautiful but dangerous water-fall, from which the village took the name of Silver Fall. A strong stone bridge spanned the river a little above the fall, and Eugene, without wasting any time, made his way toward it.

He paused a moment as he reached the centre of the bridge, and looked up and down the river. Beneath him the water tumbled and foamed over great bowlders of black rock, leaping high into the air before it plunged over the precipice into the quieter water below. Boats were seldom used above the fall at this point, as it was considered next to impossible to keep from being carried down by the current. In the distance Eugene saw lights moving slowly along the bank, and knew that his uncle's friends were now searching there.

He crossed the bridge, and climbing down over the rocks, kept on for some distance along the shore, until he came within sight of the poultry-yard. To reach this he was obliged to force his way through the thick bushes that surrounded it. He peered about in every direction for some sign of little Bob. At last he caught sight of some object hanging to the wires of the inclosure, and on pulling it out it proved to be Bob's little red-handled whip, and close to it, stuffed between the wires, was a small gray woolen mitten.

"He has been here, certainly," said Eugene, as he thrust these articles into his pocket. "But where is he now?"

As he picked his way back his foot became entangled in something, which on examining he found to be a long rope, one end of which was made into a loop and thrown over a stake, while the other dangled loosely into the water.

"Where is the boat?" thought Eugene, as he stood still and looked about, for he remembered to have seen an old flat-bottomed skiff lying here, fastened to this very rope. And there it was at some distance lower down the river, among the rocks, in a little cove formed by a slight bend in the land. It was rocking up and down with every motion of the water, and lying in the boat, his head supported by the seat and his face upturned to the moonlight, was little Bob, fast asleep, and perfectly unconscious of the danger he was in.

Eugene did not dare to call and wake the child, for he knew that the least movement might free the boat and send it off. He looked toward the lights on the other shore; they were still some distance off. As he stood on the bank, undecided as to what course he should take, the boat floated slowly around, and after swinging to and fro indecisively, sailed out into the current, and moved rapidly toward the bridge. Eugene, with a loud cry of horror, ran back to where he had seen the rope, and pulling it from the stake, threw it toward the boat; but it did not even touch it. So, with the rope still in his hand, he started toward the bridge. As Eugene hurried along the bank he saw that the little vessel had lodged against another of the many rocks projecting from the water, pausing there for a moment, then slowly whirled about and went on again. And now Eugene had gained upon it, and was fast nearing the bridge.

Others had seen the boat too, for he heard cries and shouts from the opposite bank, and the lights began to move rapidly along the water's edge.

But Eugene knew, as he stood upon the bridge watching them impatiently, that before help could arrive the skiff would be dashed over the fall, and poor Bob crushed and mangled among the cruel rocks below.

"If I could only get down there," thought Eugene, as he leaned far over the parapet, "I might hold the boat until some one came to help me."

He glanced at the rope in his hand; it was stout and strong, with a loop in one end large enough for his arm to go through. The river ran swiftest between the two centre piers, which were placed some distance apart. Dangerous it was, but still possible; so—

"Well, here goes!" said Eugene at length. "If I drown, I drown; but I must try to save him."

He slipped his arm through the loop, and tying the other end of the rope firmly to the stout iron railing, he seized it with both hands, and without a moment's hesitation slipped between the bars, and supporting his feet against the stone-work, slid rapidly down, just as the tramping of many feet close by told him that the others had arrived.

As Eugene hung within a few inches of the surging, roaring water, the crowd above uttered loud shouts of encouragement and warning; for the boat was now in full sight of all, and little Bob, his small hands folded on his breast, his yellow hair and white forehead gleaming in the moonlight, lay peacefully asleep amid all the wild turmoil of water and the uproar of the throng.

Eugene's heart beat fast as the boat's bow appeared under the shadow of the bridge. He let the rope slide down his arm, and taking a firmer grasp of it, bent forward and waited. The men above held their breath. As the boat glided by, Eugene, with a quick movement, seized little Bob's short skirt in his hand, and snatched him quickly from it. The light vessel shot by, and almost instantly disappeared over the fall, leaving the two boys suspended helplessly above the river.

Bob awoke with a cry of fright.

"Catch hold," panted Eugene, for he felt that his strength was almost exhausted.

Bob, after one bewildered look, did as he was told, and with one chubby arm around Eugene's neck, and the other hand clutching the rope, he hid his face on his friend's shoulder and sobbed softly.

"A rope—quick, a rope!" cried some one on the bridge. "They will both be drowned; the boy can never stand the strain." Above all the other wild, excited voices Eugene recognized this one: it was his uncle Benjamin's.

"We are going to draw you up," said another trembling voice above his head. "Can you hold on a little longer?"

"Hurry, father," was all Eugene could answer.

Then in a moment more the rope began to move, and before he knew that he was within reach he and little Bob were lifted over the railing by strong arms, and gently placed upon the bridge. Then with loud cheers the crowd surrounded Eugene, who, bewildered and almost unconscious, leaned against his father's arm.

Presently he heard Uncle Benjamin say, in an earnest voice, "Thank Heaven! my little one is safe."

"I never thought to see my boy again," murmured Eugene's father, with something like a sob in his voice. Then he added, "Brother Ben, we have much to be thankful for this day."

"We have indeed," answered Uncle Benjamin, seizing Mr. Mason's hand in both of his: "you for possessing so brave a son, and I for my darling's rescue."

"And now, Ben," replied Eugene's father, returning the grasp, "we will have no more misunderstandings. Let the past be forgotten, and to-morrow will then be a day of real thanksgiving."

"With all my heart," replied Uncle Benjamin, as they walked away arm in arm.

"Gene," said little Bob, looking down from his father's shoulder, "you see, I couldn't get you a turkey. They gobbled so I was obliged to wait until it was dark. So I got into the boat, and I think I went to sleep."

Thanksgiving Day arrived, but not the gloomy day Eugene had anticipated. In church the pew next to theirs was filled by his uncle's family, and instead of cold looks and sombre frowns passing between them, there were smiles and pleasant greetings. The good old minister, after giving thanks, as usual, for the safety of his people and the abundant harvest that year, added another thanksgiving for little Bob's escape.

On the church porch Uncle Benjamin turned to Eugene's mother, and said, "Fannie, I have telegraphed to mother, father, and all the rest to be sure and meet us at the old homestead. We will once more eat our Thanksgiving dinner together, for, thanks to Eugene, we are friends at last."

A POOR EXAMPLE

BY MARY E. VANDYNE

"JUST take a look at pussy," I told a little elf;
"How neat she is in all she does,
"How clean she keeps herself!"
She sets you an example
With all that dainty care.
Why can't you keep your little frock
As white and clean and fair?"

One day the cream was missing;
No vestige could we see
Of all the pretty jug contained,
Just set aside for tea.
I cried: "How very naughty!
Who could have been so bad?
Who could have robbed the larder
Of all the cream we had?"

A little voice came crying:
"I'm sure you shouldn't scold,
I know I can't be naughty;
I did as I was told."
Twas pussy found the pitcher
Upon the closet shelf,
I watched till she had tasted,
Then drank the rest myself."

A TALE OF "TERROR."

BY JOHN R. CORVELL

THE race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. And on the same principle it is not always the biggest dog that wins the most glory.

There is the Bowmans' little pug dog Terror, for example. No one would suppose, to look at the snub-nosed, curly-tailed, bow-legged, pert little fellow, that he could be of any real use, and yet—well, he was.

Of course the Bowmans always hung up their stockings at Christmas; but besides that they always expected to make presents to each other. And, to tell the truth, it was saving the money and selecting the presents in great mystery that made Christmas what it was with them.

As this particular Christmas came around, what should Arthur do but fall ill of scarlatina, most provokingly. That would not have amounted to much if that had been all, but unfortunately it was only the beginning. The Doctor said Arthur would get well, but that Elsie, who had been with him all the time, was going to take it. And so she did; and there they were, feeling well enough to go out, and yet not allowed to. And so the purchasing of Christmas presents had to be left entirely to their papa.

Papa had done his task well, and had not forgotten a thing. So it turned out when the presents were examined on Christmas morning, unless, indeed, he had forgotten Elsie.

It did look like it. Mamma and Arthur had each received something lovely from papa, but Elsie could not find a thing from him, though she looked very carefully. Papa saw how disappointed she was, and he smiled to himself.

"Elsie," he said, "there is something for you in my ulster pocket. The ulster is hanging on the inside of the door of the closet."

It took Elsie about one minute to jump to her feet and fly to the closet door and open it.

"Oh! oh-h-h-h!" she exclaimed.

There hung the big ulster, and there, staring placidly over the top of one of the pockets, was the head of a comical-looking little puppy pug-dog. The very thing Elsie had been longing for.

"Oh, you little darling!" she cried, hugging him in her arms. "What's his name, papa?"

"Terror."

"THE VERY THING ELSEIE HAD BEEN LONGING FOR"

"What a funny name for such a little dog! Why did they give him that name?"

"Because he scared a man once."

"The idea of any man being scared at such a little thing as this!"

"Well, he did scare him. And that isn't all, either; he prevented the man from getting all the Christmas presents that were intended for some young people named Elsie and Arthur Bowman, and for a lady of more mature years known as Mrs. Bowman."

"Why, papa! how could he?" cried Elsie and Arthur at once.

"It was this way. I knew, Elsie, you wanted a pug, so I had arranged with a man to bring this one to me at the office. When the dog came I didn't know what to do with him. I didn't like to carry him under my arm as the ladies do, and I was puzzling how to manage it, when the man said, 'Put him in your pocket—look here.' I looked, and he took two dogs out of each coat pocket.

"It seemed such a good idea that I slipped the little thing into my pocket, and went up-town to buy the presents. The stores were very much crowded, and I didn't like to be opening my coat every few minutes to get at my pocket-book; so I put it into the same pocket with the dog, though I had forgotten all about him then.

"I was just looking at Arthur's bicycle, when I heard Terror yelp, and a man alongside of me cried, 'Ouch!'

"I clapped my hand to my pocket, and I declare if that man had not put his hand in there to get my pocket-book! but instead of getting that, he had put a finger in the little dog's mouth, who, thinking it something to eat, I suppose, had shut his sharp little teeth on it. And so it seemed to me that Terror would be a good name for him. What do you think?"

"I think it's just splendid," replied Elsie, with enthusiasm.

"H'm!" said Arthur, condescendingly; "a good enough name; but if he were mine, I should call him Terror."

FOR THANKSGIVING DINNER.—FROM THE PAINTING BY F. W. M. D. N. A.

MRS. BANTAM'S BOOBY BOY.

A TRUE STORY.

FAR away in one of the great Southwestern States an old dame wild turkey came out on to the prairie to make her nest. She was very shy, and it had taken her a long time to muster up courage to leave the girdled timber land and steal on dainty tiptoe into the open prairie. Every now and then she would stop and lift up her head to see if the settler and his boys were wasting their time in looking at her, and spying no one, she would utter a clear and mellow congratulatory "Touk, touk-touk," and go tripping on.

At last she decided on a spot where the long dead reeds encircled the old leafy top of a fallen oak, and there she deposited her first egg. Proud as pie of her achievement, and forgetting her usual caution, she rustled her wings, and gave vent to her delight in a loud "Clup." A moment later, with outstretched neck, she was trotting away as fast as her legs would carry her through the high hazel brush, and a little boy, with his hands in his pockets, stood looking down at the great big egg.

He was a very funny-looking chubby little German boy, with a rosy, freckled face and great blue eyes that at present were opened very wide.

"Jimmenetty!" he said, with a look of astonishment; and then he picked up the egg, and held it up toward the sun, and tried to squint through it. First he held it side-wise to the light, and then endwise, and then sidewise again; and as he could not make out which gave him the most information, he ran off to his log home on the ridge to show his treasure and put the great egg under his own little speckled hen which was then sitting.

It was some time before the little hen could get used to the great big white mountain that had so mysteriously appeared in her nest. She would walk round it and "Cluck"; then hold her head on one side, and then on the other. But as its hard shell resisted her vicious little picks, and she had not sufficient strength to scratch it up the steep hill-sides of her nest, she at last flopped down and tried hard to balance herself on the great egg.

It was very funny to see the little speckled hen teetering upon the large slippery egg which took up so much room in her little box. At last, after many days of anxious watching, the little chicks began to appear, and one morning a queer little flesh-colored nose poked its way into the world from out of the great egg, and in less than no time out strolled the gawkiest, oddest-looking bird the hen thought she had ever seen. She was so very much astonished that she put her wings akimbo and stared very hard at the straggly, long-limbed, almost featherless youngster that stood swaying unsteadily backward and forward in front of her.

But the little speckled hen loved her great booby boy more than all the rest of her children, and the big silly thing hung to his mamma's apron strings, and never let her get out of his sight. And then how the boy did grow! In less time than winking he was as tall as his dear mamma. Soon he began to bristle with the stiffest of quills, which, added to his intense bashfulness, made him the laughing-stock of all the Misses Pullet in the barn-yard.

The surprise of his mamma had been very great when the big boy had grown to reach her own height. With tremendous rapidity he continued to climb up until his long wattled neck looked to her like a red-painted steeple, and a few straggly hairs betokened the coming of a beard. His pink legs had become so strong and long that it made the old lady quite out of breath to follow her boy when he went a-walking. By rights he should have been the terror of the yard, but any sancy young rooster could easily send him squealing to his mamma, under whose wing he tried to nestle, in such haste that he would oftentimes roll his fond parent over in the dust.

One day his mamma said to him, "Sonny, I think I'll raise another hatch of little brothers and sisters, so you will have to look out for yourself, my dear." But the big booby would not leave his mamma, and all the time she was sitting on her nest he fondly snuggled up to her in a big baby sort of way.

"Peep! peep! peep!" By-and-by came fourteen yellow-colored, down-covered little speckles, which the little hen mother was very glad to see; but before she could introduce them to their great huge giant foster-brother, jealousy had entered into his heart. He flew into a terrific rage; his wattles grew crimson with fury; he puffed up his feathers, cocked up his tail. His eyes glared with hate as he darted at them with his iron beak. "Pick, pop!" directly the air was filled with his dead little brothers and sisters; for with movements as quick as lightning he picked them one after another and flung them far over his head. The freckled little boy ran shouting out, and snatching up a piece of fire-wood, threw it at the giant, whom he nearly hit. Then the wild nature of the bird came to him for the first time. He ran a few steps, uttered a short "Tup," and sailed away to the great forest, never to return.

In the winter, when the snows are deep and the hunters venture in the timber in search of game, they occasionally come across the track of a solitary turkey gobbler whose foot-prints show him to be unusually large. He is too wary, however, for them to approach, and this makes them think that he is the same booby turkey that was hatched long ago by the little speckled hen.

TWO ARROWS:⁶

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.—(Continued.)

A NEW SETTLEMENT.

IT was later than usual when anybody lay down that evening. Two Arrows and his sister had heard of mines before, but they had never seen one, and the whole matter was a great curiosity.

These uncommonly well-behaved pale-faces meant to dig a hole into the side of that mountain, and get gold out of it, and they were going to build a stone "lodge" and stay there. Sile explained to them, as well as he could, a purpose he had formed of making a great farm in that valley, and of raising all sorts of things to feed the miners, and of having a town there, with schools and churches for the Indians, and a public library and a saw-mill and a grist-mill and a blacksmith's shop and a hotel.

The main idea obtained by Two Arrows was that in a little while the valley would be nearly full of horses of the best kinds. Na-tee-kah went beyond that, and got a picture into her mind of a big stone lodge, where a trader would live, and would have for sale a wonderful heap of all such things as the white squaws dressed themselves up with. She went to sleep at last, with her black eyes half dazzled by a vision of bright colors and glitterings, and had a dream that the trader had come, and was ready to trade almost anything for the skin of a grizzly bear.

Two Arrows had learned from Sile that there were extra rifles and pistols and no end of cartridges in those wagons, but everybody knew that all that sort of thing had to be paid for, and Two Arrows lay awake a long time, feverishly wondering what he could find among those mountains to buy a rifle with and a revolver and some ammunition. He felt that he should be a mere boy, after all, and not a full-grown brave, until he could exchange his bow and arrows for weapons which would kill a bear at long range. He wished never to have to wait for another on the top of any rock. It was the only point in which he could see that Sile had any real advantage over him to balance the humiliation of being a pale-face instead of the son of a Nez Percé chief. He was compelled to admit one more in the morning, for he had forgotten the fishing-rods and hooks and lines, and Sile was up before it was light, ready to begin his duty of keeping the camp supplied with provisions.

"We won't walk this time," he said, in a very business-like way. "We'll just ride across to the river, and catch enough for breakfast, and hurry back."

The sun arose very grandly over the magnificent mountain ranges, but he showed them all that wonderful scenery in vain. Sile was fishing for provisions for his father's men, and Two Arrows thought of rifles and pistols every time he pulled in a trout. He did not speak of the weight upon his mind as yet, but he was gradually forming a purpose of doing so at the earliest opportunity. It was almost like going to an open market for fish, except that there was nothing to pay for them. As fast as a line could be thrown, and its little silvery trap set a whirling, the hook was seized by some trout or other, large or small. Some of them were so heavy as to test the toughness of the upper joints of the rods, and now Two Arrows made a discovery. He had watched Sile work his reel until he had caught the secret of it, and could let a strong fish run a little before he drew him in.

"I say," exclaimed Sile, before a great while, "they're awful eaters, but they can't use up all we've got now. Let's just string 'em, and ride back to camp."

The movements of his hands, along with his words, explained his meaning, and Two Arrows pulled in his last fish with an "Ugh! good," for answer. He was doing one thing more rapidly than anybody had an idea of. He was a born "linguist," as many Indians are, and he was gathering words of English at a great rate. He was not sure he could yet utter correctly quite a number that he fully understood on hearing them, and his pride forbade him to make blunders.

The camp was all astir when they rode in, and the coffee-pot was already upon the fire.

"That's the checker, my boy," said Yellow Pine, when he saw the fish. "We shan't do any starving. Let your horse feed awhile, and then you and he go for some fresh meat. Look at them!"

There was a great grin upon his face as he pointed at Judge Parks and the miners. The Judge had taken up a heavy hammer, and was busily breaking masses of quartz to examine their quality.

"Nary one of 'em's eaten a mouthful," said Pine, just as a chopper rested from his work to shout,

"We'll have enough shingles rived for the roof by the time them fellers gits their wall up;" and another said,

"Pine, that there clay bank by the spring's the very best kind; it's 'most as good as mortar."

"Tis if you temper it well," said Pine. "Call 'em to breakfast. There'll be fish broiled and ready in no time."

As soon as he had finished his coffee and trout and "army bread," Sile went to take a look at what they were doing, and it made him open his eyes. The ground they had chosen, near a fine spring of water, was nearly level. They had marked out the lines of the walls they meant to build, and then along those lines they had dug a trench about a foot deep and two feet wide. No cellar was called for as yet, and the mason-work began at once. There was plenty of broken stone to be had, and it was rolled or carried with busy eagerness to the men who were laying the wall. One man at the clay bank toiled zealously at the important task of mixing and tempering it, while another came and went with pailfuls that were used up as fast as he could bring them. The stones were laid with their smooth faces inward, and not a minute was wasted in trimming anything for the sake of appearances.

Sile could hardly believe that so much could have been done in so short a time, and he was again astonished when the men returned from breakfast. He went from the building to the place where the choppers were swinging their axes. A tall pine-tree, four feet in diameter at the base, was down shortly after the men went at it the previous evening, and now two sturdy fellows were making the chips fly as if they were chopping for a wager. They were evidently cutting the huge trunk into lengths of about three feet, and Sile was studying the matter, when Two Arrows touched him on the elbow and pointed at the choppers.

"Ugh! What for?"

"Wait. Show him by-and-by," said Sile. "Make shingles to cover house."

"Ugh! Big lodge, Heaphard. No fall down. Top?"

"Yes. Make cover. Keep out rain."

"Ugh! Pale-face do a heap. Go away and leave him all," said Two Arrows.

It was the longest sentence he had yet attempted in English, and Sile looked at him with some surprise, but he should have remembered that Two Arrows had made a beginning long before that, and was but adding to it. At all events, he was correct in his conclusion that such a lodge could not be carried away, as could those for which Long Bear had sent his braves and squaws through the pass. It was perfectly certain that these would not loiter anywhere, but would go straight on their errand and return, and then the village would once more be under as good a shelter as it knew anything about or cared for.

All that day the axes fell, the wall grew fast, and Judge Parks and Yellow Pine went on with their examinations and their other preparations for "opening the mine"; and all day long some other things went on without their knowing it.

CHAPTER XXIII.

DANGER.

THE Apaches, in their encampment away down the river, cooked fish for breakfast at about the same hour that the miners did, but their trout had not been caught anything like so rapidly. It had required the work of several men, up and down the bank, for hours of the previous evening and for all the time since daylight, with their imperfect tackle, to get in enough for such a war party. Nor had they cleaned or cooked it so perfectly, and the fish had been eaten without pepper or salt. There was not a plate or a fork in the band, and there was not even a wish for coffee.

It was a hasty meal, greedily devoured, and then the marauders were once more in the saddle, or riding bare-backed, as the case might be. All the while that the miners were so enthusiastically raising their stone lodge a peril they hardly thought of was pushing nearer and nearer. They knew well enough that they were in an Indian country, but were well assured that as yet no hostile red men could be aware of their arrival. It was also pretty sure that every stroke of work they did added to their security, for neither arrow nor bullet will go through a wall of quartz and granite two feet thick.

It was not many hours after the Apaches got in motion before they came to the forks of the stream, and here they halted for a general consultation. They already had well-mounted scouts ahead in both directions, and neither side had yet sent in any warning of danger discovered. They were evidently familiarly acquainted with the whole region, and there were arguments in favor of both lines of advance, but a gray-headed old warrior at last settled the question. He had been sitting quietly and listening to what others said until his turn seemed to come; but now he arose, and all seemed willing to listen. Pointing with his long, naked arm up the right fork of the river, he said, in his harsh, guttural tongue:

"Mountains. When blue-coats come, lose horses. Caught in big trap." Turning and pointing up the other fork, he said, "Mountains. Hole in mountains. Blue-coats come. Go through hole. Get away. Come back some day, when blue-coats go home sick. Ugh!"

It was not a long speech, and it could hardly be described as "eloquent," but all the wiser and more influential braves said "Ugh!" and the road to the left was decided upon without any more discussion. That also decided in advance the course to be followed by Captain Grover and his cavalry, when they in their turn should reach the same point. Hour by hour they were slowly gaining upon the dangerous horse-thieves they were pursuing, and in due time they would learn whether or not they had a right to rejoice upon catching up with them.

"Ask pale-face chief," she said.

"Ugh! Laugh. Bow and arrows good enough for boy."

He said it almost bitterly, and Na-tee-kah stamped on the ground sharply as she responded:

"Two Arrows is a young chief. Big brave. Not a boy any more. Kill grizzly. Kill cougar and big-horn. Bring back pony. Great chief soon. Give him rifle."

Two Arrows had a good enough opinion of himself, but he perfectly understood the easy good-nature with which he was treated by Yellow Pine and the rest. They regarded Sile as one bright boy and him as another, and had no idea of wasting costly rifles and such things upon him. He grew almost sullen over it, and was glad to get away from the camp when Sile came and asked him to go on a hunt with him.

This time there was a little pride as well as good sense in his positive refusal to borrow a rifle. He was determined to shoot with his own weapons or none, and he rode away with no better ones than had been used by his tribe before they had ever heard of white men, and long before gunpowder had been invented. They were pretty good weapons yet, but there was one thing Two Arrows did not dream of. That was that it was not such a great number of years since the ancestors of these very pale-faces had gone to war and to hunt with bows and arrows vastly better than any ever carried by any red Indian.

Two Arrows felt that there was a sort of fever upon him. It made him hot and restless, and his eyes wandered searchingly in all directions, longing for an opportunity to do something which would bring him nearer to the prizes he coveted. Sile also was watching keenly the tops and branches of every clump of bushes they came to, but it almost seemed as if the game had suddenly migrated. It was natural that none should linger near the smoke and smell of camp fires and cookery, but it was queer that the two young hunters should canter quietly on for mile after mile, and not so much as get a shot at a deer.

"We won't go back without something," said Sile. "I told father so. I mean to go right along. We can camp in the woods by ourselves if we don't kill anything early enough to go back to-night."

He had some trouble in making his meaning clear to Two Arrows, and the ambitious young Nez Percé was in precisely the frame of mind to agree with him. They even rode a little faster, and were hardly a ware of the distance they had travelled. Sile was beginning to grow nervous about his reputation as a hunter, and to remember that the camp had only a three days' supply of fresh meat, in spite of the fish. Suddenly Two Arrows uttered a loud, astonished "Ugh!" sprang from his pony, and beckoned Sile to do the same, leading him hurriedly toward the nearest bushes.

THE JUDGE AND PINE WENT ON WITH THEIR EXAMINATIONS.

As for Long Bear and his Nez Percés, they had a very good reason for lazily hunting and fishing around their present camp until the return of the party which had gone for the hidden lodges, and so forth. Very few Indians need anything better than an excuse for not doing anything.

Two Arrows was not one of those Indians. Na-tee-kah continually called his attention to something new which she had discovered in the ways or in the possessions of those pale-faces. She was greatly interested in a curious wire "broiler." It opened, and a fish or a steak was put in, and it shut up and was put upon the coals, and when the cooking was finished, the long handles enabled you to take it off and not burn your fingers. There were twenty other things as wonderful as the broiler; and the Judge had shown her how to wash her hands with soap, and had given her a pair of earrings, and a silver buckle for her new blanket. She hardly knew what would come next, but she entirely sympathized with her brother in his own dream when he told her what it was.

FIVE LITTLE GIRLS AT SCHOOL.

Five little girls, sitting on a form,
Five little girls, with lessons to learn;
Five little girls, who, I'm afraid, Won't know them a bit when they have to be said.

For little eyes are given to look Anywhere else than on their book;
And little thoughts are given to stray
Anywhere—ever so far away.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE CHRISTMAS CAROL.

AS many Sunday schools might be glad to use the Christmas Carol on page 61 in their Christmas celebrations, Messrs. Harper & Brothers will be pleased to furnish superintendents, free of charge, with copies for that purpose, printed on separate sheets of heavy paper.

Early application (stating the number of copies desired) is requested, as only a limited number will be printed.

OUR CHRISTMAS NUMBER.

The next number, dated December 1, will be our special Christmas number. It will consist of twenty pages, instead of the usual sixteen, but even the four additional pages will not suffice for all we should like to print in it, so we shall omit the serial story and the Post-office Box from that number.

Now let us see what there will be to make up for the omission: First, a story by John R. Coryell, called "Little Miss Santa Claus," with two illustrations by Frederic Diekmann; a story by William O. Stoddard, entitled "Christmas on the North Fork," with two illustrations by C. D. Weldon; an old-fashioned fairy tale, "How Boots Rode on the King," by Howard Pyle, with six illustrations by the author.

The principal illustration will be a full-page engraving of a Christmas subject, accompanied by a poem.

What will perhaps attract the most attention is a comic operetta, entitled "Three Little Kittens," by H. C. Banner, the well-known poet, dramatist and humorous writer. It is founded on the familiar rhyme of the "three little kittens" who "lost their mittens," but the treatment of the subject is entirely novel and exceedingly amusing; the dialogue sparkles with wit and humor, and, moreover, the operetta is written in such a manner that it can be performed by any sufficient company of bright young people with tuneful voices and an ear for music.

HIDHOLES, NEW YORK.

Here in Central New York is a place of more than local notoriety, and although not in Italy, it is sometimes styled the second Turpeian. It is a gap in the hills through which flows a rapid stream, which has seen that in a tributary of the Chenango at Messengersville, on the Syracuse, Binghamton and New York Railroad. About one mile from its mouth, the well-known poet, dramatist and humorous writer. It is founded on the familiar rhyme of the "three little kittens" who "lost their mittens," but the treatment of the subject is entirely novel and exceedingly amusing; the dialogue sparkles with wit and humor, and, moreover, the operetta is written in such a manner that it can be performed by any sufficient company of bright young people with tuneful voices and an ear for music.

One day in the last part of September we took a little excursion to this romantic gorge with some literary friends, among them the Misses T., whom we call our Alice and Phoebe Gray. The day was all that could be desired. The trees were just changing to the beautiful hues of autumn; the squaws were as red as blood, the soft maples were like flames of fire, and the oaks in the different shades, from pink and drab to the deepest maroon and red. The sides of the roads were lined with wild flowers, and among we gathered balsams, ferns, golden rod, etc., to our hearts' content. We passed over the high ground near the Falls and looked down the river; there we stopped and looked around. We could see the Highlands over in Chenango County, and the mountains south of the Susquehanna. From there we passed a little way to a place that none of us dared ride except the driver, into Grately Hollow, the place where men first learned to pig slaw, because they could not straighten their arms out to sew them—so an old man told us. There we found the rock and stump, climbed up the path, the oaks climbed, and had our picnic lunch on the green grass beside this famous stump, which although showing considerably the effects of time, is hardly less than half a century old. On our return we came through Virgil, and visited the quiet country church-yard and saw the grave and monument of Hannah Troubridge Bloomer. As we stood there I could not help thinking of the changes which sixty years more will bring about.

WILLIE M. M.

Willie's description of the beautiful gorge is well written. Its legend is quite romantic.

"THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER" AND ITS AUTHOR.

The Right Rev. B. Wistar Morris, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Oregon, writes as follows:

"Will you allow me an additional word to the interesting article on Francis Scott Key, the author of 'The Star-Spangled Banner'?"

"The article says that Mr. Key is famous for just one thing. I would like to add that if he is not famous for other things, he is certainly well known to many as the author of a hymn that will be as undying ever as 'The Star-Spangled Banner.' The first verse of this hymn will surely recall it to many of your readers:

"...Lord, with glowing heart I'll praise Thee
For the bliss Thy love bestows,
Sweet the promise of Thy grace,
And the peace that Thine it flows.
Help, O God, my weak endeavor,
This dull soul to warm and raise;
Thou must light the flame, or never Can my love be warmed to praise."

"This hymn is the 45th in the Hymnal of the Protestant Episcopal Church—of which Mr. Key was a member, and found in our church collections. Mr. Key is also the author of another hymn in the same collection—the 36th, for National Festivals, 'Before the Lord we bow before.' It has a true and the same poet's sentiments that are found in 'The Star-Spangled Banner.'"

"It is well that our young people should know that Mr. Key was the author of the hymn that he was also a devout and earnest Christian man."

OHANES, CALIFORNIA.

About six miles from here is a place called the Millette, consisting of immense rocks, which almost form a natural bridge across a narrow stream. When it rises to a great height in the winter, but goes almost dry during the summer. About eight miles farther we come to a small town called the Millette, where there is a store, a hotel, a saloon, and a half-dozen houses. The only point of interest about this place is the Chinese garden and orchard, which look pretty and pleasing to the eye. A way to the west rise the lofty peaks of the Coast Range Mountains, which one never tires of gazing on. On every side rise ranges of hills, obscuring our view of the surrounding country.

SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy nine years old. My sister has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me, and she likes it very much, and she likes me as much as she does. I want to write to you, because you seem so kind. My papa is a doctor, and I have lots of rides with him when he goes to make his visits. I have a big dog, and a cat, and a rabbit, and nearly ten years old, and a dear little sister, and a dear mamma, who studies at home for dear mamma. I go to the State Normal School, and am in the training department, and she is in the kindergarten department. One of our dear pupil teachers died last night. We have four horses in our stable, and their names are Kittle, Don, Uno, and Ino. We have a parrot that is no bad words, but is a very good boy. I have had such a nice little boy to visit me. His name is Waldo. He is only five years old, but he told me he lives near Fresno. His papa is a sea-captain. Waldo is only eight years old, and he has been all around the world; was a while in China and Japan, and he told me he had been to London. I was going to tell you about some other things, but I am afraid that my letter will be too long, and so I do not want to tell you; so I will say good-by.

CHARLIE.

Write again, dear boy.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I WROTE ONCE to you, and as my letter was published, I thought I would write again. I have a very dear mother, and a dear father, and in honor of the day I was presented with many tokens of love from my friends. I am in the graduating class of School No. 26, of Brooklyn. I study French, Latin, and English, as I take music lessons, and have only limited time to study and practice. I expect to graduate in June, and then I shall attend the New York Conservatory of Music, where I expect to pursue my musical education.

I have seven correspondents, four of whom were obtained through your paper. I have asked my four music correspondents to write to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and see who would be so fortunate as to first see their letter in print. They are Margie A. and Eva L., in Minnesota, and Florence S. and Cherry E., in California.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is kindly presented to me every week, and I like it very much. I have read Nellie Mason's letter, and I thought it splendid. I sent her a few pieces of silk, which I hope she will use in her crazy quilt, and through the Post-office Box I send her my love, and hope that she may receive many interesting letters, which will help to cheer her during her hours of suffering.

I have a great many numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which I would like to send to some children's institution. Can you tell me, dear postmistress, where they would be appreciated?

I hope this is not too long for a little place in the Post-office Box, but with love to yourself and to all the dear children, I am, my dear friend, your affectionate admirer, GEORGE W. R.

Send your papers to the Home for Destitute Children, in Brooklyn. They will be gladly received. If you have a complete volume, why not have it bound, so that the children may keep it in their library?

NEW YORK CITY.

I have four pets. They are all little fishes; one silver and three gold ones. I have had them since they were very small. They are about three inches long, and now they are about six inches long. I feed them with Shepard's prepared fish food. I give them fresh water every other day, and I take good care of them. They are healthy, just as fat as they can be, and very lively. They are quite tame, and when I put my hand in the water, they will come up to me as fast as they can, as if they enjoyed it very much. I will be eleven years old the 15th of February, 1888, and I am going to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE next year.

HARRY C.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

I am ten years old, and study geography, spelling, reading, grammar, and drawing. I have a doll, and a dog, and a cat, and a rabbit. Do you think I am too old to play with dolls?

Your little friend,

MINNIE C. L.

No, darling; play with dolls as long as you enjoy them.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

My brother Eddie reads me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every night, which he borrows from a boy whose name is Charles B. My birthday will come every second, and I love the subject. I will be eight years old, and one of the presents from my brother Eddie is that he will take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE two years for me.

HARRY M.

BERKLEY, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, drawing, geography, and arithmetic. I had a little dog, and a cat, and a rabbit, and a doll, but I love it so cold. I like flowers very much; do you? I have no pets, but I have three dolls and a doll's house, and many things. I had a letter from you long ago, but I should name them all. I went to the country last Monday, and staid till Wednesday. I like to see the leaves were all different colors. I think autumn is a beautiful time to go to the country. MAMIE L.

SASKATCHEWAN, CANADA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have not had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, but have never written to the Post-office Box before. I am a little boy ten years old, and have a brother eleven and a sister fifteen. My mother plays on the piano. My papa is a doctor. My favorite stories are "Raising the Pearl," "The Ice Queen," and "Two Ravens." I study much interest in "Two Ravens." I study grammar, geography, arithmetic, and the Fourth Reader. FABER C. D.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly a year, and when I have my papers I intend to get them bound. Of all the stories I like to read the charming book like "Robt House" the best. My pets are a dog and a bird. Mamma has three birds. I am a little girl twelve years old, and my name is MRS. C. E.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a boy ten years old, and I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a little over a year. I like it very much. I have a brother and sister. My mother's name is Luin and my father's name is Robt. We have a private teacher, and I study philosophy, spelling, geography, definitions, Roman history, and arithmetic. We have two pets, a cat named Thomas, and a turtle that lives in our back yard all by himself. I like to read the charming book like "Robt House" the best. My pets are a dog and a bird. Mamma has three birds. I am a little girl twelve years old, and my name is MRS. C. E.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I want to tell the dear Postmistress how much I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. It is almost like a dear friend to me, whose coming I look for every Tuesday morning, and if it does not come, I go to school, and get my lessons, and then I go home when I get home. I have a dear little bird, a canary, and he always sang so sweetly until last July, when he began moult, and he was dropping his feathers ever since. I have been at the Novelties Exhibition in this city, and like it, though I was rather disappointed in it. I enjoy the concert very much, and the dissolving views decidedly nice; that is, having the music to suit the pictures. I always did love music.

Do you give my bird the right kind of food? He ought not to be moulted so long. The yolk of a hard-boiled egg, crumbled finely, is good for him. My bird, which had not sung for two years, has begun singing beautifully again. As he kept drooping and pining, and I could not help him, I sent him off to board at a bird store for some weeks, and he came home very much improved.

ANGOLA, INDIANA.

We are two friends and school-mates. We take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. We think "The Ice Queen," "Nan," "Robt House," and "Wakulla." Brown's funny stories, and wish he would write often. We attend the same school, and are in the Grammar Department. One of us studies music, and the other painting. We would like to correspond with some girl in Europe of about our own age. We think our names are not very good. I am Fessie B., as she is nearly sixteen, and we are only twelve. One of us has written to you before. GERTIE B. and ANNA W.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, September 10, 1885.

Can you tell me when and how HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE came to be started? I think it is a grand book. I think some of the children who take an interest in it may like to know something about it. I am seven years old. I have never lived here five years. I have visited a great many places. One summer mamma took me with her to the Hot Lakes, which is a great many miles from the lake. There are great many hot lakes in the water. There are boiling springs near their wharves, which they use for cooking their potatoes. I must tell you that "wharves" means a but or house, and the Maoris make their doors so low that they have to go in on all fours, just like dogs. I will tell you more about New Zealand another time. Yours truly, FRANK MONTAGUE M.

For a young gentleman only seven, you have been quite a traveller, and I shall be glad to hear from you again. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was begun this children at my home, and the world might enjoy it, and this is its seventh volume. It is about as old as Frank.

HAWTHORN HALL SCHOOL, WILMOT.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am writing this from my school, Hawthorn Hall. We write letters every Saturday, and I thought I would like to write to you, as I have never written before, and we have a private teacher. My school is a very long time. My school is a very old place, built in 1600, and has oak-panelled rooms and a carved staircase like wood. There are many old pictures under the ground, the extent of which you do not know. There are some fine old chest-nuts, called the grandfather and Seven Sisters. I study grammar, history, geography, arithmetic, French, Latin, and music, and I am ten years old. I should like to see this print.

THE RICHMOND M.

I presume your school is at Wiltshire, Cheshire, England, though you do not say so.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—My father is one of the editors of the New York Times. My mother is dead, and I am the only child. I have been taken to the New York Times for one month, and like the short stories in it very much. Now I must say good-by.

Who is this little correspondent? I do not like to have my children on the No Name list.

VENICE, ITALY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I wrote to you before from Geneva, and my letter was published, so I thought I would try again. I am an American, twelve years old, and though I do not like to travel, I am very fond of Venice, where we have been for about a week. The great square of St. Marco is the largest in the world. The bridge of Rialto, and the Doge's Palace, which is very interesting indeed. The Bridge of Sighs and all the dungeons below it are dreadful; they are not to be seen, and the dungeons had only rocks and iron bars. When Napoleon was here he did a great deal of harm, and the guides are all the time telling us of different things which he carried away. The lion is the coat of arms of Venice, as I suppose you know, and there is a great lion on the top of the St. Marco. The lion on the top, and long ago he used to have a most beautiful pair of diamond eyes, but when Napoleon came he carried off the lion to Paris, and with two glass-eyes. I think it was most shabby. At St. Moritz, where we staid, it snowed in September, and all about the mountains were very pretty. At Innsbruck there was a most beautiful church that had been put up in Maximilian's time, and it was when the emperor was in the church is a great slab of marble, and in it are cut twenty-four pictures representing different periods of Maximilian's life. All the pictures are life-size figures of his different ancestors; they are made in bronze, and are very beautiful, especially one of Arthur, King of Britain, who is said to spend the winter in Rome, and shall not go home until next spring. We get HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from England, and it is a grand book. I like to have it. I like this letter is not too long, and that you can find room to print it. L. S. B.

P.S.—My little brother wants me to write for him.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy four years old. I am an American, and I wish I could write to you, but I don't like it here, but I will try to print this. HAROLD.

When you both come home it will be very pleasant to think of all you have seen in foreign lands. Many American children would be very glad could they visit Venice.

DUBLIN, IRELAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have written to you once before, but I did not tell you anything about Dublin. It is a fine city, and has two very fine cathedrals. There are a large number of fine statues and monuments, one called "Nelson's Pillar," is a very high column with a statue of Nelson on the top; there is a staircase inside, and you can go to the top. There is a very large and you can see the city from the top. There is a church in Dublin, called the Phoenix, in which two murlers took place a few years ago. I like the English towns better than the Irish ones, and I have a few puzzles. Have you ever been in Ireland? S. CHARLES H. R.

SARASOTA, LOUISIANA.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I would like to ask you if you have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for the past year, and we like it so much. We read all the stories every week. I am a girl only eight years old, and I like to read the charming book like "Robt House" the best. My mother, my father, and my brother, and I are ten years old. He goes to school, but it takes a long time to get to school. Mamma, papa, brother, and myself spent last summer at the grand-uncle White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, and we did have a grand good time. We took dancing lessons, mountain walks, and played ten-pins every day. Mamma is a Congregational, and we spend our money in buying books. I must write a little to the New York this winter; if so, I would be glad to see you and to tell you how much we do like the paper.

Your loving little reader, ETHEL B.

I should be glad to see Ethel.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little girl ten years of age. I go to a school, and study German. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as a reader in our school, and I think it is very interesting. My mamma did when I was six years old. She left my little brother and myself and papa, and we live with my aunt, who has two little boys; one is a baby. My little brother is five years old. I like to go to school, and besides German I study reading, spelling, writing, geography, arithmetic, and drawing. MABEL T. B.

CORPUSCOPUS, NEW YORK.

I have been much interested in the letters from St. Augustine. They pleased me very much. Chittanooga is a place of about one thousand inhabitants. The scenery is quite romantic. I am taking music lessons, and am very fond of the study. DAVIS M.

LITTLE P.: You were very fortunate the day you went fishing, and no doubt you enjoyed your supper.—Maud G.: I would like to see your pretty dolls.—Emma J. T.: My thanks, dear, for the bright maple leaves so nicely pressed.—Welle Maud V.: You write very well indeed. I regret that there is not room for your letter, but I enjoyed reading it.—A. Pretman, a little invalid, residing at 750 Madison Avenue, Baltimore, Maryland, writes that owing to the kindness of readers of the Post-office Box, she has finished her elegant quilt, and these little girls will send her hand-painted squares of silk or satin, she will return something pretty, as she wishes to make a table-cover.—Willie B. McC.: Thanks for your letter.

PLANNING A CAMPAIGN.

(The day before Christmas.) "Mamma, please cut my hair off, so when Santa Claus sees my head sticking out of bed he won't take me for a little girl, and put dollies and beads in my stocking, 'cause I want a gun and a drum."

HOW WE GOT THE BEAR.

ONCE when hunting in Nova Scotia we found a cleft among the rocks which showed so many signs of a bear that the Indian with me cut a pole and went to probing. Sure enough something soft could be felt, and when the stick was withdrawn a bear's hairs were clinging to it. John poked and punched again, but to no purpose. The brute wouldn't come out where we could see him, nor even utter a growl. So I took position in front of the hole and fired directly along the stick. That caused a commotion, but no noise, and a more vigorous stirring up with a still bigger pole failed to ront Bruin out. Peering down the crevice, I could distinctly see the fiery eyes, and I let fly squarely at them. The row inside was tremendous for a moment, and then all became quiet. Apparently the bear was done for.

But how were we to get him out? Here Indian John came to the front with the ingenuity of woodcraft. He sat down, and quickly split at the end the sticks he had used in poking at the bear. Each of us then thrust one of these down the hole, and when we felt Bruin's body we pressed the split end into the far, and twisted in opposite directions until we could twist no longer. Then pulling slowly and steadily together, we brought the shaggy body to the surface, and found it that of a two-year-old bear, very fat and handsome. One bullet had gone through his brain and the other through his body.

A SONG.

BY ERNEST WHITNEY.

SCATTER in spring-time a handful of seeds,
And gather in summer a lapful of flowers;
This is the song of the birds in the bowers,
This is the song of the wind in the reeds.

Down by the road-side and over the meads,
Under the sunshine and under the showers,
Scatter in spring-time a handful of seeds,
And gather in summer a lapful of flowers.

Scatter in childhood kind words and deeds,
Scatter them everywhere through all the hours;
Whether sky brightens or whether cloud lowers,
Their blossoms shall come to thee ere summer speeds.
Scatter in spring-time a handful of seeds,
And gather in summer a lapful of flowers.

"CAROL, CHRISTIANS, CAROL!" ILLUSTRATED BY FREDERICK DREISSEL.

LITTLE MISS SANTA CLAUS.

BY JOHN R. COREYELL.

WHAT a night it is! So clear and crisp and bracing! A genuine December night before Christmas, when the main streets of a great city are flooded with light and thronged with busy bustling crowds of people, and when the side streets are given over to gloom and silence, when everybody is laden with bundles, and when every heart is throving off its cares.

Every heart? Why, look at that lad standing in the hot cabin of the ferry-boat. If his face tells the truth, his heart is taking on new cares every moment. What can draw down the lines on that resolute young face? Is he hungry? No doubt. His thin, pale cheeks say so. Is he cold? Not in that hot cabin; but he wears no overcoat, and his jacket has not fitted him these two years.

Ah, then! Hunger and cold are spoiling his Christmas. Hunger and cold! Food and clothes? No, no; be sure that such things never would push down his boyish heart, and bring into his face that care-worn, desperately anxious expression.

See! The ferry-boat has crunched its way into the ice-packed slip. The lad throws open the cabin door, shudders as the cold air strikes him, and darts out into the open street.

Not up the hill to bark in the delights of the joyous crowds and glittering store windows, but off to the left, in the narrow streets where the cold is colder and the darkness darker than anywhere else.

He never looks up nor checks his shuffling run until he is in front of a rickety little wooden house mercifully propped up between two tall tenement-houses.

There the boy stopped, hesitated a moment, swallowed hard, closed his lips more firmly, opened the gate, went to the door, knocked, and entered.

A withered little man sat at the head of the table, and a motherly little girl opposite the little man, and between them Ruth—big-eyed Ruth; bigger-eyed than ever at sight of the boy.

"Come in, Robert; come in," said the little man.

"No, thank you," answered Robert, crushing his old hat in his hands and looking at the floor. "I've come—I've come about the rent. Have you seen Mr. Allison? Will he give us the time?"

"Sit down, Robert; sit down."

"Will he, Mr. Potts?—will he?" demanded Robert.

"Why, Robert—please sit down, Robert."

Robert repeated his question impatiently.

"Will he? Tell me."

"Well, Robert, I saw him this morning—now don't be cast down—and he said he must have the money, or— Do sit down with us, Robert."

"Or we must go?"

Mr. Potts nodded his head.

"And we must move?—my mother move out into the cold streets? My mother—blind—sick? Oh, Mr. Potts, will he be so cruel? Oh, mother! mother!"

The door closed behind the despairing boy, and he went shivering off into the darkness.

"Poor Robert!" ejaculated little Mr. Potts.

"But, papa," said Katie, with a touch of horror in her voice, "Mr. Allison won't do it, will he?"

"I'm afraid he will, dear."

"Papa," said Katie, the next morning, "suppose we didn't have any Christmas presents, couldn't we get the money for Mrs. Carrol's rent?"

"Couldn't do it, Katie," said the little man, despondently. "I wish you could, my dear, but I don't see how you can. Good-by. I must be off now to collect the weekly rents. Won't be home till late to-night."

Katie, like her father, was little, energetic, and brisk, and the way she tied a gingham apron around her waist, rolled up her sleeves, and cleared the table was a marvel. Ruth was little too, as, of course, she ought to be, being only five years old; that is, she was short, but, dear me! she was very wide, and not a bit brisk. She was very deliberate, in fact.

Suddenly Katie asked Ruth this remarkable question, "How would you like to sleep on the cold sidewalk?" And then, before Ruth could make up her mind, she continued, "Because that is what blind Mrs. Carrol will have to do if we don't get fifteen dollars for her."

"Yes," went on Katie, "and I think maybe I can get the money. I don't know how papa will like it, but I only just thought of it, and I don't see how I can wait to tell him. Could you sing that Christmas carol with me, Ruthy?"

"Tourse I tan."

Sing it? Why, she was just aching for the next day to come, when she was to sing it in church.

"Yes; but could you sing it if there were a lot, a whole big lot, of strange people around?"

"Of course."

"Yes, but," persisted Katie, "suppose it was on a ferry-boat; could you sing it then?"

"I ain't a-doin' to sin' it on a felly-boat," answered Ruth.

"Yes, but, Ruthy, you don't understand. I think maybe if you and I were to put on our good clothes and go sing our Christmas Carol on the ferry-boat, we could get money enough from the people to pay Mrs. Carrol's rent."

"Will dey div it to us?"

"I don't know, but I hope so, though fifteen dollars is a great deal. Do you think you could sing the Christmas Carol on the ferry-boat, Ruthy? They would all be strangers, you know," said Katie, who felt so nervous about it herself that she could not believe Ruth understood just what she meant. "You see, we will wait till the boat leaves the New York side. Then we will sing, and then we will go around and collect the money the people will give us."

"Yes," responded Ruth, "on a dreem pie plate."

"On a what?" demanded Katie.

"On a dreem pie plate, same as dey has in church."

"Oh!" exclaimed Katie; "I was going to take a tin cup."

"I fink a dreem pie plate would be nicerest," said Ruth, positively. So Katie yielded.

It was just growing dusk that afternoon when a little girl and a very little girl walked into the front cabin of a Fulton Ferry boat on the New York side, and sat demurely down. At least the little girl sat down, the very little girl stood upon the seat to look out of the window, but seeing only the boards on the side of the ferry slip, turned complacently around and stared composedly out of two very big eyes at the people who came in.

"Is it time yet, Katie?" asked the very little girl, in a loud whisper.

"Sh!—no," said Katie.

"Don't squeegee my hand so hard," said the very little girl, in another loud whisper; whereupon Katie grew very red, and dropped the hand.

Pretty soon the seats were all filled, and a few persons were standing up.

"S'all I bedin?" came in the usual loud whisper from the very little girl.

"Sh! Ruthy, no," answered Katie, nervously.

"But de boat's a-doin', Katie."

Ruth's loud whispers had called everybody's attention to the two little girls, and everybody was smiling.

"Tatie, de boat's a-doin', I tell you," whispered Ruth again. "S'all I bedin?"

"Yes," said Katie, desperately. And hardly were the words out of her mouth when, to the astonishment of the passengers, Ruth fixed her big eyes on a fat man opposite to her, and at the top of her shrill little voice burst forth,

"Carol, Christians, carol—carol joyfully."

Then she suddenly stopped, and turned to Katie, who had not yet found courage to open her lips.

"Why don't you tum on, Tatie?" and then began anew, this time with the abashed Katie joining her in a very weak voice.

As the beautiful little hymn progressed, Katie recovered courage, and sang as heartily as Ruth herself. The passengers in the mean time looked very much surprised, for singing is not allowed on the ferry-boats; but it was not in human nature to hear two sweet childish voices in an old familiar hymn the day before Christmas without being interested and even touched.

When the carol was finished, Ruth, with a very business-like air, produced her "dreen pie plate" from under her cloak, jumped down from her seat, and presented the plate to a gentleman nearest her.

He fumbled in his pocket, and drew forth five cents, which she smilingly put on the plate.

"How much is dat?" demanded Ruth of Katie.

A smile swept around the cabin.

"Sh! five cents," replied Katie, flushing.

But Ruth had her own idea of what to do, and would not budge.

"Dat ain't enough," she said to the gentleman. "We wants fifteen dollars, an' five cents ain't noffin'."

"Fifteen dollars!" said the gentleman, good-naturedly. "What do you want with so much money?"

"Oh!" exclaimed Ruth, perfectly willing to take anybody into her confidence, "we wants it for a blind woman what will have to sleep on de told sidewalk—won't she, Tatie?—if we don't pay—don't pay what, Tatie?"

"Her rent," said Katie, faintly.

"Es, her rent; an' we wants fifteen dollars, please," concluded Ruth, with the calm air of expecting her questioner to give it to her.

"Oh, if that's the case," said the gentleman, laughing, "and seeing to-morrow's Christmas, here's my share of the fifteen dollars." And he put fifty cents into the plate.

"Is dat enough?" inquired Ruth of Katie.

"Yes, dear," answered Katie, ready to sink through the floor in her confusion. "Go on, Ruthy."

But there was no need to "go on." The whole cabinful of passengers had been amused and interested listeners and spectators of the scene, and only needed an invitation of the right kind to make them go to the "dreen pie plate." Up jumped the fat man upon whom Ruth had fixed her eyes when singing.

"Here's another fifty cents for little Miss Santa Claus," he cried, and dropped the silver coin in the plate.

Then a rush was made for the two little girls, and amid laughing exclamations of "For little Miss Santa Claus!" quarters and half-dollars rattled like hail on the plate.

Katie was so much excited, even after she had reached the ferry house and was counting the money, that it was no wonder she had not noticed a tall man who had followed her and Ruth off the boat, and was now watching them.

"Fifteen dollars and sixty-five cents," said Katie, after she had counted the money for the third time. "Ain't that splendid? I'll put the fifteen dollars in this bag," producing a canvas bag used by her father when he was collecting money, "and we'll take it to Mrs. Carrol right away. But what shall we do with the sixty-five cents, Ruthy?"

"Det some taffy?" suggested Ruth.

"Mrs. Carrol won't care for taffy," said Katie. "Suppose we buy her a turkey for her Christmas dinner? You may carry the bag of money," said Katie, generously, "because you are little Miss Santa Claus, you know; and I'll take the sixty-five cents and buy the turkey."

Behind them silently followed the tall man, muttering all the while softly under his breath.

"An easy way to get fifteen dollars," he said. "Such little girls, too! Nobody will know I did it."

Katie and Ruth had turned into the dark side streets, and were just nearing one of the loneliest and gloomiest spots, when the tall man quickened his pace, and was nearly able to touch Ruth with his unwholesome hand, when Katie dragged her suddenly across the way, and hurried to a butcher's shop in the middle of the block.

The man uttered an exclamation of surprise, and stole after the unconscious little girls and watched them stealthily through the butcher's window.

"I didn't know turkeys cost so much," said Katie, as she came out of the shop. "Anyhow, a chicken, even if it is only a little one, is better than nothing."

Ruth was too cold to make any answer, but she trotted along by Katie's side as they hurried to Mrs. Carrol's.

"I can catch 'em again," muttered the tall man.

But Katie had made good use of the time, and was a block ahead of her pursuer; though if she had known he was following her she would have gone more quickly still.

The tall man broke into a trot, and was almost in sight of the two little figures, when his foot slipped on a slide, and down he dropped with a painful thud.

"Ugh!" he grunted, and put his hand out to help himself up. "Ah! what's this?" he exclaimed, holding up a heavy canvas bag. "The very bag with the fifteen dollars! I guess I don't need to follow them any more."

Katie and Ruth meanwhile—Ruth had not discovered her loss, her little hands were so cold—had made their way to the tenement-house where Mrs. Carrol lived, and had climbed the stairs to the door of her room.

"Is Robert home?" asked Katie, as she stepped into the cheerless room at Mrs. Carrol's bidding.

"No. Who is it wants him?" asked the blind woman. "We don't want him at all," answered Katie, half-laughingly. "We only want you."

"Me! And what do you want with me?"

"I want to introduce little Miss Santa Claus."

"Little Miss Santa Claus!" exclaimed the blind woman.

"Yes, ma'am. Tell her about it, Ruthy."

Then Ruth's lower lip began to quiver, much to Katie's astonishment, and big tears began to roll down her round cheeks, as she sobbed forth, "I—don't—want—de—de—poor blin'—blin' lady—to sleep—on—de told—told sidewalk; but—but—I lost it."

"Wha—at?" gasped Katie.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Mrs. Carrol. "What does she mean? What is the matter?"

"Lost it!" cried Katie. "Let's go look for it—quick." And taking Ruth by the hand, she hurried down stairs.

"Well! I declare! What funny children?" was Mrs. Carrol's remark when she was so suddenly left alone.

She was still wondering what her odd little visitors could mean, when her quick ear caught the sound of a familiar footstep in the hall.

"Robert," she said, after her son had kissed her, "did you meet two little girls just now?"

"Two little girls? No, ma'am."

"Well, two little girls were here." And Mrs. Carrol told her son what had taken place.

Robert's heart was too heavy for him to wonder who the children were or how they knew his trouble. He had kept from his mother all knowledge of the misfortune that was upon him, because he wished to save her from worry.

Still she must know soon, and he thought this as good a time as any. He told her, then, as hopefully as he could, of the dismal prospect before them. He had hardly finished when there came a quick rap at the door.

The door opened, and a rosy-checked butcher boy walked in, laid a turkey on the table, and said, "From little Miss Santa Claus," and walked out.

Rap, rap, rap again.

A boy threw a bundle on the table, saying, "From little Miss Santa Claus," and was off again like a flash.

The bundle was marked "Robert Carrol" from little Miss Santa Claus," and contained an overcoat.

Rap, rap, rap again.

In darted little Mr. Potts, looking very wild and excited.

“WHY, ROBERT—PLEASE SIT DOWN, ROBERT!”

“My Katie and Ruth here?” he gasped.

“No,” answered Robert. “Why?”

“Oh, my!” groaned little Mr. Potts, rushing out.

“Well!” exclaimed Robert.

“I declare!” said his mother.

“Oh!” shouted little Mr. Potts, suddenly darting into the room again, and throwing a parcel angrily on the table. “I’m sorry, but I can’t help it.”

“Well,” said Robert, as he read from the package. “From little Miss Santa Claus to Mrs. Carrol.” Then opening the package, he cried, “A receipt for two months’ rent, signed by Mr. Allison, and fifteen one-dollar bills. Why, mother, who can this little Miss Santa Claus be?”

Rap, rap, rap.

In popped the head of excited, breathless Mr. Potts.

“Have they been here yet?” he demanded.

“I think they have, Mr. Potts,” replied Mrs. Carrol.

“Oh, have they?” he said, with a sigh of relief, as he closed the door; “and where have they gone?”

Rap, rap, rap. Robert opened the door this time, determined to capture whoever should enter.

“Why, here they are now!” he exclaimed, as the two little girls stood mournfully in the doorway.

“Papa here!” exclaimed Katie.

“Oh, papa!” cried Ruth.

“That’s little Miss Santa Claus!” said Mrs. Carrol.

“Little Miss Santa Claus!” cried Robert and Mr. Potts in a breath.

“I see, I see,” suddenly shouted little Mr. Potts, jumping up and spreading out the paper in which the parcels had been wrapped. “They are all in Mr. Allison’s writing. See! see! I thought he was a brute, and I told him so, too,” groaned the little man. “But you see he came tearing into my house and thumped a bag of money on the table.”

“That settles you,” said he; “you may take that, and bring me your accounts to-morrow. And that,” said he, throwing down this parcel, “settles those Carrols. Give it to them, and say they must pay in full or get out to-morrow. Those young ones of yours are there now. You’d better go get them. They’ve been singing for money on the ferry-boat, and telling everybody about a cruel landlord who turns blind women out to sleep on the cold sidewalk—the little imps.”

“Imp yourself, sir,” said I, mad as a hornet, “and, what’s more, you’re a brute.” And, oh dear! to think he was only joking all the time! Isn’t he a blessed good man, Robert?—eh, Mrs. Carrol? My precious Ruthy, and so you lost the money, and he found it! You dear Katie! Little Miss Santa Claus, eh, Ruthy!”

Perhaps they did not have a jolly Christmas dinner at the little house the next day, and perhaps little Miss Santa Claus and her sister did not sing “Carol, Christians, carol,” with tremendous spirit, and perhaps a tall gray-haired man did not sit in one of the back pews in the church, and drop a tear or two as he caught the voice of that same little Miss Santa Claus piping high above the others!

AN OPERETTA.—By H. C. Bunner.

CHARACTERS.

KING THOMAS THE FIRST, King of the Land of Pie, and head of the House of Grimaldin.

RINGTAIL, his Lord High Chamberlain.

KITCAT, the Court Jester.

PRINCE TORTOISESHELL of Caterwaulia, Princes of neighbor Kingdoms, be-

PRINCE SPOT of Bawlingberia, } trothed to the three Princesses.

PRINCESS VELVET of Misowwa, }

PRINCESS KITTY, the Princess Royal, daughter of King Thomas.

PRINCESS MALTA, }

PRINCESS ANGORA, } Her sisters.

Courtiers and Ladies-in-waiting.

SCENE: The Royal Palace of the Land of Pie.

Time.—Once upon a time.

ACT I.

A room in the Royal Palace. The King's throne at the back. A lounge on the right-hand side of the room. Princess Kitty is lying on the lounge; Princess Malta and Princess Angora are sitting on low stools, one at the head of the lounge and one at the foot. They rise quickly as the chorus of Courtiers and Ladies-in-waiting enters at the back of the stage. Every one in the chorus carries a pie. They enter singing.

CHORUS.*

This is the land of Pie, the land of peace and quiet.
We live a little high, for pie is all our diet.
The duty of a man we hold, beyond all question,
To eat the most he can, and not get indigestion.
Our pies are made of mince, of apple, peach, and cherry,
Of lemon, currant, quince, and cran and huckle-berry.
We honor men of mark with merit pies of custard;
For those whose lives are dark we make a pie of mustard.

(Enter, at back, Ringtail and Kitcat.)

RINGTAIL (to the Princesses). Your Royal Highnesses, I shall now have the pleasure of exhibiting to you the Treasury Pie, which contains the treasures of the royal family.

(Enter, at back, four Courtiers, bearing the huge Treasury Pie. It is full of gold and jewels, which burst out through the crust in various places.)

Song.—RINGTAIL.

I'm a Chamberlain lofty and stern and severe,
And a Treasurer also am I,
And my regular task at the end of the year
Is to make up the Treasury Pie.

CHORUS.

And his regular task at the end of the year
Is to make up the Treasury Pie.

RINGTAIL (checking off on his fingers).

Take a pound of fresh rubies, a gallon of gold,
With pearls heap a quart measure high,
A handful of opals and diamonds cold,
To make up the Treasury Pie.

CHORUS.

A handful of opals and diamonds cold,
To make up the Treasury Pie.

RINGTAIL.

Our three little Princesses soon
Will be wed.

To Princess who live very high,
And each shall receive—so King Thomas has said—
A slice of the Treasury Pie.

CHORUS.

And each shall receive—so King Thomas has said—
A slice of the Treasury Pie.

RINGTAIL (to the Princesses).

A person who hints is the meanest of men;
'Tis a trick that I never would try;
But when you are married, oh, recollect then
That I made you that Treasury Pie.

CHORUS.

A person who hints is the meanest of men;
'Tis a trick that he never would try.

RINGTAIL. There, young ladies, you behold the Treasury Pie; pastry, but no paste.

THE THREE PRINCESSSES (all together). Oh, how beautiful! Ringtail (flattered). Well, I thought it was rather a neat little pun when I made it.

THE PRINCESSSES (all together). We don't mean the pun; we mean the Pie.

RINGTAIL (disgusted). Oh, the Pie! (To the Courtiers.) Take the Pie away, please.

(The Courtiers and Ladies-in-waiting all go out at the back, singing first stanza of opening chorus. Ringtail and the Princesses are left on the stage.)

KITTY. Yes, it is always the same thing, my Lord Chamberlain; you show us the Pie, and then you take it away from us (throwing herself on the lounge). Oh dear me! I am sixteen years old to-day, and I am firmly convinced that the world is a hollow mockery.

MALTA. Yes, one does get such ideas as one grows older.

ANGORA. How very hollow the world must seem to you, Lord Ringtail!

RINGTAIL. Young ladies, I can not approve of this sort of talk. Your royal father would be deeply grieved if he heard you. Are you not to be married to three estimable young Princes? Ought not that to make you happy?

ANGORA. It ought to, but it doesn't.

KITTY. You never can tell anything about matrimony.

RINGTAIL (to Kitty). Prince Tortoisehell, who is to marry you, is a charming young man. Of course—well—I might say—

KITTY (starting up from the lounge). Yes, you are quite right, I agree with you entirely. He is unbearable. He is too good, too brave, too handsome, too generous, too everything. He's too good to live.

RINGTAIL (to Malta). And Prince Spot, whom you are to marry, is an excellent young man, although—perhaps—his father—

MALTA. I knew you would think so. And it's quite true. He's so lively and vivacious and frivolous and full of fun that he makes my life perfectly gloomy.

RINGTAIL (to Angora). And your Prince Velvet—

ANGORA. Yes, that's just it. How you do see things, Lord Chamberlain! He's quiet and nice and dignified and polite, and I hate people who are quiet and nice and dignified and polite. I do wish electricity was invented now. I'd like to give him a shock and wake him up. B E E E E!

RINGTAIL (aside). Thus do I sow the seeds of discord in the fair young minds. They will discard their lovers, and I shall have the Treasury Pie for my own—but ha! my own! I'm—He dies, good morning.

KITTY. There is no mistake about it, we are the most unhappy girls in the whole world.

MALTA and ANGORA (aside). We are young, we are. So young, so beautiful, and so unhappy! (They sleep.)

* The selection of tunes to which the songs shall be sung is left to the performers. Each song can be sung to the tune of any popular air.

Trio.—THE PRINCESSES.

KITTY.

I am weary of my love, of my love so brave and true.
He is much too good for any one; I do not think he'll do.
For he never does a single thing excepting what he should.
Yet I feel that I could love him if he wouldn't be so good.

MALTA.

I am weary of my love, for he's such a lively lad
That he never gives me chances to be comfortably sad;
With his merry ways and manners and his bright and laughing eye,
It is seldom I've the chance to get a good, fair cry.

ANGORA.

I am weary of my love, for he's painfully polite.
If he were but somewhat ruder he would just about be right.
But his proud and formal manner and the stiffness of his spite
Are so very irritating that he never can be mine.

ALL TOGETHER.

We are weary of our loves for this reason and for that;
We know we ought to love them, but we don't, and that is flat.
For we are weary of our lovers. They are all they ought to be,
But that is just the reason why we never can agree.

KITTY. Something must be done at once; that is clear. See!
(she looks off the stage) here they come to pay us their regular morning call. Let us tell them now, before it is too late, that it never can be. Never!

MALTA. Never!

ANGORA. Never, under any circumstances whatever!

ALL TOGETHER. It never can be!

(Enter, at back, the three Princes. They march in abreast, in military style. Each carries a bunch of flowers.)

Trio.—THE THREE PRINCES.

PRINCE VELVET.

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses,
That early this morning we gathered for you;
Excuse me, but going out early exposes
One's feet to the chillbrains that come from the dew.

Chorus.—The Princes.

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses,
Our posies of roses, still wet with the dew;
The gift's not extensive, but very expensive.
But please to accept it—'twas gathered for you.

PRINCE SPOT.

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses,
That early this morning we gathered for you;
Please lift them with care to your dear little noses,
And put them in water whenever you're through.

Chorus (as before).

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses, etc.

PRINCE TORTOISESHELL.

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses,
That early this morning we gathered for you;
Each brings a gem of a dew-drop inclosure,
And the love that goes with them's as clear and as true.

Chorus (as before).

We bring you our posies, our posies of roses, etc.

KITTY. Excuse us—no!

MALTA. Emphatically, distinctly, and decidedly, no!

ANGORA. Just no!

TORTOISESHELL. But what does this mean? You won't have our posies?

KITTY. No. And if you will excuse us, please, we won't have you.

TORTOISESHELL. Well, if we hadn't been accepted long ago, I should say this was a rejection.

KITTY. It is a rejection. We have changed our minds. I suppose a woman can change her mind? Instead of rejecting you first and then accepting you, we have accepted you first and then rejected you. Do you see?

TORTOISESHELL. No. Do we see, Spot?

SPOT. I don't think we do.

TORTOISESHELL. Do we see, Velvet?

VELVET (bowing). If the ladies desire it, of course we do.

TORTOISESHELL (to the Princesses). Perhaps you'll kindly explain.

KITTY. With pleasure.

Song.—KITTY.

There is a law unwritten
When a girl would answer Nay,
She gives a man the mitten,
And sends him on his way.
So here's a pretty mitten—

[She takes a black mitten from her pocket]

It's very neatly knit;
I hope your hand will fit in—
Just let me try a bit.

[She fits it on Tortoise-shell's right hand]

Chorus.—PRINCESSES.

So there's a pretty mitten,
It's very neatly knit;
And if your hand won't fit in—
Why, please don't mention it.

[They fit mittens on the hands of the other Princes]

KITTY.

It's quite a simple matter—
Your admiration bores.
Excuse me if I chatter;
But—how's the air out-doors?
You seem surprised and smitten—
You may dislike the fun—
But—won't you take the mitten?
And—won't you take the hint?

TORTOISESHELL. But what have you against us?

KITTY. Nothing, except that you are all—you are all too much so.

MALTA. My idea exactly.

ANGORA. I should say that you were all very much too much so.

TORTOISESHELL (to the Princesses). Gentlemen, what do you call this?

SPOT. I call it the best joke I ever heard.
VELVET. Pardon me. I like a joke well enough; but this isn't the kind of joke I care for.

SPOT. You must need a good deal of a joke when you want to feel funny. What more do you want than this? Don't you think we're about as ridiculous as we can be? Why don't you laugh?

VELVET. If I did feel like laughing, I should not laugh now. His Majesty the King is coming here—I see him just outside the door—and it would be very improper to laugh.

Chorus.—PRINCESSES.

So there's a pretty mitten, etc.

TORTOISESHELL (earnestly, to Kitty). Dear Kitty, tell me it is only a joke.

KITTY (smiling). Yes, it is a joke.

TORTOISESHELL (eagerly). Then you do love me?—you will marry me?

KITTY. No; that's the joke.

(Tortoise-shell clasps his hands in despair. Enter, at back, the King, preceded by chorus of Courtiers and Ladies. He takes his seat on the throne, while the chorus sings.)

CHORUS.

Here is the King of the Land of Pie:
See him sit on his throne so high!
He sits with grace, and he sits with ease,
But, like other mortals, he bends his knees.

THE KING. Good-morning, my daughters. Good-morning, my future sons-in-law. Good-morning, everybody else—in a lump. Where is my Court Jester?

KITCAT (entering at back with Ringtail). Here I am, your Majesty. RINGTAIL (severely). That isn't right.

KITCAT. I beg your pardon. Here we are again, your Majesty. I didn't know I was expected to be funny.

(Ringtail talks with Princes.)

THE KING. Court Jester!

KITCAT. Yes, your Majesty.

THE KING. Jest.

KITCAT. Certainly, your Majesty. I am always ready to obey your Majesty and to earn my salary. What will your Majesty have in the way of a jest?

THE KING. Oh, I don't care; anything brilliant, clever, sparkling, and witty—and new.

KITCAT. Certainly, your Majesty.

Song.

KITCAT. When is a door not a door?
CHORUS (answering quickly). When it's ajar; but we have heard it before.
KITCAT. When is a man not a man?
CHORUS. When he's a-slavering. Go on if you can.
KITCAT. Why does a miller wear a white hat?
CHORUS. To keep his head warm. We know all about that.

KITCAT.

You seem to put spokes into all of my jokes,
And I think I'll retire from the floor;
A joke is no fun if when it is done
It appears that you know it before.

THE KING. My Lord Chamberlain, is this all the entertainment provided for this morning?

RINGTAIL. No, not quite all, your Majesty. These young gentlemen here have just informed me of something that will greatly entertain your Majesty.

THE KING. Entertain me, then.

RINGTAIL. The Princes have just been rejected by the Princesses, who positively refuse to marry them.

THE KING (almost falling off his throne). But—oh!—I say—that won't do. I can't allow that.

RINGTAIL (aside, to the King). But it's done, your Majesty.

THE KING (to Ringtail). Then it's got to be undone. I've given each one of those Princes, separately and privately, a first mortgage—a first mortgage, do you hear, Ringtail?—on the palace, and if my daughters don't marry them, I am a forced-land king.

KITTY. Yes, papa, we have told the Princes that we will not marry them.

MALTA and ANGORA. Yes, papa, all three of us.
KITTY. The fact is, we're tired of them, and so we have given them the mittens. See there!

(The Princesses hold up their hands, with the mittens on them.)

THE KING. Then take them back at once. Take back those mittens.

TORTOISESHELL. Oh no, your Majesty. When a lady gives a gentleman a present—

VELVET. It wouldn't be polite to give it back.

SPOT. This is really a particularly large joke.

KING (to Princesses). Disobedient girls! Hear my commands! Get back those mittens at once, or I disown you. Unless you have those mittens back again before to-morrow, you shall never share in the division of the Treasury Pie; and you shall all of you eat mustard tart for the remainder of your lives.

THE PRINCESSES (falling on their knees). Oh, horror!

TORTOISESHELL. Your Majesty—be merciful—be merciful to my Princess, at least.

THE KING. No! I am firm.

FINALE.

THE KING. No, they shall have no Pie!
They'll have no Treasury Pie,
The naughty kittens,
They've lost their mittens,
And they shall have no Pie!

THE PRINCESSES. And we shall have no Pie!
We're almost ready to cry!
We're naughty kittens,
We've lost our mittens,
And we shall have no Pie!

THE PRINCES. We really can't deny
They don't deserve their Pie,
They're naughty kittens,
We've got their mittens,
And so they can have no Pie.

CHORUS. And they shall have no Pie!
This comes of looking too high!
These naughty kittens
Have lost their mittens,
And so they are out of Pie!

Curtain.

ACT II.

The same room in the same Palace.

(Enter at back Ringtail and Kitecat.)

RINGTAIL (at right of stage, aside). All goes well for me. If I can only get those Princes dismissed from the court, I shall still retain command of the Treasury Pie. How fortunate for me that I was born villainous! I should have been a terrible failure as a honest man.

KITCAT (at left of stage, aside). I see his little plot, and I will plot against him. Everybody spoils my jokes, and now I am going to see if I can't do a little spoiling myself.

THE KING (entering hurriedly, right). Ha, you are there, my faithful Ringtail! I must consult with you, Kitecat, summon my daughters and the whole court. Now don't joke—please don't joke—go and hurry them up. [Exit Kitecat left.] Ringtail, what is to be done? If these Princes don't get my daughters they will take the palace. Three first mortgages, Ringtail! Do you understand the situation? They will take the Treasury Pie and everything else; and they'll sell my crown for a muffin ring. O Ringtail, what shall I do?

RINGTAIL. I feel deeply for your Majesty; but I don't see what your Majesty can do. The Princesses can not demand their mittens back again. You know the Constitution and By-laws of the Land of Pie, Article 97, Chapter III.: Chip, chip, chay, give a thing away; never take it back again, chip, chip, chay!

KING (walking up and down). But we've got to have them back again, chip, chip, chay!

RINGTAIL. Here they come, your Majesty.

(Enter at back the Princesses and the Princes, with Kitecat and Chorus.)

CHORUS.

This is a terrible, terrible muss;
We're in for a horrible, horrible fuss;
We do not quite see why affairs should be thus—
It's distressing to them, and distressing to us.

THE KING. Ladies and gentlemen, this matter must be settled. I can't have my palace all full of broken engagements. Princes, you must give those mittens back to the Princesses.

THE PRINCES (all together). But we shan't take them back.

THE PRINCES (all together). And under those circumstances we shan't give them back.

THE KING. This is most annoying. Ringtail, what's to be done?

RINGTAIL. Nothing.

KITCAT. Yes—something.

THE KING. Kitecat, this is no time for jesting.

KITCAT. I'm not jesting, your Majesty. I'm sorry.

THE KING. You generally are. What have you now?

KITCAT. I have a very simple way out of the difficulty of your Majesty. The Princess Malta objects to her first mortgage being too lively and frivolous, and the Princess Angora objects to hers because he is too dignified and solemn. Very well, let them change partners. Give Prince Spot to Princess Angora, and Prince Velvet to Princess Malta.

THE KING. Admirable idea! One, two, three—change! [Loud Spot across to Angora, and Malta across to Velvet.] There you are. But how about the Princess Kitty?

KITCAT. That's very simple too. The Princess Kitty won't have Prince Tortoise-shell because he is too good, too gentle, too generous, too brave, and too handsome. Well, let her take my friend here, the Lord Chamberlain.

ALL. What, Ringtail!

KITCAT. Yes, Ringtail. He isn't good, he isn't gentle, he isn't generous, he isn't brave, and nobody can say that he is handsome.

THE KING. Excellent! Kitecat, I shall make you my Prime Minister the next time I have occasion to engage one. I always said you would do better if you weren't a jester. Kitty, are you satisfied?

KITTY (mournfully). I don't know, papa. I suppose I ought to be.

THE KING. You certainly ought, if that's what you wanted.

RINGTAIL (to the King). But, your Majesty, how about the mortgage you gave to Prince Tortoise-shell?

THE KING (to Ringtail). Oh, I'll have the mortgage transferred to you. It's only for fifty thousand sequins.

RINGTAIL. Fifty thousand sequins!

THE KING. Oh, you can afford it. You must have stolen as much as that out of the Royal Treasury.

RINGTAIL (aside). I haven't. I have neglected my opportunities. I have stolen only forty thousand sequins. But I will make up for lost time. I will go now and steal the other ten thousand.

THE KING. So that's settled. And now we can all go off and enjoy ourselves. (To Tortoise-shell.) My poor fellow, you must feel quite unhappy. Come with me, and I'll give you a stick of slippery-elm. Slippery-elm is very consoling.

TORTOISESHELL. But I don't want to go—

THE KING. Nonsense, come along.

(Takes his arm and walks him off at back; the Chorus following them. Velvet, Spot, Angora, and Malta are left on the stage.)

CHORUS (singing as they go off).

So that is the end of the terrible muss,
And that is the end of the horrible fuss.
How clever it was to arrange it all thus,
If it's pleasant for them, it is pleasant for us.

SPOT. Well, ladies—

ANGORA. Well, sir?

Quartet.—SPOT, VELVET, MALTA, and ANGORA.

SPOT and VELVET.

It's very nice to change about;
A most ingenious plan, no doubt,
Though neither of us chose his bride,
We hope that you are satisfied.

MALTA and ANGORA.

We're glad to find you so polite,
You're too accommodating, quite;
And as to being satisfied,
Perhaps we'll tell you when we've tried.

ALL FOUR TOGETHER.

It's very nice to change about;
A most ingenious plan, no doubt;
But still, maybe, some folks would say,
The old way is the better way.

SPOT (to Angora). Princess—
ANGORA (critically). Oh, please don't begin with any of your horrid jokes. I can't stand them now. Don't you see, my nerves are all unstrung?

VELVET (to Malta). Princess—
MALTA. Oh, really, you are too much for any one to bear, with your miserable old politeness! Why don't you do something to cheer me up, when you see that I'm feeling simply wretched!

THE PRINCES. But, ladies—

ANGORA (half sobbing). I'm going to my own room!

MALTA (to same). So am I!

ANGORA. I'm going to cry!

MALTA. So am I!

SPOT (disjunctly). It's a great joke, isn't it?

VELVET. I'm glad you like it.

SPOT. Why don't you go and cheer up your Princess?

VELVET. She isn't mine; she's yours.

SPOT. Then I'll go and cheer her up with myself.

VELVET. Then I'm going to find Angora.

SPOT. Go! Who cares?

BOTH (together). Bah!

KITTY. It's really strange that when I have everything just as I like it, I find out that I don't like it at all.

Sing.—KITTY.
I've had my way,
I've said him nay;
I've let my lover go;
But now— but now—
I don't know how—
I wish it wasn't so.

I feel like a girl who's about to cry—
About to cry,
And the worst of it is that I don't know why,
I don't know why,
I don't know why.

It's very strange,
I wanted change,
And now I'd change again;

I'd like
Why
Will you
I feel like a girl who (While she is standing back; he stands singing she turns KITTY. Oh dear! A)

in?
to cry, etc.
Tortoiseshell has entered at thing her. At close of

TORTOISESHELL. Yes, dear, I am here.
KITTY. I didn't mean "dear" in that way.
TORTOISESHELL. Yes, but I did, dear.
KITTY. Well, then, you oughtn't to. It isn't proper.
I'm engaged to somebody else.
TORTOISESHELL. But I'm not engaged to anybody else.
KITTY. You will be, though, won't you?
TORTOISESHELL. Never! I am going to sea. I am going to spend the rest of my life in l'ridgi land—as foreign as possible.

KITTY. Oh, but then you'll see more of my other girls.
TORTOISESHELL. I don't care.
KITTY. But you ought to care for the society of ladies.
And you'll see ever so many girls who are much nicer than I am sighs.
TORTOISESHELL. No, I shan't.

KITTY. Why not?

TORTOISESHELL. Because there aren't any girls who are nicer than you are.

KITTY. Oh yes, there are (angrily). Yes, I'm perfectly sure that when you get off in those hateful foreign countries you'll find some girl (almost sobbing) who's a great deal nicer than I am.

TORTOISESHELL. No, indeed I shan't. You are the nicest girl that ever lived in all the whole world, and I should say so even if nobody else agreed with me.

Song.—TORTOISESHELL.

Heave, ho! the anchor over the bow,
And off to sea go I.
The wild wind blows, and nobody knows
That I have you always high
Right close in my heart; I can keep you here
In memory fond and true.
For there 'll never be one like you, my dear—
There 'll never be one like you.

Oho! the billows of Biscany Bay,
And the stars of the southern sea!
But the dark-haired girls may shake their curls,
With never a look from me;
For the thought of my love shall be ever near,
Though wide is the ocean blue,
And there 'll never be one like you, my dear—
There 'll never be one like you.

The end of the world is a weary way,
And I know not where it lies,
And maidens fair may smile on me there,
And girls with laughing eyes;
But in all the days of all the year,
Though I wander the whole world through,
There 'll never be one like you, my dear—
There 'll never be one like you.

KITTY. Do you really love me as much as all that?

TORTOISESHELL. Indeed I do. More.

KITTY. Why didn't you ever mention it before?

TORTOISESHELL. Didn't I?

KITTY. Not in that convincing way (coming close to him). Oh dear, we might have been so happy!

(She lets her head fall on his shoulder.)

TORTOISESHELL (putting his arm about her). Kitty, couldn't you love me a little? I'm so sorry I displeased you.

KITTY. I'm sorry I was displeased.

TORTOISESHELL. I'll try to be different. And really, you know, I'm not so good as you think I am.

KITTY. Oh yes, you are.

TORTOISESHELL. I'm quite bad sometimes.

KITTY. I'm sure you're not.

TORTOISESHELL. I'm sometimes cross; and if I had the tooth-ache, I think I could be very disagreeable.

KITTY. Oh no, you couldn't; not even if you tried.

TORTOISESHELL. And as to being brave—well, I think I could be afraid—of an elephant, for instance, if it was a very big elephant.

KITTY (indignantly). Tortoise-shell, I won't have you saying such things of yourself. You're the bravest, best, kindest, nicest Prince in the world, and you know it.

TORTOISESHELL (sadly). Then you can't love me at all?

(He releases her.)

KITTY. Of course I can—of course I do. Who could help loving you?

TORTOISESHELL. But a while ago you said you hated me for just those very reasons. This is very strange. It isn't quite—consistent.

KITTY (surprised). Isn't it?

TORTOISESHELL. No.

KITTY. Do you mind?

TORTOISESHELL (embracing her). No; you may be as inconsistent as you please, so long as you are mine.

THE KING (leaving suddenly at back). Here, young man, what are you doing with that young lady?

KITTY. Oh, papa, we're making up! Please don't interrupt us.

THE KING. But this won't do! She's engaged to the Lord High Chamberlain! (Calling.) Here, Ringtail! Here, my courtiers!

(Enter, right, Ringtail; at back, Kittat, Velvet and Angora, Spot and Malta, and Chorus.)

CHORUS.

What can be the matter,
And what can it be?
All this fuss and chatter
Made by lovers three?

TORTOISESHELL. The matter is that Kitty and I have made up; and I will defend her right to change her mind. I will defend it with my life!

(He makes a motion as if to draw his sword.)

THE KING. What! you would draw your sword upon a king—a real, genuine king?

RINGTAIL (to Tortoise-shell). Don't draw your sword, young man; draw your mortgage.

THE KING. Ringtail, why don't you chain your bride?

RINGTAIL. The honor is too great for me, your Majesty. I must respectfully decline it. (Aside.) I can't get the rest of the money; it's all in that Treasury Pie, and I can't get it at.

KITTAT. Ha! ha! If I can't make a joke, at least I can spoil one.

THE KING. My daughters, what does this mean?

ANGORA. It means, papa, that we should like to have our mittens back.

MALTA (to the Princesses). Gentlemen, if we may trouble you for those mittens.

THE THREE PRINCES. With pleasure.

(They bow politely, and return the mittens.)

Sextette.—PRINCES AND PRINCESSES.

THE PRINCESSES. Chip, chip, chay!
THE PRINCES. Give a thing away.
ALL TOGETHER. Sometimes take it back again,
Chip, chip, chay!

THE PRINCES. Chip, chip, chay!
THE PRINCESSES. When a girl says Nay,
ALL TOGETHER. She sometimes takes it back again,
Chip, chip, chay!

CHORUS.

Now all is done,
And it was fun,
Although their story is only begun!
Until they die,
Time ought to fly,
Gaily in plenty, in pleasure, and Pie!

(The Treasury Pie is brought in as in Act I.)

THE KING. And they shall have some Pie,
Attend my mandate high—
Those good little kittens
Have found their mittens,
And they shall have some Pie!

THE PRINCESSES. And we shall have some Pie,
We'll eat it by-and-by;
We'll give our lovers
The Pie with covers,
And we'll eat custard pie.

THE PRINCES. We all shall have some Pie,
Both they and you and I—
Our good little kittens
May keep their mittens,
And all shall have some Pie.

CHORUS (dancing around the Treasury Pie).
And they shall have some Pie,
They'll have the Treasury Pie—
The good little kittens
Have found their mittens,
And so we'll say Good-by!

Curtain.

PRINCESS KITTY AND PRINCE TORTOISESHELL.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

ONCE upon a time there was a King who was the wisest in all the world. So wise was he that no one had ever befooled him, which is a rare thing to find, I can tell you. Now this King had a daughter who was as pretty as a ripe apple, so that there was no end to the number of the lads who came asking to marry her. Every day there were two or three of them dawdling around the house, so that at last the old King grew tired of having them always about. So he sent word far and near that whoever should befool him should have the Princess, and half of the kingdom to boot, for he thought that it would be a wise man indeed who could trick him. But the King also said that whoever should try to befool him and should fail should have a good whipping.

This was to keep all foolish fellows away.

The Princess was so pretty that there was no lack of lads who came to have a try for her and half of the kingdom, but every one of these went away with a sore back and no luck.

Now there was a man who was well off in the world, and who had three sons; the first was named Peter, and the second was named Paul. Peter and Paul thought themselves to be wise fellows, if there ever were wise fellows living in the world, and their father thought as they did.

As for the youngest son, he was named Boots. Nobody thought anything of him except that he was silly, for he did nothing but sit poking in the warm ashes all of the day.

One morning Peter spoke up and said that he was going to the town to have a try at befooling the King, for it would be a fine thing to have a princess in the family. His father did not say no, for if anybody was wise enough to befool the King, Peter was the lad.

So after Peter had eaten a good breakfast, off he set for the town, right foot foremost. After a while he came to the King's house, and rap, tap, tap, he knocked at the door.

Well, what did he want?

Oh! he would only like to have a try at befooling the King.

Very good; he should have his try. Very was not the first one who had been there that morning, early as it was.

So Peter was shown in to the King.

"Oh! look!" said he; "yonder are three black geese out in the court-yard."

But no; the King was not to be fooled so easily as all that. "One goose is enough to look at at a time," said the King. "Take him away and give him a whipping."

And so they did, and Peter went home bleating like a sheep.

One day Paul spoke up. "I should like to go and have a try for the Princess too," said he.

Well, his father did not say no, for, after all, Paul was the more clever of the two.

So off Paul went as merrily as a duck in the rain. By-and-by he came to the castle, and then he too was brought before the King, just as Peter had been.

"Oh! look!" said he; "yonder is a crow sitting in the tree, with three white stripes on his back."

But the King was not so silly as to be fooled in that way. "Here is a Jack," said he, "who will soon have more stripes on his back than he will like. Take him away and give him his whipping."

Then it was done as the King had said, and Paul went away home, bawling like a calf.

One day up spoke Boots. "I should like to go and have a try for the pretty Princess too," said he.

At this they all stared and sniggered. What! he go where his clever brothers had failed, and had nothing to show for the trying but a good beating? What had come over the lout? Here was a pretty business, to be sure! That was what they all said.

But all of this rolled away from Boots like water from a duck's back. No matter: he would like to go and have a try like the others. So he begged, and begged, and begged until his father was glad to let him go, to be rid of his teasing, if for nothing else.

Then Boots asked if he might have the old tattered hat that hung back of the chimney.

Oh yes; he might have that if he wanted it, for nobody with good wits was likely to wear such a thing.

So Boots took the hat, and after he had brushed the ashes from his shoes set off for the town, whistling as he went.

The first body whom he met was an old woman with a great load of earthenware pots and crocks on her shoulders.

"Good-day, mother," said Boots.

"Good-day, son," said she.

"What will you take for all of your pots and crocks?" said Boots.

"Three shillings," said she.

"I will give you five shillings if you will come and stand in front of the King's house, and do thus and so when I say this and that," said Boots.

Oh yes; she would do that willingly enough.

So Boots and the old woman went on together, and presently came to the King's house. When they had come there, Boots sat down in front of the door and began bawling as loud as he could: "No; I will not! I will not do it, I say! No; I will not do it!"

So he kept on, bawling louder and louder, until he made such a noise that at last the King himself came out to see what all of the hubbub was about. But when Boots saw him he only bawled out louder than ever, "No; I will not! I will not do it, I say!"

"Stop! stop!" cried the King. "What is all this about?"

"Why," said Boots, "everybody wants to buy my cap, but I will not sell it. I will not do it, I say!"

"But why should anybody want to buy such a cap as that?" said the King.

"Because," said Boots, "it is a fooling cap, and the only one in all of the world."

"A fooling cap?" said the King. "And could you fool me with it?"

Oh yes! Boots could do that easily enough; he could fool anybody in all of the world with it.

"Hum-m-m-m!" said the King; for he did not like the thought of such a cap as that coming into the town. Who knew but what it might win the Princess! "Hum-m-m-m! I should like to see you fool somebody with it. Could you fool that old body yonder with the pots and the crocks?"

"Oh yes! that is easily done," said Boots, and without more ado he took off his tattered cap and blew into it. Then he put it on his head again and bawled out, "Break pots! break pots!"

No sooner had he spoken these words than the old woman jumped up and began breaking and smashing her pots and crocks as though she had gone crazy. That was what Boots had paid her five shillings for doing, but of it the King knew nothing. "Hui!" said he to himself; "I must buy that hat from the fellow, or he will fool the Princess away from me for sure and certain." Then he began talking to Boots as sweetly as though he had honey in his mouth. Perhaps Boots would sell the hat to him.

Oh no; Boots could not think of such a thing as selling his fooling cap.

Come, come; the King would not mind giving as much as a hundred thalers for it.

No; Boots would not sell it for that.

Well, then, two hundred thalers.

No; Boots would not sell it for that, either.

Very well; sooner than let the hat go, the King would give a whole bag of gold money for it.

At this Boots looked up and Boots looked down, scratching his head. Well, he supposed he would have to sell the hat some time, and the King might as well have it as anybody else. But for all that, he did not like parting with it.

So the King gave Boots the bag of gold, and Boots gave the King the old tattered hat, and then he went his way.

After Boots had gone, the King blew into the hat, and blew into the hat; but though he blew enough breath into it to sail a big ship, he did not befool so much as a single titmouse. Then, at last, he began to see that the fooling cap was good on nobody else's head but Boots's; and he was none too pleased at that, you may be sure.

As for Boots, with his bag of gold he bought the finest clothes that were to be had in the town, and when the next morning had come he started away bright and early for the King's house.

When the King saw him he screwed up his face as though he had sour gooseberries in his mouth. "What do you want?" said he.

"I have come," said Boots, "to marry the Princess, if you please."

At this the King hemmed and hawed and scratched his head. Yes, Boots had befooled him, sure enough; but, after all, he could not give up the Princess for such a thing as that. Still, he would give Boots another chance. Now there was the Chief Councillor, who was the wisest man in all of the world. Did Boots think that he could fool him also?

Well, yes, Boots thought that it might be done.

Very well; if he could befool the Chief Councillor so as to bring him to the castle the next morning against his will, Boots should have the Princess and the half of the kingdom; if he did not do so, he should have his beating.

Then Boots went away, and the King thought that he was rid of him now for good and all.

As for the Chief Councillor, he was not pleased with the matter at all, for he did not like the thought of being fooled by a clever rogue, and taken here and there against his will. So when he had come home, he armed all his servants with blunderbusses, and then waited to give Boots a warm welcome when he should come.

But Boots was not going to fall into any such trap as that. No, indeed; not he. The next morning he went quietly and bought a fine large meal sack. Then he put a black wig over his beautiful red hair, so that no one might know him. After that he went to the place where the Chief Councillor lived, and when he had come there he crawled inside of the sack, and lay just beside the door of the house.

By and-by came one of the maid servants to the door, and there lay the great meal sack with somebody in it.

"Acht!" cried she, "who is there?"

But Boots only said, "Sh-h-h-h-h!"

"Who are you?" said she.

But Boots only said, "Sh-h-h-h-h!"

Then the serving maid went back into the house and told the Chief Councillor that one lay outside in a great meal sack, and that all that he said was, "Sh-h-h-h-h!"

So the Councillor went himself to see what it was all about. "What do you want here!" said he.

But Boots only said, "Sh-h-h-h-h!"

"What are you doing there?" said the Chief Councillor. "Sh-h-h-h-h!" said Boots. "I am not to be talked to now. This is a wisdom sack, and I am learning wisdom as fast as one can pick peas."

"And what wisdom have you learned?" said the Councillor.

Oh! he had learned wisdom about everything in the world. He had learned that the clever scamp who had fooled the King yesterday was coming with seventeen tall men to take the Chief Councillor, willy nilly, to the castle that morning.

When the Chief Councillor heard this, he fell to trembling till his teeth rattled in his head. "And have you learned how I can get the better of this clever scamp?" said he.

Oh yes; Boots had learned that easily enough.

So, good! Then if the wise man in the sack would tell the Councillor how to escape the clever rogue, the Councillor would give the wise man twenty thalers.

But no, that was not to be done; wisdom was not bought so cheaply as the Chief Councillor seemed to think.

Boots tricks the Princess into showing herself

Well, the Councillor would give him a hundred thalers. That was good. A hundred thalers were a hundred thalers. If the Councillor would give him that much he might get into the sack himself, and then he could learn all the wisdom that he wanted, and more besides.

So Boots crawled out of the sack, and the Councillor paid his hundred thalers and crawled in.

As soon as he was in, all snug and safe, Boots drew the mouth of the sack together and tied it tightly. Then he flung sack, Councillor, and all over his shoulder, and started away to the King's house, and anybody who met them might see with half an eye that the Councillor was going against his will.

When Boots came to the King's castle he laid the Councillor down in the goose-house, and then he went to the King.

When the King saw Boots again he bit his lips with vexation. "Well," said he, "have you fooled the Councillor?"

Oh yes; Boots had done that.

And had he brought the Councillor with him?

Oh yes; he had brought the Councillor along, too.

And had the Councillor come against his will?

Well, yes; on the whole Boots thought that he had come against his will.

And where was the Councillor now?

Oh! Boots had just left him down in the goose-house. He was tied up safe and sound in a sack, waiting till the King should send for him.

"So the Councillor was sent for, and when he came the King saw at once that he had come against his will.

"And now may I marry the Princess?" said Boots.

At this the King hemmed and hawed and scratched his head just as he had done before. No, no; Boots must not go so fast. There was more to be done yet before he could marry the Princess and have half of the kingdom. If Boots would come to-morrow morning he might have the Princess and welcome, but he would have to pick her out from amongst fourscore other maids just like her. Did he think that he could do that?

Oh yes, Boots thought that that might be easy enough to do.

So, good! Then come to-morrow; but he must understand that if he failed he should have a good whipping and be sent packing from the town.

So off went Boots, and the King thought that he was rid of him now, for he had never seen the Princess, and how could he pick her out from amongst eighty others?

But Boots was not going to give up so easily as all that. No, not he. He made a little box, and then he hunted up and down until he had caught a live mouse to put into it.

When the next morning came, he started away to the King's house, taking his mouse along with him in the box.

There was the King standing in the doorway looking out into the street. When he saw Boots coming toward him, he made a wry face. "What!" said he; "are you back again?"

Oh yes, Boots was back again. He was not for giving up so easily as all that. And now if the Princess was ready, he would like to go and find her, for lost time was not to be gathered again, like fallen apples.

The King hemmed and hawed, but there was nothing for it but to let Boots have his trial. So off they marched until they had come to a great room, and there stood eighty and one maidens, all as much alike as peas in the same dish.

Boots looked here and there, but, even if he had known the Princess, he could not have told her from the others. But he was ready for all that. Before any one knew what he was about, he opened the box and out ran the little mouse amongst them all. Then what a screaming and a hubbub there was! Many looked as though they would have liked to swoon, but only one of them did so. As soon as the others saw what had happened, they forgot all about the mouse, and ran to her, and fell to fanning her and slapping her hands and chafing her temples.

"This is the Princess," said Boots.

And so it was.

After that the King could think of nothing more to set Boots to do, so he let him marry the Princess as he had promised, and have half of the kingdom to boot.

That is all of this story.

Only this; it is not always the silliest one that sits kicking his feet in the ashes at home.

Also, Boots often does better than any of them in the long run.

If there is anything more in this nut, you must crack it yourself; that is, if your teeth are strong enough.

A CHRISTMAS CHAT.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

WE were all around the cheerful fire in the twilight—Bessie and Charlie and Nellie and Will, and our dear old story-telling aunt, who had put down her knitting. We knew what that meant. It was always the signal for a chat.

Auntie seemed to be meditating.

"What shall it be about?" she said, half to herself and half to us.

"Why, Christmas, of course," we all answered together.

"Christmas—merry Christmas! Has it really come again? Looking up at the stars this clear cold evening, I see them shining as they did when the brightest of them led the three Wise Men of the East to that old inn of Judea where they were to find our Saviour. There, among the cattle belonging to the travellers come to pay their yearly tax money, in the arms of his lovely young mother, was the Babe of Bethlehem, who became the Man Christ Jesus. To Him the Wise Men carried gifts, even as now we bestow them in His name upon those we love. His birthday was our first Christmas Day. We must not forget that, as we are apt to do in the pleasures of this gay season.

"You all know about the English carols and wails, the great Yule-log and the Christmas candles, the boar's head borne in on a platter to the sound of music, and the mistletoe hung in the castle hall. You know, too, all about the plum porridge and the mince-pie. But do you know that the fourteen days before Christmas were called halcyon days? These days were supposed to be peculiarly beautiful, like our Indian summer, and they were named after the bird we call the kingfisher. The ancients supposed that the halcyon made its nest on the ocean, and that it possessed the power of lulling the waves and producing calm and lovely weather while its young were being hatched. And this power came from the bird's song. Must it not have been sweet?

"Perhaps the Christmas carols may have had their origin in some one's trying to sing like a halcyon. They are among the oldest of English songs, and were first printed in 1521. Among the many pleasant customs at Christmas 'in ye olden time' was that of electing a person as Lord of Misrule, or Master of Merry Disports, whose duty it was to amuse everybody and start all the games.

"Our Santa Claus—whom we borrow from the Germans—is Saint Nicholas, who was a bishop in Greece in the fourth century, and the patron saint of children, especially of school-boys. Claus is a contraction of the last two syllables of Nicholas.

"In the Middle Ages a boy used to be chosen as a mock bishop for St. Nicholas Day (which is still in the English calendar, occurring on December 6), and was allowed to preach. One of these boy bishops had a monument in Salisbury Cathedral. In all old customs you will find a curious blending of truth and superstition. Shakespeare said that at Christmas time it was believed 'no spirit daves stir abroad; the nights are wholesome; then no planets strike, no fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm, so hallowed and so gracious is the time.'

"When I was a child I used to visit the then beautiful little town of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, which you probably know was a Moravian settlement. Don't you remember Longfellow's poem called 'A Hymn of the Moravian Nuns at Bethlehem'? He speaks in that of cowed heads and tapers and censers. It is a beautiful poem, but the Moravians, as I saw them, had no such things. They were a simple, frugal, and industrious people, very religious, and very fond of music, but their church services were very plain. The men and women were divided, as at Quaker meetings, and I saw no censers or cowed heads. A poet, however, is allowed to use his own's eye. But their customs were very pretty, and they made much of Easter and Christmas, especially the latter.

"In every household there was not only an exchange of gifts and much rejoicing, but for many days previous there had been extensive preparations in the way of decorations. Not only did each family have a tree—and it did not matter whether there were children or only old people in the family—but each tried to outdo the other in the especial beauty of its Christmas 'Pote,' as I think they called the lovely bowers of evergreens erected in their parlors.

"On a broad stand covered with green muslin and well hidden by boughs and branches four pillars were raised. These were twined with ivy and holly or ground-pine. Within this inclosure, and beneath its leafy canopy, was the Christmas-tree, glittering with sugar fruit and waxen tapers. At its base was a field of moss, through which ran a sparkling stream, made of glass sometimes, but usually of real water, which played in fountain jets or tumbled in mimic cascades over tiny rocks. On the moss was a representation of the manger, the Holy Child, and the shepherds with their woolly flocks. Waxen angels (made at the Widows' and Sisters' houses) hung hovering over these figures. Visitors were expected to go about from house to house to see these pretty decorations, and coffee—a favorite beverage—was always hospitably offered.

"In the Moravian Church on high festivals they always had brass instruments in addition to the organ, and many choristers made sweet harmony. But, children, I really must stop talking for Christmas is so fascinating that I might keep on all night; only before I stop let me beg you all to remember when you hang up your stockings that there are many poor bare little feet without stockings whose owners' hearts you may help to make glad, and the sweetest blossom on the Christmas-tree is the flower of Christian love."

HER GIFTS.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A DEAR little mother is waiting apart—

The mother of children three.

"My Lord," she cries, in the hush of her heart,

"Will Thou take a gift from me?"

I have heard the angels sing Thy birth,

I have followed Thy shining star,

And here at the shrine of all the earth,

Lo! I and my children are.

"And all in the glow of the Christmas morn,

My gold to lay at Thy feet,

I am leading my darlings with care unworn,

With brows that are pure and sweet.

O never had gems from the mines such worth

As the treasure to-day I bring

To the beautiful shrine of all the earth,

To the glorious Infant King.

"My children three, with their waving hair,

And the fearless look in their eyes,

They lip Thy name in the vesper prayer,

And at matins when they rise,

Nothing they know of the dole and dearth

Of souls that with sin have striven,

They kneel at the shrine of all the earth,

"Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

They stand in the shadow of pine and fir;

They listen, and floating through

They catch the answer that's sent to her

Through a rift in the upper blue:

"Since the Christ-child came to the weary earth

No gifts are to Him so sweet

As the children's hearts, with their joy and mirth,

Lovingly brought to His feet."

CHRISTMAS ON THE NORTH FORK.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD.

ALL the school-teaching of Burnaby Township was done in the school-house down by the bridge on the North Fork. It was a frame building, and had never been painted, but it was as big as any of the houses near the people around there lived in. It was all in one room, with benches everywhere, and there was a platform a foot high at one end and a table on it.

There never had been much of a Christmas in the North Fork, but now that the country was getting so fast, people were thinking of improvements all the time. What was needed was a winter of the night's year, and it came one when the sleighing was so good and the snow on the North Fork was so altogether mean that anybody could almost see Christmas coming.

Nobody knew exactly what to do about it, but Miss Arabella Hopkins, the school-ma'am, decided that there must be a Christmas in the school-house. She must decide things for the people who lived all over the North Fork, for her folks were old settlers, and all the folks believed that she knew more than anybody else in the world, and they said so at home.

Miss Hopkins had been dreadfully puzzled all the morning when she asked Peddy Mudgale,

"Wouldn't you like a Christmas?"

Peddy looked across the road at a snow-covered tree with red hobs on it, and answered her with a smile,

"Yes'm. But he couldn't get it."

"It's too far apart."

"You think the people are so scattered that Santa Claus couldn't find 'em all of them?"

"Yes'm. Our folks is at the North Fork. He couldn't find 'em all, most of the time, 'fore."

"But if all the children should come to the school-house?"

"Yes'm. They wouldn't be going home."

"That's best, 'cause you must be there, or you won't have a Christmas too."

"Yes'm. He wouldn't be going home, 'cause it's so far apart."

Peddy was so glad that he said so, and he said so to the school-ma'am, and he said so to the folks at home.

So the school-ma'am decided that there must be a Christmas in the school-house, and she said so to the folks at home.

So the folks at home decided that there must be a Christmas in the school-house, and they said so to the school-ma'am.

at the pretty things, and bought a little candy, and went home. Poor Mr. Crump did his best to help Miss Hopkins and the children talk Christmas, but all the older people said:

"There isn't any ready money going nowadays, and so long as there's to be a Christmas at the school-house, that'll have to do."

That was what was the matter, and it kept right on until Mrs. Crump told her husband for the twenty-seventh time, "I just do wish there hadn't been any Christmas!"

Joe Heidelberg went down to see his tree almost every other day, and he killed more than a dozen rabbits going and coming. He talked about it in his sleep, and sometimes while he was awake, and people generally knew that he had a tree picked out, and that he meant to cut it down three days before Christmas.

He had to go past Paddy Mudge's house every time he went, and that was the reason why she was in the road, close by where he was chopping, in the middle of the forenoon. She knew it was the day, and was watching for him until he came along. He was all ready for the tree, for he had two sleds, one tied on behind the other, to carry it back to the school-house. Paddy caught up with him before he got to the tree, and when she saw it she walked all around it with the snow almost up to her knees.

"It's a real good tree," she said, "and I'm glad it's close to the road."

"So'm I," said Joe.

"And there's no fence for you and me to lift it over; but I'll help you drag it home after we've cut it down."

"It's Christmas all over," said Joe.

"There's a sleigh with bells on it coming up the road."

"Somebody's going to town."

"None of our folks. Nobody on this timber has any bells."

The bells came merrily up the road until a handsome cutter, drawn by two splendid bay horses, pulled up within fifteen feet and six inches of Paddy Mudge. There were just fifteen of her foot-prints in the snow between her and a wolf-tail which was dragging out on that side of the cutter. It occurred at once to Joe Heidelberg, under the tree, that wolves must be plenty in the country that sleigh was made in. There was a great deal of fur to be seen, and some bright blankets, and a great fur cap with a very red nose under it, and below that was a long, bushy white beard that seemed to be holding the reins.

Paddy took it for granted that a man was there somewhere, and she was not scared a bit when a deep hoarse voice asked her:

"What are you doing away out here in the snow?"

"We're doing some Christmas. Joe Heidelberg is cutting down a tree for it, and we're going to have it in the school-house."

There was a sort of cough that made Joe think of one of the wolf-skins trying to be alive and bark, and then the voice went in under the tree, looking for him and saying:

"Joe, is all that tree to be for one Christmas?"

"Of course it is. You see, we haven't anything but some candles to put on it, and so we're going to have a big one. Miss Hopkins she got the candles with her own money, and she's cut 'em all in two. Going to stick 'em on everywhere, and then we'll make the school-house good and dark, and light 'em up and have a Christmas."

"Candy and presents and all sorts of things?" said the voice.

"No, there won't," said Paddy, gravely. "The candy and all the other things are in Mr. Crump's store, at the bridge. Nobody's got any money to buy 'em. So we're going to have a big tree and some candles. We're going to sing, too."

"Now I'd like to hear that, and to see the tree. Have you got any children to come?"

"Stacks of 'em," said Joe, "all up and down the timber, and some out on the prairie, and they'll all be there, and all the old folks too, and the school-house'll be jammed, and we'll have the biggest kind of a time."

"That's it. Going to have some cold chicken and some pies."

"Yes, sir," said Paddy, "and there'll be some apples, and Miss Hopkins isn't sure but what there'll be some coffee."

"Where does Miss Hopkins live? Who is she?"

"She's the school ma'am," replied Paddy, "and she lives down on the other side of the Fork."

"What's your name?"

"I'm Paddy Mudge, and he's Joe Heidelberg, and—"

"Jump right in here with me, Paddy, and come along and show me where Miss Hopkins lives. She's just the young woman I want to see."

"She isn't young at all, sir," said Paddy; "and I've got to stay and help Joe cut down the tree and drag it to the school-house."

"No, you haven't," shouted Joe. "Go right along. Don't you miss a good sleigh-ride. Besides, he wants to go and see Miss Hopkins."

That settled the matter, and Paddy at once clambered into the cutter. Joe Heidelberg lost sight of her then, except that something about as large as a small wolf was on the seat beside the white beard that was driving, and in a moment more he heard her call back to him: "Good-by, Joe. Hear the bells!"

He heard them, and peeped through the boughs of the tree after them, saying to himself: "It sounds kind o' Christmas. If we had a lot, we could hang 'em on the tree, and they'd make a jingle if you shook it."

Paddy Mudge held her breath for a little distance, those two horses did spring away with such a whiz. When she was asked, "Where is Mr. Crump's store?" her breath came out in a great puff, and she had to draw it in again before she could answer:

"Down by the bridge, this side, and the school-house is just cross the bridge; and Mrs. Crump feels real bad about it, and so does he."

She was led right on to explain what it all meant, and it was curious how very much she knew about everybody.

"You must have ears," he said to her.

"Yes, sir." And then the sleigh was pulled up in front of Crump's store, and its driver got out to hitch his horses to the hitching-post.

Paddy was not one bit afraid of him, but she did wish she could see more of his face, so she should feel sure of knowing him again some other time. He was short and fat, and he wore an overcoat that came down to his feet. It had a fur collar that turned up around his neck, and the laps of his fur cap turned down over the collar, and the front of the cap came down to his nose. There was nothing of his face to be seen but the nose itself, big and red and hooked, and a pair of great gray eyes, one on each side of the nose, like other men's; but then he wore glasses, and Paddy said they were "all one twinkle."

In a minute more the furry man was examining the toys and candies in Mr. Crump's big window, and Mr. Crump told him he could have the whole lot for what they cost him.

"You don't say!" exclaimed the furry man. "All I want just now is a pound of candy for Paddy."

"Put it up in two papers, Mr. Crump," said Paddy—"one for me and one for Miranda Adams."

"Two pounds," said the furry man, "in two papers. I'd forgotten all about Miranda."

"She lives right on our way to Miss Hopkins," said Paddy; "and you needn't stop long. I can run in and leave it for her."

"Come along, Paddy," said the furry man; and when they got out by the sleigh he lifted her in as if she had been a kitten with two papers of candy between her fore-paws. When they stopped in front of old Mr. Adams's house Paddy heard him exclaim: "Log house, I declare! I see how it is about Christmas. This is a very new country; it's just settling up. I must see Miss Hopkins."

Paddy did not say anything in reply to that. She went straight to the door, and opened it without knocking, and put down the paper of candy on the floor, and shouted: "That's for Miranda. I must go and take care of the man. It's his present. He's real good, and he knows all about Christmas."

"Wish I did!" said the furry man.

Then she was in the sleigh again as if she had been a sort of bird and had hopped there, and before he could do many more questions and answers she said to him: "Miss Hopkins lives there. It's Deacon Graham's house, all but the little wing."

Paddy found herself compelled to stay in Deacon Graham's part of the house while the furry man went in and had a long talk with Miss Hopkins. After that she had a splendid, jingling sleigh-ride all the way home; but there was not one chance given her to guess what the furry man said to the school-ma'am. He drove right away when she got out, and her mother put the pound of candy into the closet, for fear it might be eaten up too fast.

Joe Heidelberg chopped his tree down, and set out with it all alone. It was a job to get it upon the sleds, and then it was hard pulling, until he came to where the road went close to a bend of the North Fork, and some of the boys saw him. He walked behind the sleds to steady the tree after that. Nobody would have thought that there were so many boys in that neighborhood as were pulling those sleds and giving orders about it before they got to the school-house.

Christmas morning came wonderfully. Nobody along the North Fork had ever before seen so clear and bright and beautiful a day, with such perfect sleighing. Besides, there was almost nothing in the world for anybody to do except to be happy if he had any real Christmas in him.

Joe Heidelberg and some of the other boys were at the school-house right away after their breakfasts, but they had put up the tree the day before. There it stood on the platform, and all that they could do with it now was to turn it around and back again, and guess which way it would shine the candles best.

The planks across the bench backs that were to serve as tables were all in their places, but there was nothing upon them until after the people began to arrive. It was not until after that, moreover, that Miss Hopkins had blankets and coverlets enough to darken the windows, or sheets to finish the great curtain across the room in front of the platform.

"Anyhow," said Joe, "we can make the old stove red-hot, and we can keep the dogs from fighting on Christmas Day."

It was great, and everybody said so, when the tables began to stop looking so bare and plucky and hungry. Miss Hopkins was looking at them, when Paddy Mudge said to her:

"There's nine prairie-chickens already, and there's more a-coming, besides the other chickens and the rabbits, and a whole bag of apples and some doughnuts."

There was something or other the matter with Miss Hopkins. Her face was pretty good-looking at any time, but it seemed particularly rosy that morning, and her mouth was all one ripple of smiles.

"None of us boys and girls must touch anything on the tables till after the curtain drops," said Jerusha Langworthy. "They're beautiful now. Just look at them."

So they were, for they represented the very best that the new settlers on the North Fork could do for the great Christmas at the school-house. There was a great plenty of corn bread, but not anything like enough butter.

The rope across the room in front of the platform was now all hung with sheets, pinned together at the edges, and it made the best kind of a curtain. Nobody could guess what was going on behind it, and Miss Hopkins had promised that there would be a real Santa Claus. Some people said it was going to be Joe Heidelberg dressed up, and now he was suddenly called for and disappeared behind the curtain. Then they heard him say, "Oh, my!" and cough and chuckle as if he were half choked.

"He's eating something nice," said Jerusha Langworthy, "and it isn't fair. I wish I was in there."

"It's time for me to go in," said Paddy Mudge. "They want me."

Her face was red and pale, both, and she crept under the curtain with her mouth and eyes wide open.

"Children," suddenly shouted Deacon Graham, "all of you that can sing, let us sing."

Everybody began with him, and you could not even hear the plates chatter while that hymn was going on.

"Now, boys," called out Miss Hopkins, from away in there among the mysteries, and Bob Langworthy at once exclaimed:

"That means to darken up the windows. It's a coming, boys! Christmas is a-coming."

"We're going to have one this time, sure."

Nobody knew just why, but Deacon Graham was starting another hymn, and a loud one, at the very moment when there came a sound of sleigh-bells, going around the school-house to the platform end. Then the door at that end flew open, and a gust of cold air almost blew down the curtain. It was awful to be so nearly in the dark in the daytime when such things were going on, and some of the people found it very hard to sit still. Right between two of the stanzas of that hymn everybody heard Paddy Mudge's voice again and again, and it sounded a good deal as if she were trying to crow.

"Miss Hopkins is lighting the candles now," whispered Jerusha Langworthy. "There won't be anything else except them on the tree, but it'll be splendid."

"Boys," rasped out Billy Graham, "look at the stove! The red-hot's going on up into the pipe. We must throw in some more wood, and see how high we can make it climb."

"Hush!" said his mother. "Miss Hopkins is saying something in there."

Even Mrs. Graham herself did not know that her husband was under instructions to "keep them singing hard all the time." The hymn he was now on was a long one, and the next stanza of it poured out and drowned whatever talk was leaking through the curtain.

During all that time there had really been a great deal going forward upon and around the platform. The Christmas tree reached to the very ceiling, and its branches were uncommonly wide, and there was a perfect extravagance of half-candles tied to them every where. There was no thing but half-candles until after the sleigh-bells came jingling around the house, and Paddy Mudge and Joe Heidelberg were called in to help Miss Hopkins. Four other boys and three girls had to be sent out, and neither of them heard Miss Hopkins say to herself:

"Paddy can keep her mouth shut, and so can Joe, but not one of them could for a minute."

The people out there in the dark began to see one another as the candles on the tree were lighted and the light shone through the curtain, and Wash Martin got his ears boxed for going up to peep through. His mother said that nobody could blame him, considering what an awful bustle was going on inside there, and Deacon Graham struck up "Old Hundred" tremendously. Then everybody stood up, and at the end of the last line they heard Paddy Mudge say:

"FIRST A GIRL, AND THEN A BOY, BY TURNS."

"Now, Miss Hopkins, if it doesn't break down—"

"Ready, Joe?" said Miss Hopkins, very loudly. "All ready, Paddy? Now, one, two, three—drop!"

"Ah—ah—ah—h!" was the first sound that was heard. It came from every long drawn breath in the whole school house, and then a small boy who was standing so near the stove that his trousers were scorching gave a sort of hot dance, and called out, "Billy!"

"Wish you merry Christmas!" almost laughed a deep hoarse voice from just in front of the tree. And Paddy Mudge stood close by that voice and shouted,

"Hurrah for Santa Claus!"

Nobody else could hurrah at all for looking at that perfect blaze of wonder. All the candles were well a burning when the curtain fell, and they had a sort of miracle to shine upon.

"Everything old Crump had, sure as you live!" said Wash Martin.

All was there, sure enough, with some other things that had never been inside of Mr. Crump's store. There were three big frosted cakes on the table at one side of the tree. The tree itself was hung all over with little white parcels, and little colored parcels, and toys, and skates, and there were sleds and other things scattered around it. It was just the craziest thing to look at that had ever been seen along the North Fork.

Right in front of the tree stood a little fat mount-in of wolf-skins, with a fur cap and a long white beard, and the deep hoarse voice came out through the beard. "Children, step up as your names are called, and if anybody isn't called for, let him say so. Now, Paddy, read the list."

"Jerusha Langworthy," began Paddy.

And Jerusha came up all of a tremble, to go back with her hands full. Paddy read another name, and another, as fast as the furry man nudged her; and first it was a girl, and then it was a boy, by turns. They all came forward on tiptoe, and with very red faces. Some of them tried to say, "Thank you, sir," and said it huskily, and some could not get it out at all. The furry man said something or other, very chirpily, to each as they came.

"All done?" he shouted at last. "Now, Miss Hopkins, the Christmas Carol."

Never before had the children of the North Fork sung as they sang that carol. The furry man beat time to it with his hands and feet as he stepped slowly back till he was nearly behind the tree. On went the singing, and now his left hand touched the latch of the door. Just as it died away he lifted his right hand very high, and said: "Children, don't any of you ever forget it—it is written, 'AND THEY BROUGHT HIM GIFTS.'"

The door he was touching flew open, and before anybody knew what to say or do there was a sudden jingle of sleigh-bells and a sound of rapidly trotting hoofs, and Paddy's Santa Claus had disappeared. There was a great time after that, and the cake was all eaten up; but Miss Hopkins knew nothing, and Mr. Crump knew nothing, and Paddy Mudge said he told her that he came from the East, and she thought he must be one of the Wise Men. Perhaps he was, for as he drove away he remarked to himself: "It's worth while to be rich now and then, but I never before got quite so much for a little money. Hurrah for Christmas!"

WRITING THE INVITATIONS TO THE CHRISTMAS TREE.

THE "LONELY LADY'S" CHRISTMAS.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

Part E.

"DOLLY! Dolly! wake up; it's after five,"
 "What if it is?" Down went Dolly's curly head under the apology for bedeloths.

But Val, the elder sister, continued: "It's no use, Dolly; you'll have to get up, you know. Come; the coffee is nearly made. Don't you smell it?"

This brought the little golden head on the cot slowly around; a pair of merry if only half-awakened blue eyes appeared above the old blanket, and surveyed Valerie's brisk little figure, the attic-room, and the coffee-pot boiling on a small kerosene stove, with some satisfaction.

"Come; and don't wake mother." Valerie pined her old frock together, and moved back to the stove, while Dolly made a heroic bound out of bed, and began dressing as only a little girl on a bitter December morning in a fireless room can dress: clothes flung on, hands and face washed in a few seconds, and hair brushed as though by a gymnastic feat. All the while, however, Dolly's eyes were directed toward the breakfast Valerie's cold fingers were preparing, for the younger of the two little Morisons had, as Val often remarked with a sigh, an "appetite for twenty." But what could you expect? Was ten-year-old Dolly Morison not human? And work as hard as she and her sister might in the shirt factory, had they not young blood in their veins, healthy appetites, and natural childish longings?

And this was Christmas-time too—time to be merry and hungry, and wish for all sorts of comforts and delights, as Dolly could have told you, even though you had hard work to get three meals a day, and were obliged to work eight hours in a factory, and then climb four flights of stairs to an attic where your poor mother had labored painfully all day. But Dolly and Val could remember better times—at least Val could—what Dolly called "Christmas-tree times"; and Valerie had a happy way of telling stories which delighted the young people at the factory, and which, with her odd knack in doing services for this one and that, her tact and her fun, and her ready good-humor, made her a favorite and a leader among her own circle. Val's word was law in the room where she and Dolly sewed on cuffs and buttons at ten cents a dozen shirts, and so when she had declared the day before to a select few that she had a "scheme for some Christmas fun," not one but went home happier for it, although not even to Dolly had Val as yet confided any details of her plan. But she had informed the younger sister that if she would be up half an hour earlier on this morning she should hear of it.

"Tell me now," Dolly whispered, while she sipped at the weak hot coffee Valerie had prepared.

"Wait until we are out," returned Val. "I have to show you something first."

And so Dolly had to be content to do as Val said, but something in the older girl's twinkling glance showed that success was to come of her scheme, whatever it might be, and Dolly hurried after her down the rickety old stairs, almost forgetting how bitterly cold it was, how few warm things she had on, and what a long bleak walk it was to the factory.

Their walk took them through some of the best streets of the New England town, past many houses where, under soft blankets and on comfortable beds, children of their own age were lying fast asleep, not to be wakened or disturbed until nature had had her full measure of rest; and Dolly often sighed as she glanced up at some of these windows where, later in the day, young faces were to be seen, wishing she and Val ever could come in for the "good times" that she felt sure were to be had there.

Dolly was a soft, round-faced little thing, who looked just made for petting and caressing, for plenty to eat and drink, warm clothing, and bright, pleasant surroundings. Valerie was taller and thinner, and much more independent; but if she had only had her way she would have loaded her little sister with all the good things of this earth, and made her life one long gala day of brightness and rejoicing. Val never minded how hard she worked; somehow her active, clever fingers seemed made for it, just as her dark eyes seemed made to flash out a bright glance on some tired comrade, to grow pitiful and gentle when some one was in trouble, to gleam with indignation when some one was injured or overburdened; but Dolly—pretty "blue and gold" little Dolly!—how entirely out of sorts with everything natural did it look to see her bending her curly head over a great piece of coarse calico, to see her pretty little mouth screwed to one side in the effort to get her needle through the buttons, or to watch her babyish fingers struggling with the cuffs Valerie so often had to baste on for her, or even to sew over again! Sometimes Dolly's tears splashed down upon her work, and then Valerie could stand it no longer. Down would go the elder sister's sewing, Dolly's work was taken swiftly out of her hands, and Dolly herself sent out on one excuse or another, while Val staid after-hours and did the little sister's work when her own was finished.

So many of these sudden gusts of tears had fallen lately that Valerie had decided upon some definite Christmas festivity just among themselves. Dolly for once should know what "Merry Christmas" meant.

"There, Dolly," said Val, suddenly putting her hand on her little sister's arm; "do you see that little sort of shed—near the lonely lady's house?"

Dolly looked. In the dim light of the winter morning she looked at the big brown house standing back from the road which Val had named the "lonely lady's," because they had seen its solitary occupant so often standing in her window, or going to and from her carriage, always alone, always with an expression on her handsome face of such weariness and fatigue. The children did not think she was ill. She walked firmly, holding her head high; she spoke—giving orders to the footman or others—in a clear, sweet, healthful voice; but she was lonely. Val was sure of that, and Dolly accepted it because Val said so. I wonder what Mrs. Vandyke, the wealthy widow lady, whose nephew owned the very factory in which they worked, would have thought had she but known that the two little children trudging back and forth often stopped to look at her—to pity her!—and that they named her the "lonely lady."

Not far from the house, just where the roadway took a bend, was an old long-unused shed. It had some windows, but no longer any panes of glass, and why it had been allowed to stand there in that way so long tenanted nobody knew. But Val's keen glance had detected it, had seen in it just what she needed. In that shed she and Dolly would have a Christmas tree, and to-day she meant to unfold her plan and get a few friends to join them.

Dolly listened breathless; her color came and went; as, following Val, she entered the little building and looked around at the bare walls, while Val said, in a prompt voice: "Here we'll put the tree up. Johnny Baker will get one for us. Only a little one, but there shall be things for every one."

"What things?" said Dolly.

"Oh, something; we'll get something. See here; I've made a list of twenty children in the factory."

Val perched herself on an old ledge under one of the windows, and pulled from her pocket a piece of brown wrapping paper on which she had written the list of names.

"I don't believe any of these would have a thing for Christmas, so I chose them," she announced to Dolly, pulling her skirts down to make her knees and ankles if possible warmer, "and, Dolly, you know our hymns? Well, we must sing them. Oh dear—"

"What?" said Dolly.

"We ought to have some candles to stick in," said Val, in momentary despair, and turning around to regard the place which she intended the tree to occupy with a frown between her straight little eyebrows.

"We can ask Mr. Jones for some."

"I suppose so," said Val, springing down from her perch. "Now, Dolly, you see we will have so little for the presents that we'll have to do lots for the s'prise part of it, so don't say a word to any one, will you?"

Dolly promised. But all that day it was hard work to keep her word, for so many in the factory said, "What are you thinking of, Dolly?" or "What's the matter with Val? she's up to something!" that it was hard not to burst forth with details of their secret. At dinner-time Val rushed to Dolly with news that Mr. Jones had promised her five candles.

"When he said what would I give for them," said Val, gleefully, "I told him an invitation to a party. You ought to have seen his look."

"But the presents, Val," said Dolly, whose face all day had looked like a happy cherub's.

"Oh, they'll come! I've a whole lot to show you when we get home."

Mrs. Morison had gone out to work for a "long day," and so when the children got back to the attic at half past six they had it to themselves, and Val displayed her treasures. I wonder what many young people in Dyketown would have thought of them: odds and ends of calicoes—some long enough for aprons, others only fit for patchwork. These Brumley, the foreman, had given Val. Then some bits of silk which belonged in the department where the jerseys were made, and dozens of empty spools.

"What are those for?" queried Dolly.

"You'll see," said Val. And Dolly did see the next day when at dinner-time Johnny Baker and Val went to work, fastening them for wheels on to boxes, and then making toy carts of them, or stringing the smallest ones and painting them in gay colors, while some were cut up into rounds and glued on to ornament the button boxes the foreman in the upper room had given Val. Val and Johnny cut up the button cards into paper dolls and furniture, and Val dressed some of the dolls in calico, while Johnny drew faces and colored heads of hair with the pencils he had for marking off "lots."

It would have been well worth any one's time to have watched Val and her friends the next few days. How they contrived to make so much out of a little I can hardly explain; but gradually the collection of presents accumulated until a very fair show was made, and then as they were going home one cold starlight night Johnny Baker and Val got the tree into its place in the old shed.

The day had been a very tiring one at the factory; Val had worked hard, not only for herself, but for others, and it had been rather difficult to feel cheerful; but when Johnny set up the little fir-tree he had contrived to get from the woods near his own house, and Val thought how her Christmas party would please the children in the factory, her spirits rose, and she almost forgot how cold her fingers were as she helped Johnny fit the tree into a little round box he had cut a hole in for that purpose.

"I don't suppose we could get a fire going," said Dolly, ruefully, and Val shook her head, and answered:

"They're not so used to fires, though, that they can't do without them. Now see here, Dolly: I'm going to write the invitations."

As it was late and dark, Val allowed the use of one of the candles, and this, stuck into an old box cover, illuminated the three little heads—Dolly's curls, Johnny's wild locks, and Val's rather rough dark hair, all brought near together, while Val, on some of the wrapping-paper obtained at the factory, wrote the invitations.

"Johnny Baker and Val and Dolly Morison invite you to their Christmas-tree party Christmas-Eve next Tuesday."

"That's about it," said Val, regarding her work with some pride and deliberation. "We'll get twenty written out easy enough."

Val lifted her head at this point and looked out of the old window across the stretch of wintry lawn to the lonely lady's house—to the library window, within which she could see ruddy beams of fire-light, and could guess what fine objects the glow brought to view. Only odd bits were ever disclosed to the two children who so compassionated the prosperous Mrs. Vandyke—the frame of a picture, the rich curve of an old sofa, the corner of a table; but they suggested, so much, even to these little untalented minds, that it was surprising the pity for her only grew.

Dolly pulled Valerie's dress.

"What are you thinking of, Val?" she whispered. Johnny had returned to another inspection of the tree, and Valerie bent over her little sister, saying in a low tone: "Dolly, I guess we'll ask her—the poor lonely lady. I don't believe any one is ever with her, or she ever has a Christmas tree."

Mrs. Vandyke was alone in her fine old house that December evening, trying to while away the twilight hours which were to her full of so many sad memories. Husband and children had been swept away from her within the space of two short weeks by a fever raging in the town five years before, and since that time, refusing all offers of companionship and consolation, the broken-hearted woman had shut herself more than ever away from the world, closing her door and her heart as well, believing that the weight of her bereavement, the dignity of such unlooked-for sorrow, gave her the right to this silence and seclusion.

Years before, her half-sister had married not overprosperously, and settled in a neighboring town, and being left a widow with two little girls and one son, had written to Mrs. Vandyke asking "advice." Mrs. Vandyke gave it liberally, sending her a check for seven hundred dollars, and promising her the same annually until the girls should be educated, and then placing the lad in business, after that she would decide what else could be done; but in all of this the kindness had only been from a sense of duty; there was no opening of the closed doors of her heart, no impulse of tenderness and affection; and Dorothea and Irene Williams, and their half-grown-up cousin Adelaide, used to wonder why Aunt Irene was not more loving, why it seemed so hard to accept the gifts which never failed to reach them for Christmas and New-Year's.

There was no heart in them; even Mrs. Vandyke herself realized this with a sigh. The season had lost all its fine flavor since her own little son and daughter—her black-eyed little Philip and golden-haired little Tessie—had been taken from her. "They were mine," the widow would say to herself in her lonely hours; "why could not God have left them to me a little longer?" And meanwhile the proud heart hardened, the cold hands closed tighter and drew back further from friendly grasps, and as the two poor little children in the factory had discovered, she was indeed lonely and to be pitied.

The fire-light flashed upon many beautiful objects in her library that evening, and on the figure of the "lonely lady" herself, richly dressed, with her white hands clasped listlessly, shining with jewels, her face cold and melancholy even in the comforting glow; and yet there was something in it which would appeal strongly to a tender heart for sympathy. I think quick little Val, for all her poverty and the hardships of her young life, would have understood what to say to the "lonely lady" that moment if she had been near her.

BRIGHTIE'S CHRISTMAS CLUB.

BY ALICE M. KELLOGG

IV.

ALL the members of the Christmas Club were chatting busily over the register at school.

"This afternoon is to be our last meeting," said Sadie. "It doesn't seem as if it were four weeks since Brightie asked us to come that first Friday to her house."

"I wish Christmas would come sooner now," said Mabel. "I have made such pretty presents for our family!—with Aunt Jennie's help," she added.

"Mamma said we must not forget to thank Brightie's aunt for helping us," said Mabel's sister.

"She has been too lovely for anything, giving her aftermoons to us girls, and showing us how to make so many different things," said Daisy, with enthusiasm.

"Wasn't it nice of her to let us all call her Aunt Jennie?" asked Nell. "It made me feel at home with her right away. She has the sweetest voice—"

"And the loveliest face—" interrupted Sadie.

"And the pleasantest manner—" put in Mabel's sister.

"—Of any one we know," came in one breath from all the six members of the club as they parted to take their places in the history class.

A stranger might not have thought Aunt Jennie the embodiment of all the graces that had been attributed to her, but the hearts of young school-girls are easily won by kindness and attention, and Brightie's aunt was securely placed in their affections.

At Brightie's suggestion each member of the club brought the articles she had made at the previous meetings, and the room looked like a fair, so covered were the tables and chairs with photograph cases, card holders, scent bags, match holders, aprons, pen-wipers, calendars, umbrella cases, and bags of every description.

The quietly organized little band of workers had accomplished a great deal by steady and careful endeavor.

"To-day, I believe, you were each to ask me how to make some particular thing; isn't that so?" inquired Aunt Jennie. "But, first, I have just made a card case that you must see. Two pieces of card-board covered with fine brown linen, two strips sewed inside of one side, and one wide one inside the other. See how convenient for the pocket, folding together as it does, and taking so little room. Now, Mabel, you begin."

"I saw a plush bag for holding opera-glasses," said Mabel. "I would like to make one ever so much."

Aunt Jennie smiled. "I made one not long ago, so I can show you very quickly, Mabel.

"Stand your opera-glasses on some stiff pasteboard, and pencil around the bottom of them. Cut out the figure thus made, which will look like two heels. Cut two pieces of pasteboard like this. Cut a piece of plush and of silk (the same color) large enough to go all around the pasteboard figure, and three inches taller than the glasses are when closed. Cover the pieces of pasteboard, one with plush and the other with silk. Sew the two bags up, basting the silk one inside. Sew the plush securely to the plush-covered board, and baste the silk lining over these stitches. Then with strong glue fasten the silk-covered board over the stitches. Turn the bag right side out. Sew the tops neatly together, and run sewing silk three times around, an inch and a half from the top, for the silk cord drawing-strings to be run through. If you make this neatly, Mabel, you will be surprised to see how handsome your case will look. Now, Daisy, how can I help you?"

GRANDMA'S KNITTING BAG.

"I want to make something for Baby Kitty, but I can't think what," replied Daisy, with a puzzled expression.

"Why not make her a pretty blanket of white flannel? Cut it just the size you want, and bind it all around with blue ribbon. Have a pattern stamped on it, and the word 'Baby' in one corner. Then embroider or outline this with blue floss. Now, Nellie?"

"Mother needs a new laundry bag, and I'd like to make something different from her old one," replied Nellie.

"Here is something pretty and new," began Aunt Jennie. "Buy two lengths of figured cretonne or calico a yard and a quarter in length, unlike if possible. Divide each in the middle lengthwise. Cut one end of each length in a point. Sew them together, and you will have a bag with a pointed end. Cut a strip of calico, and make a bow for this. Hem the top in a three-inch hem, and run two extra threads half an inch apart above the hemming. These are for the drawing-strings, which should be of strong tape. It is simple, and is really the shape of an ornamental bag for the arm, but very roomy for your purpose, and very pretty in color wherever hung."

Lulu had her hand up before Aunt Jennie had ceased speaking, and when she met her inquiring look, said, hurriedly, "A whisk-broom holder for me, please."

"Another bag, I declare!" exclaimed Daisy.

"Here is quite a novel way to make a whisk-broom holder," replied Aunt Jennie. "A fan, with the wire taken from the bottom and folded in the middle; a piece of bonnet wire doubled, run through the holes, and twisted securely. Also run another doubled wire between the fan sticks close to the paper. Cover this with narrow satin ribbon passed out and in between the sticks, and tied with a bow in front. A piece of pasteboard, V shaped, covered with linen, and neatly overlapped on the edges, forms the back. Bore holes in this, and in the fan sticks also at top and bottom, and fasten together with wires."

"Splendid!" exclaimed Lulu, as the holder grew to completion in Aunt Jennie's hand; "the very thing to hang in our hall. But I'm not going to tell whom I shall give it to," she added, with a toss of her curls.

"I know," said Bertha, saucily. "But, Aunt Jennie, I'm the last, and there isn't much time, and I want a bag for grandma's knitting-ball."

"Here is a pretty one, and very new. That silk handkerchief about your neck would make one, but of course you must have a fresh one. Baste the four sides of the handkerchief down for a hem two inches wide, rounding the corners. These four corners will hang down like tabs, when three runnings of silk are sewed on the edge of the hem. Run in a yard of lustrating ribbon on each side to draw up snugly, and grandma's ball will be secure."

As she finished speaking, the door opened, and Brightie's mother appeared, followed by the servant with a tray.

"Oh, mamma, what a surprise!" screamed Brightie, quite overcome with the seven dishes of ice-cream, which were speedily monopolized by the little group.

When the clock struck five, none of the party were in haste to go, although they began to gather their work together. When Brightie's mother proposed that the carriage should take them all home, their faces brightened, and quickly donning hoods and cloaks, with kisses and farewells the little Christmas Club dissolved.

HOW THEOPHILUS FISHED SANTA CLAUS OUT OF THE SEA.

BY MARY E. VANDYNE

I.

"It seems as if I always feel it more at Christmas than at any other time of the year."

"It is too bad, Mary. I can't bear to have the children disappointed."

"Aren't we really going to have any Christmas, mamma? Won't Santa Claus really come?"

"I'm afraid not, dear. Oh! oh-h-h! What was that? What was it?"

Mrs. Miller sprang to her feet nearly frightened into a nervous attack; her husband looked sharply around, and the children—there were four of them—flew in all directions, adding their voices to the general tumult.

The cause of all this disturbance was a noise—such a remarkable noise!—a noise that seemed unlike any that had ever fallen upon the human ear before, and it seemed to come from directly under the sofa.

"Boo-hoo-hoo!" it sounded. "Boo-hoo-hoo-hoo-hoo! Boo-hoo-boo-hoo!" louder and louder.

"Oh my!" sighed Mrs. Miller, as something familiar in the sound seemed to strike her, "it's Theophilus."

"Why, of course it's Toph," added the eldest boy Charlie. The others, seeing the alarm subside, began to laugh—all but Mr. Miller.

"Come out of there, you young scamp," he said.

"I—I—I darasn't. Boo-hoo-hoo-hoo-hoo!"

"Stop that noise at once and come."

Mr. Miller was accustomed to obedience, and this time the offender thought it best to make his appearance.

Such an appearance as it was! Theophilus, called Toph for short, was a negro boy of ten. He was not as black as ink, but he was just as black as a negro boy could be. His hair curled so tightly that only a madman would have thought of putting a comb through it. His eyes were as bright as polished coals, and they in their blackness and his teeth in their whiteness shone and sparkled almost like diamonds. Toph was very handsome to look at ordinarily; now he was a pitiful object. His face wore the ashen-gray look that with his race passes for pallor; the tears streamed down his cheeks.

"What were you doing there?"

"N-n-nuffin'."

"What brought you into this room?"

"I—I—I was l-l-onesome."

Mr. Miller smiled. Toph might have been lonesome. He was accustomed to sharing nearly everything with the other children but their meals. Just now there was fearful enmity between Toph and the ruling power of the kitchen. The desire for human companionship had perhaps led him to seek it in the dining-room.

"Why did you make that horrible noise?"

Toph's tears flowed afresh.

"Cause I heard Missus say that Kismus ain't coming. Boo-hoo-hoo-hoo-hoo!"

"Stop!"

Mr. Miller looked at Theophilus with the expression of a man who has endured all he can.

"Mary—to his wife—"this boy must be sent away."

"I'm afraid so," Mrs. Miller sighed.

"W-w-what for?" sobbed Toph.

"Who does all the mischief in this place?"

"M-m-me."

"Yes, 'Me.'" Mr. Miller could not help smiling. "Yes, Toph, it is you who keep the household in commotion. It was you who set fire to the corn rick and nearly burned us out of house and home; you who ate up all the custard when the minister was coming to dinner; you who put the kitten in the well so that we nearly died of thirst before it could be cleaned out and the water used. Now you nearly set Dinah distracted with your pranks in the kitchen, and this morning you have ruined our breakfast and probably made Mrs. Miller ill. Toph, you must go. To-morrow I'll take you back to the settlement."

Theophilus left the room with his heart quite broken. Big sobs shook his breast, and the tears rained down.

"Must Toph really go, mamma?" asked Charlie, while Ted and Johnnie and Bertha listened eagerly. Toph was dear to them all.

"I'm afraid so, dear. The fact is, we can't afford to keep him. Toph eats a great deal, and we are very poor, and growing poorer every day."

"Is it all Uncle Alick's fault?"

"Uncle Alick's fault? Why do you ask such a question?"

"Didn't you say one day, mamma, that if Uncle Alick had done differently, we would have been well off?"

"Yes, I said so."

"They are old enough to understand the matter," said Mr. Miller.

"Do tell us about it, mamma."

"There isn't much to tell, dear. Your father and I have always had a sad struggle to get along. Before you were born, Uncle Alick lived with us. He got very tired of our life here, and one day he went away to seek his fortune, promising that if he found it, he would come back and share it with us. For years we never heard of him, but something like eighteen months ago a letter came saying that he had been successful. He had made a great deal of money quite suddenly. He had invested it abroad, thinking it a safer plan. After some time he wrote again, saying that he was coming over to see us. Then news came that the ship on which he sailed was lost, and Uncle Alick with it. We sent to London, and tried every means to find the property. We had, of course, nothing but Alick's letter to show that it existed. We could find no trace of anything. The business house he named as having charge of his papers and valuables denied their existence. Uncle Alick has never been heard from, and we can find no trace that he ever owned anything. Every year we grow poorer, and so it is that this season we think Christmas will fail to come to us."

Mrs. Miller looked round at a circle of very grave faces. It certainly was hard—four little folk, and no Santa Claus. If only Uncle Alick had not been lost at sea!

In the mean time how was it with Toph? That young man had gone into the kitchen very disconsolate. His first greeting to Dinah was, "Yer needn't trouble 'bout me no mo'."

"Why not? Ain't yer born to wear de life out o' some 'un, and ain't dat some 'un me?"

"No, I ain't."

"What is yer, den?—a sort of lubly honey blossom, jes a reg'lar blessin' to dose yer c'nnected wid?" This was sarcasm. Dinah's wrath broke out. "Hi! yer good-fur-not'in' no-count little niggah! Git out o' here, Seat!"

Toph went. His bearing was very forlorn and the tears fell fast. The rest of the day he spent in wandering about the house and grounds saying farewell to his old haunts. The children, Charlie at their head, did the best they could to console him.

Everything was done that could be done by the family to soften the blow, but there was no averting it. When morning came, Mr. Miller was ready, and so was Toph. With his bundle of belongings he was helped into the wagon by Charlie, amid a series of sad good-byes. Even Dinah forgave the departing sinner, and put up a nice luncheon for him. Toph was carried off to the settlement.

II.

Toph had been a member of Mr. Miller's family for three years. He was a relic of the hired man Sam and Maum Liza. The latter had been Mrs. Miller's cook. When she died and left her nine-year-old pickaninny behind her. Mr. Miller had kept the boy on his father's account. But Sam had been among the first of Mr. Miller's prosperous belongings to retire. Toph had been left principally because his father had not known what to do with him. Now that it had been found impossible to keep him longer, the only disposition that could possibly be made of him was to send him away to a negro settlement some ten miles off, where Sam had some relatives. Toph was delivered into the hands of an aunt as black as himself, and bearing some resemblance to the boy.

Toph was a miserable boy. Life was a very different business in Aunt Chloe's cabin from what it had been in the Millers' pleasant home. There was no shirking now, and very little mischief to get into. Toph had to work. There were sticks to be gathered for Aunt Chloe's fire, there were errands to be run, and there was food to be provided. Aunt Chloe had the "rheumatic," and there were very often days when but for Toph's ingenuity they might have gone hungry. Toph did odd jobs for anybody who would employ him, now and then he snared a rabbit. Fortunately, too, the settlement was near the sea and at the mouth of a shallow river. Toph was a pretty good fisherman, and many a meal he coaxed out of the blue waters for himself and Aunt Chloe, when but for his activity they might have gone hungry.

As December drew near, Toph became very melancholy. What should he do? Everybody had forgotten him. Even Charlie Miller, his great friend and ally, had learned by this time how to get along without him. Life at the settlement was unendurable; nothing but hunting for fire-wood, fishing, and running errands for Aunt Chloe. Was there no way of getting back to the Millers? Toph felt that if he didn't accomplish it in some way he should die. After all, dying wouldn't be so bad. What a big fuss was made about people when they died! Perhaps if he was dead somebody would remember him. The idea was quite a new one. What a splendid way out of all his difficulties it would be!

"I tink," says Toph to himself, "I'll jes go down to the sea an' drown myself. Den dey'll all be sorry. Dey'll find out how nice I is, jes as dey always do when people die."

Toph took his way to the sea on suicide intent, but it was to be remarked that as he went he whistled. There were, indeed, a great many things to attract his attention. Winter though it was, there were a few animals about. Now and then a squirrel out for an airing ran across his path. Now a friendly dog belonging to some neighbor looked at him kindly. He spied a chicken or two, and sent a stick flying at them by way of diversion. Presently Toph arrived at the shore, and looked at the water.

"It looks awful cold."

Certainly it did. Toph, like the rest of his race, loved to be warm. It would certainly be a mistake to plunge into those freezing waters. The very foam on the crested waves looked like snow. Toph hated even to wash his face. How much worse it would be to be wet all over when the thermometer was nearly down to zero, and no fire to warm himself by anywhere about!

"Hi! what's dat?"

Toph spied something knocking about among the waves. It seemed to be a square object, heavy, but not too heavy to float. Was it a box, and what might there be in it? A great many ships were wrecked off the coast near which Toph and his friends the Millers lived. This object had probably come from one of them.

Thoughts of desperate deeds vanished from Toph's mind. His attention was concentrated upon that square box. A wave brought it nearer.

"Sho's yer born, it's a trunk."

Toph knew what a trunk was. There were several in the Millers' household. People always used trunks when they travelled. He had seen Charlie Miller sent away to school with a trunk. He, Toph, would like very much to have a trunk to go travelling with. Not that he expected to travel much. Still, he might as well have the trunk. The only point now was to get hold of it.

Somehow this was accomplished more easily than might have been expected. That trunk seemed determined to come ashore. It even showed an inclination to land itself at Toph's feet. All that was necessary was for him to wait until a wave brought it inland, then give it a good push up the beach with all his strength, and put a stone under it to keep it from being carried back into deeper water. The tide was rising, and after the above operation had been performed several times, Toph was in possession of his treasure.

Presently he turned his attention to the lock. A stone conquered it, and the contents were revealed to view. What were they? Some clothing such as men wear—shirts, under-shirts, collars, coats, and trousers; little traps such as shaving-brushes, tooth-brushes, hair-brushes, a few books, and a package of papers.

Toph despised books and papers. They reminded him of the school Mrs. Miller had sent him to. The clothes were of no use; he could not wear them for years. Brushes! Toph grinned. What use were they to him? Really the contents of that trunk were very disappointing. There was nothing about his find at all satisfactory but the trunk itself. It was a small one, such as travellers keep in their state rooms. Toph turned the contents out, and began to look them over. Presently he was interrupted by a tall man who stood beside him.

"Well, what are you about?"

"I'm all right. What you doin' watchin' me?"

"Tryin' to find out what mischief you are in."

"I ain't in no mischief."

"Then give me that bundle"—pointing to one Toph had just laid down.

Reluctantly Toph surrendered it. The stranger untied a string, and began to look over some papers. They were very wet, but still readable.

"Mr. Alexander Miller," said the stranger, reflectively.

"Hi!" said Toph. "Gimme dat."

"What for?"

"You said Miller, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"Well, I know Mr. Miller and Mrs. Miller, and if dere's any Miller about dem tings, I knows deir owners, and I wants to take 'em home."

After this there was a long discussion between Toph and the stranger.

III.

It was two days before Christmas. Charlie Miller was standing at the gate of his home. There was a very sad look on his face. He had just been explaining to Johnnie and Bertha and Ned that Santa Claus certainly was not coming. Was it not enough to make any group of children look grave?

"Why, there's Toph!" A prolonged shriek came from Johnnie.

"So it is!"

"So it is!"

"So it is!"

A prolonged series of shrieks from all.

"Mamma! Papa! Come—come quick! It's Toph come back, and in a wagon with a gentleman. And with a trunk!"

In a few minutes Mr. and Mrs. Miller had welcomed their visitor. The stranger had drawn Mr. Miller aside, while the children were playing Toph with questions.

"Oh, Toph, how did you get here? What brought you back?"

"The trunk," answered Toph.

"Tell us all about it," demanded Johnnie.

Toph began, but was interrupted by Mr. Miller's re-

"THE FACT IS THAT TOPH HAS FISHED HIM UP FROM THE SEA."

turn. What did that strange look on his face mean? He certainly was not sorry about anything. It even seemed as if he might be glad, and yet he was very grave. Mrs. Miller looked at him, and the tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Oh, papa, do tell us what has happened!"

"Come here, Toph." He drew the boy toward him, and placed his arm about him.

"We—we must all thank Toph," he began. "We told you, did we not, little ones, that Santa Claus wasn't coming? Well, he will come. The fact is that Toph has fished him up from the sea."

Oh! what a chorus of shouts there was! "Toph and Santa Claus! Santa Claus and Toph!" The voices rang out until Dinah came from the kitchen, and "clar'd to gracious dey'd raise de house."

When the story came to be told at length, Johnnie and Bertha were too little to understand, and Toph was quite puzzled, but to the rest it was all very clear. Uncle Alick had been quite as good as his word. He had made a great deal of money. He had put the papers that represented it into the care of a banker in London, taking a receipt for them. Then he started for America with the precious receipt in his trunk. The ship was wrecked and poor Uncle Alick was lost forever. But the little state-room trunk had floated ashore, and Toph had been the one to find it.

The gentleman who had seen him examining his treasure happened to be a clergyman staying at a little town near by, who was walking on the beach for his health. He it was who had examined the contents of the trunk, listened to Toph's story, and then concluded that Toph's friends, the Millers, were the ones most interested in this offering of the sea. When his vacation ended he had taken pains to bring Toph, trunk, and all back to his old friends.

What a hero Toph was! He had fished up Santa Claus, and the whole house must be made ready for his reception.

While this was being done, Mr. Miller made a journey to New York. With that precious receipt in his hand there was no trouble in proving the whereabouts of Uncle Alick's money, and also their claim to it.

Poor Uncle Alick! It would have been nice to have had him come back, but the next best thing to that was to have the poverty that worried papa so much and kept mamma so pale and anxious driven away forever. To the little folk Uncle Alick was a stranger, and it was hard for them to see why mamma wore such black dresses and cried so much for two whole weeks.

But as for Charlie and Ted and Johnnie and Bertha and Toph, they did not cry. In fact, how could they? Santa Claus had never been so liberal before. He seemed to bring a perfect shopful of velocipedes and Noah's arks, of steam-engines and locomotives that ran by clock-work, dolls that talked, and toys that performed wonders.

As for Toph, finding himself a hero and the benefactor of the family, he has since undertaken to live up to his position. He wears a suit of whole clothes every day; he has learned to read, and now he never, never, never tells lies or gets into any kind of mischief. When asked about his improvement, he says, "A gemman never does such tings, and I's been a gemman eber since I fished Santa Claus out ob de sea!"

THE RUGBY GAME OF FOOT-BALL.

BY ARTHUR BRISBANE.

THE best part of a boy's life, the hardest struggles, the greatest risks, and the biggest triumphs, have been missed by the man who has grown up without ever having played a rattling good game of foot-ball. Such a man may remember with pride his underhand pitching, or his skill in hooking cat-fish, and his luck in never letting them get away; he may recall the proud fact that he was the only boy who ever found a humming-bird's nest around where he lived; but what are all these things compared to the glorious recollections of your genuine foot-ball player. He can tell of whole seasons spent with never a spot between his ankles and his knees that was not black and blue. If he used to be a crack kicker, his memory is filled with pleasant recollections of the many times he kicked a goal from the middle of the field. Whenever he sees a young rooster grabbing a worm, and struggling to escape with the prize from the other chickens, he remembers how he used to squirm and dodge around over the frozen ground in the same way when he got hold of the ball; and if there is no one to be shocked at his undignified conduct, he will probably shout and yell and encourage the young rooster all he can. For the love of foot-ball is like a taste for buckwheat cakes—easy to get and hard to lose.

The glory of inventing the game probably belongs to the boys of England, and Rugby, one of the old English schools which did most to foster it, enjoys the honor of having had named after it the old-fashioned and very rough game, "Rugby," after which all the games now played are more or less closely patterned.

The principle of the game, as almost every boy knows, is to have a certain number of players divide into equal sides, and place the ball between them. Back of each set of players is some sort of a high obstruction called the goal. Each player tries his best to force the ball over the goal of his enemy, and works at the same time to prevent the enemy from driving the ball over the goal which he has undertaken to defend. The side which in a given time succeeds oftener in driving back the other, and in sending the ball flying over the rival goal, wins the game. This is the skeleton of the game, upon which has been fastened a body of rules and laws so complicated, that in our colleges to-day the students who want to be good foot-ball players have to spend almost as much time on that as on Latin, Greek, or any of the other things that are usually considered most deep and incomprehensible.

In the English game of Rugby there are fifteen players on each side, making thirty players on the field at once. The ball played with is shaped very much like an egg, and the rules allow the players to pick the ball up and run with it, to kick it along the ground, and, in fact, to do almost anything that will help along toward victory. The other English game—"the Association"—is a milder game than Rugby; the ball played with is quite round, and the art of the game consists in "dribbling" the ball across the field between the feet with such skill as to prevent others from capturing it and dribbling it back again. Players are not allowed to take the ball up in their arms, and this makes the game much less rough, as it does away with the necessity of jumping upon men who are running with the ball, tripping them up, charging them in the back, and other ways of inducing them to stop and rest.

The game that we play over here is perhaps the best of any. To go through a really fine game, such as is played between rival colleges, is very much like being in a smash-up on the railroad, with the only difference that the railroad smash-up is just a little safer than the other. The egg-shaped ball is played with, and when a man once picks it up and starts away with it, his duty is to keep on going until so many players are hanging to him that he can't go any further. Then, if possible, he should pass the ball backward to one of his own side, who will grab it and proceed to show what struggling he can do. The difference between our game and Rugby is that with us only eleven men play on each side, so that if you fall down you have the consolation of knowing that not more than eleven men will light on you at once.

The hardest and most exciting part of the game comes with the scrimmage. This occurs when a man is caught and held with the ball, which then belongs to neither side. All the players in the field, except the goal-keepers, or full-backs, gather round the spot where the ball ceased to be in active play, and each side forms a semi-circle, with backs to the goal and faces toward the enemy. The ball is dropped in the centre of the circle formed by the two sides, and then begins the struggle for its possession which is illustrated on page 93. The rushers, among whom are the biggest players, exert every muscle to rush through or over their opponents, driving the ball before them toward the rival goal, while the quarter-backs, usually the lightest, fleetest, and most expert players, bob nervously around on the outside of the scrimmage, eager for the opportunity to snatch the ball as it rolls out from the forest of legs, and scoot away with it. After a battle of a few seconds some sly individual seizes the ball, but before he can go two feet every solitary one of his rivals will pounce upon him and squeeze out his breath, and then the scrimmage begins all over again.

The great beauty of this game is that although English boys discovered it and Americans took it up, yet it is not any more English or American than it is French or German. No game is more widely spread among boys, unless it be Tag, the father of all games, which was probably played by the two sons of Adam as soon as they grew big enough to walk. If you visit the play-grounds in the Bois de Boulogne, outside of Paris, you will find the students of Chaptal College chasing wildly after foot-balls, with the long tails of their queer uniform coats flying out behind them. There are foot-balls flying around the play-grounds of almost every school in Germany, and wherever Englishmen live, on the Continent, at home, or in India, you will find this beloved game on top.

English and Americans are usually the best players, of course, but still that is not always the case. I remember that with the foot-ball team that came from Stuttgart, the capital of Württemberg, to play the foot-ball team of Heidelberg, there was a young German named Mertz. Mertz was poor, and unable to buy the gay costume usually worn; so he came upon the field dressed in a pair of yellow trousers and a gray flannel shirt. This made some of the spectators smile at Mertz, and it seemed to afford one gentleman very much amusement indeed. This was one of the Heidelberg players, a very swell English student, very tall and well dressed. He rode to the game on a bicycle, and gazed on Mertz through a single eyeglass screwed into his left eye.

But the gentleman with the eyeglass did not know Mertz as well as I did. That humble German had a powerful neck, almost as big around as his waist, his arms were like iron, and he could play foot-ball. Before our English friend had time to think, Mertz had rolled him over and over five or six times on the muddy field, and finally, taking the ball away from him, cantered away with it and made a beautiful run, scattering the Heidelberg team on both sides as he went. When the game was over, Mertz's flannel shirt was badly torn and his yellow trousers were covered with mud; but he had won the game, and the man with the single eyeglass was proud to shake hands with him.

American colleges have brought the game to a high point of excellence. Princeton College, by its recent victory over Yale, holds the foremost position, and is followed by Yale, Wesleyan, and the University of Pennsylvania in the order given.

TWO ARROWS:

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(Continued.)

SILE obeyed, without an idea of a reason for it, until Two Arrows took him by the arm and pointed away to the right toward the mountain range. They were on the crest of a high roll of ground, and could see for miles in some directions, except as the view was cut off by patches and strips of forest.

"Look! 'Pache!"

All that at first appeared to Sile's eyes were some moving black spots; but now he was able to show Two Arrows another of the advantages of a civilized man over a savage. Slung from his left shoulder was a small leathern case, and Two Arrows watched him closely while he opened it, took out something silver-mounted and handsome, and put it to his eyes. Such things had been much discussed in his hearing, and he knew it was the "long eye of the pale-faces"; but he had no faith in it until Sile made him try it.

"There they are; six of 'em," said Sile. "Then look away down yonder and you'll see some more."

"No see us," said Two Arrows. "Come! Heap bad."

So it was, for the dreaded strangers were between them and the mountains. For all they knew, they might have ridden past others unseen, and these might intercept their return. Sile was only a white boy, and he understood that the young chief was the "captain" of their squad of two.

"Come!" said Two Arrows, as he led his pony back down the slope and toward the forest that skirted the river. This was less than half a mile away, but the horses were not mounted until both were well under cover of it. It struck Sile that they might safely ride homeward along the stream, but Nez Percé training and caution forbade any such risk as that. Even the operation of reaching the bank might be full of peril, for nobody could guess at what moment they might stumble upon Apache warriors, and no others were at all likely to be there. It was most unlikely, however, that their enemies were advancing upon both sides of the water, and as soon as Two Arrows reached it he rode in. It was a wide and therefore shallow place, easily forded, and Sile breathed more freely as soon as he was under the shade of the woods beyond. His guide and captain pushed right on until they were out in a comparatively open reach of country, and then he turned to Sile, his whole face gleaming with uncontrollable excitement, and exclaimed:

"Ugh! Ride now. Kill hoss. Save pale-face. Save Nez Percé. Get there before Apache. All scalp gone if 'Pache come first."

He suppressed a whoop, but the next bound of his pony explained his meaning, and Sile galloped, stride by stride, with him. It was a race for life and for the lives of many others; for Two Arrows had briefly read that problem when he said to Sile, as he handed him back his glass:

"No squaw. Braves on war-path. No hunt. Kill. Take scalp."

Both were well mounted, and Sile rode well, although by no means so completely at home on horseback as was his red friend. His rifle, too, was more tiresome to carry than was a light lance, and the bow and arrows were now tightly "slung," and required no handling. It would not do to wear out their horses in one rush, but they kept on at the highest speed at all consistent with a long ride. It was much faster, at all events, than the Apaches were likely to travel, unless something new should stir them up. By keeping well away from the stream, they were not compelled to follow its windings, and could ride more freely in a straight line, only turning out for clumps of trees and similar obstructions, and paying no attention to game, although they now saw gang after gang of deer and a fair-sized herd of bisons.

CHAPTER XXIV.

SILE'S VICTORY.

THERE had been no anxiety at the mine on account of the absent hunters. Judge Parks and Yellow Pine had their hands very full of an inspection of the cargoes of the two wagons. The men toiled vigorously at the stone wall and at the shingle riving.

Noon came and went, and there were no signs of returning hunters or of game of any sort, but there was no danger of a famine in that camp for days and days to come.

Judge Parks would hardly have unpacked mining tools and "fixings," as Pine called them, so compositely if he could have known what was going forward farther down the valley and on the other side of the little river.

On, on rode Two Arrows and his companion, and it almost seemed as if both were growing older. It was no sort of boy-play to ride like that, with such tremendous consequences depending upon them. Sile's merry face put on a tremendously sober and earnest expression, while Two Arrows looked as if he were already a chief in command of a war party.

Mile after mile went by, and the horses held out capitally; but at last Two Arrows slackened his gait, seemed to make a silent calculation, and halted.

"Pale-face camp there," he said, emphatically, pointing across toward the mountain range at their left. "Red-head cross water. Tell his people, Two Arrows ride. Tell Nez Percé. Red-head go straight, find camp. Ugh!"

"I can find it," said Sile. "I was thinking we'd gone up-river about far enough. We must have got away ahead of the Apaches. Hope I sha'n't meet any."

"Shoot quick," said Two Arrows. "Kill. Take scalp. Be great brave, Two Arrows kill grizzly. Kill 'Pache some day. How!"

He held out his hand, and Sile shook it hard in token of good-by, and the two boys separated, each to carry his own tidings and face his own dangers. Two Arrows rode on in a straight line up the valley, and Sile wheeled toward the line of forest which bordered the river. It struck him that he was yet a little below the precise neighborhood of the mine, and he was correct, but as yet it was all guess-work. At all events, he was sure that his remaining ride could not be a long one; it could not fail to be intensely exciting. In a few minutes more his horse's feet were in the water, and he was almost immediately aware that he had not chosen a good ford. It grew deep too fast, and he had to ride out again.

"I won't go into another pool," he said to himself. "I'll hunt for a wide place where it ripples well."

He had not the experience and the quick eyes of Two Arrows, but he was learning fast, and it was easy to find a better crossing. Once over, he felt that the forest was itself a sort of protection, and there came a great thrill all over him at the thought of riding out from under it. What if the Apaches should be already there, and what if they had found the camp and destroyed it?

"They haven't done that," said Sile, "unless they managed to take it by surprise. Our men are all old hands, and Yellow Pine keeps his eyes about him. I'll get in a good while before dark—that is, if I make out to get in."

He drew rein for a moment under the last line of trees, and he looked earnestly in all directions, but even his spy-glass could not reveal to him a sign of danger. He had never seen anything more absolutely quiet and peaceful than was that stretch of open valley, with its grass and its bushes, and its clusters of grand old trees. It encouraged him a good deal to see a buck and two does feeding within a quarter of a mile of him, and he at once rode watchfully onward.

Just as he rode out through a patch of willows in a long hollow, walking his horse because of their being in his way a little, his heart seemed to stop beating and stand still. Then it beat again, and like a trip-hammer, for a moment. The bridle fell from his hand, and he made ready his rifle as if by an instinctive movement.

Right before him and hardly a hundred yards away, on the rising ground, sat an Indian brave, in his war-paint, upon a very fine-looking horse, and Sile was sure at a glance that he could not be one of his Nez Percé friends. They had no such horses as that among all that he and Two Arrows had found for them. The warrior was looking in the opposite direction at the instant, but he was also wheeling his horse, and in a second or so more he caught sight of Sile. He had a lance, but it was slung behind him, and in his hands was as good a repeating-rifle as Sile's own, and he raised it like a flash.

It was as if he lifted two, for Sile's rifle also came up with precisely the same quick, ready-handed motion.

It was an awful moment for Sile. He had never before done as much real thinking in one hour as he did between his first glimpse of that red-skin and the rising of the dark, threatening line of that rifle-barrel.

He had thought of the men at the mine, and of their need of warning, and therefore of the necessity that he should protect himself and get to them alive. He had thought of his father and his mother, and of some other people, and he had also thought what a dreadful thing it was to shoot straight at a man, and perhaps to kill him.

At that very instant the two rifles came to a level, whether he would or not. He felt no symptoms of "buck ague" this time, for every nerve and muscle of his body was stiffening, while his tired horse stood as still as a stone. That was where he had a priceless advantage. The spirited animal ridden by his enemy was a trifle restive for some reason, and caused a shade of delay that was just enough to give Sile his only remaining chance.

"If I hit his horse in the head," he was thinking as he pulled the trigger; but that would have been close shooting at a hundred yards, and just beyond the head of the horse was the naked breast of the warrior.

There were two reports close together, and Sile felt something prick him sharply on the left arm near the shoulder. At the same moment he saw the red man reel to and fro on his horse, and then pitch off head foremost into the grass.

"Oh, dear me, I've shot him!" he exclaimed.

Then came a suggestion that the brave might be only wounded, and that it was his duty to go and see if he could do anything for him. With that, too, there came a gush of curiosity and a fierce and feverish sense of triumph. He had fought a duel on horseback with an Indian warrior, with rifles, and there were no other white boys who could say that they had done that. He sat still upon his horse for a moment, and his breath came and went very quickly, and then he somewhat cautiously rode forward.

All irresolution passed out of Sile's mind as he rode forward, for he felt that he had behaved rightly, and had done nothing for which he could blame himself. He watched the fallen man narrowly as he drew near him, but there was no motion or any other sign of life.

"I must have killed him outright!" He sprang from his horse and bent over the prostrate form, but he did not have to look more than once. "That hole—that's where the bullet went in. It must have gone right through his heart. Well, he would have killed me if I had not killed him."

It seemed to Sile a matter of course that he should pick up the red warrior's rifle, unbuckle and take off the bead-worked belt that carried his knife and revolver, take his lance, catch his horse, and then ride onward, carrying with him all as "spoils of war." He did it coolly and steadily but rapidly, and without any idea how very fast he was growing.

That tall, brawny Apache warrior had been a distinguished brave, and he had been sent upon a scouting trip away in advance of the rest merely as a customary precaution. There had been no expectation that he would discover anything remarkable. In meeting a solitary pale-face, he had undertaken to kill him very much as a matter of course, for he was just then at war with all white men. Sile had made the better shot of the two, and that was about all that could be said.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

I HOPE that all my little friends are enjoying the pleasures which belong to this happy time of the year. Every day leads us nearer now to the glad day which all the world celebrates—the day when the little Babe was born in Bethlehem to be the Saviour of the world. It is a time to be unselfish and kind, to forget anger and forsake pride, and to try to scatter sunshine wherever we go. Then there are so many secrets to be kept, and so many lovely surprises to come. We can not but be happy if we take the true Christmas spirit to our hearts.

Please do not forget, among your Christmas gifts, the little ones at St. Mary's Free Hospital, where Harper's Young People's Cot has always its dear little patient inmate. Toys, books, flowers, and gifts of money can be used by the good Sisters there to great advantage. Address Sister Catherine, 407 and 409 West Thirty-fourth Street.

And remember Mrs. Richardson, at Woodside, near Lincolnton, North Carolina, and the little white and black pupils in her Sunday-school. They will be pleased I with articles for which you have no use, dolls and story-books which you now put away on your closet shelves, and bits of calico and worsted for patchwork in their sewing-machine. The little church, of which I have often told you, and the picture of which you saw in No. 226, is not yet finished, and if any one has a silver penny to send there, Mrs. Richardson will know how to dispose of it.

These two good works, the hospital and the little school, make a special Christmas appeal to the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, who have so often helped them already.

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA.

There are often requests from my little reader friends for letters from Florida. Perhaps one describing my trip to-day would be of interest, for it was spent "way down upon the Sawanee-River." All day long the music has been tinkling in my ears, far along the banks, is heard the sweet, familiar song, on and on through the rustling leaves, mingling its cadence with each splash of the waves that kiss its shore. All along the banks are homes of beauty; perhaps in all the orange-scented South there are none more perfect, more sweet with gardens and soft sea-breeze, more rich in ancient groves, or more tenderly nestled in the bosom of beautiful nature. Mazes of water lie amid the grand old forests of pine and oak, the oaks one mass of silver drapings—Southern moss—and magnificently grows holly, Christmas holly—Here, too, in great abundance, thrives the mistletoe. "Though all be decayed, it seems to twine fondly in sunshine and shade; no leaves drop in sadness, still evenly they spread, undimmed 'midst the blighted and lonely and dead; the mistletoe clings to the oak, not in part, but with leaves roundly bound it, the root in its heart." Among the warm, green fruit trees the song-birds have their nests, and about the eaves of the houses the swallows whirl and race in quick, smooth circles, and then dip their wings in the Sawanee's sapphire water. "Tis a glorious change from sullen winter winds, the breath of northern Thor. All day long we've been gathering holly, mistletoe, and Southern moss to decorate the homes of our little Northern friends who can not spend the winter with us. May we ask you to place some stamps for postage. Many of the girls send for mistletoe and moss, and the postage collectively amounts to quite a sum. In next issue I will tell you something of the old plantation darkies, the camp-meetings and quaint old songs, and when the orange blossoms come, we'll send you some of those. ... We all have to tell our age's. Well, I'm nearly thirty, and next year I'm going to Vassar College.

MARIE D.

LOS GATOS, CALIFORNIA.

I thought the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE might like to hear of our trip to the sea-coast. We started from home one Monday morning. We drove down the Santa Clara Valley, passing the great estate of Senator Stanford, called Menlo Park, which extends for miles along the coast, and which is really a great park, planted with all kinds of ornamental trees. We encamped that night at San Mateo, about twenty miles south of San Francisco, and next morning started over the mountains to the coast. The road for several miles wound up a beautiful cañon, past the great flume of the San Francisco Water Company, whose reservoir of artificial lake we soon passed. We got to Spanish Town, on Half-moon Bay, about noon, and when we joined my uncle and his family, who were stopping there a short time, and who went with us during the rest of our trip. That afternoon we drove seven miles up the coast part of the time on a sandy beach, where sometimes the waves ran up under the bmgies. We passed a dead sea-lion which had been washed ashore by the tide. Its body was as large as that of an ordinary horse. My uncle, who is a dentist, extracted some of its teeth with a bullet for our collection of curiosities. Finally we reached Moss Beach, where the sandy places the sea-mosses washed up by the waves lay two feet deep. A ledge of rock runs out into the ocean, over which we scrambled, gathering starfish and shell-fish, and been left by the water by the falling tide. Uncle shot a small seal out in the water, and the waves washed it ashore. It was five feet long, and weighed about a hundred pounds. Its color was light gray, spotted with black. We got lots of shells and mosses.

The next day we went up the coast and around the point of land that partly incloses Half-moon Bay. There was a vessel anchored there trying to raise the cargo of an English ship that was wrecked some time ago. We had to pass through a cleft in the rock about thirty feet wide, which was filled with water at high tide. We got through very well, but we staid longer than we thought, and when we came back the tide had risen ever so much, and the great waves were rolling in. As it was rising all the while, we had no time to stop and think about it; so uncle jumped down and carried us children across between waves, wading in water up to his knees. Once he was hurrying to get out of the way of a big wave, when he found it trapped on a stone, and fell down, but he managed to get up again in a hurry. Mamma and aunt splashed through next. We all got pretty wet, but laughed a good deal. For it though we were pretty badly frightened too. At Spanish Town we saw a "bear dog"; it is a native of Alaska, and resembles the dog that we saw at Pescadero, next day. We stopped at Moss Beach, where there are two large that rocks about two hundred yards from the shore, and are sometimes covered with seals and sea-lions. When the tide is there they could stay only on the smaller rock, the waves were so high.

They were abundant there. The sea-lions made a grand noise, and bellowed in a while they would roar something like a lion. They are a good deal like the seals, only much larger, and of a dark color. There were a good many baby sea-lions, that were very fat and cuddled along like Newfoundland puppies. They do not drag themselves along, as we thought, but straight their bodies clear up from the rock. There is a notch in the rock, and when the waves struck it the white spray would fly up about fifty feet.

We reached Pescadero that night about morning went to Pebble Beach. Here are pebbles of all colors, beautifully shaped and polished by the waves. Some are transparent and of the most delicate tints—green, red, yellow, smoke, pink, etc.—some clear as drops of water, some of the purest white, and some jet black. They are quite small, some of the largest being no bigger than peas. Sometimes quite valuable stones are found here. Mamma has a pink one she is going to have set in a ring. There is a good place on this coast where such beautiful pebbles are found. A few miles down the coast is Pigeon Point Light-house. It is 125 feet high. We went to the top of it, where we saw a collection of lenses and prisms so arranged as to make a "flashing light." We saw a number of sections of the backbone of the whales on the shore, and picked up several pieces of baleen, which grows in the mouth of the whale. At one place we saw a pair of whale ribs, ten feet high and ten inches wide, arched over a school of seals. Also we saw in bloom a large century plant whose flower-stalk must have been thirty feet high. We stopped a little while on Half-way Beach. This is a sand beach, which stretches for three miles between the cliffs and the water. It is only at low tide that people can pass over this road. There we got some nice mosses, and saw some dead sea-lions and devil-fish. The latter have eight arms covered with suckers, and bills like a parrot's.

We reached San Francisco about half past ten about noon, and went down on the rocks and cooked our dinner. After dinner we went into the city, stopping at the light-house on the way, where we saw their large collection of curiosities from all parts of the world. Down at the beach we watched the bathers a while, and then visited the Free Museum, and saw some curiosities for our cabinet. The next evening after a long ride over the mountains, through great red-wood forests, we reached home, having been gone eleven days.

LIZARD-CATCHING IN BRAZIL

BY ERNEST INGERSOLL.

WHY should anybody want to catch lizards at all? will be the first thought, no doubt, in the minds of most young readers whose eyes fall on the head-line. No matter about that; this article is to tell how, not why. One thing at a time. Supposing that you are in Brazil, and do want lizards to make "specimens" of, or as pets, or to feed to your snakes, or to eat yourself, this is the way the Indian boy with you will arrange to capture the agile and wary little reptiles.

Lizards, he will tell you, are very difficult things to get hold of. It is almost impossible to trap them; and if caught in a net, ten to one they will wriggle through it, or break off their tails in their struggles. The natives, however, have learned how to circumvent the wily game, whose weak point, they have discovered, is his ticklishness.

Arming themselves with long bamboo rods, they tie horse-hairs, made into a slip-noose, at the end, and then proceed to search for a lizard sunning himself on some garden wall. One is soon found. Now begins a wary approach. The greatest stealth and caution are needful. A lizard runs like a streak of light, and can disappear as if by magic into cracks and crevices unsuspected. But sometimes a terrier who knows its business, and keenly enjoys it, helps greatly by heading off and turning back the swift reptile when he takes alarm.

Having crept unnoticed to within fair reach of a lizard, however, the Brazilian thinks he has won half the battle. Gently lowering his rod, he lets the horse-hair fall delicately upon the creature's back and dangle about his head. The lizard seems to like it. He will stand any amount of this twiddling—the big iguanas seem positively to laugh at having their knobby sides tickled—when the cracking of a twig or the falling of a shadow would put him to instant flight. In a moment, however, the noose is dropped before the pointed snout just right, there is a sudden jerk, and the lizard is hanging in mid-air, utterly motionless and limp, apparently out of pure surprise and discouragement, for the noose never pulls tight enough to choke it seriously.

Let him hang—it won't hurt him—until you have your box or basket in full readiness to receive him. Then grasp him with both hands in such a way that he can neither bite nor scratch nor lash his tail, and hold on to him until he has been placed well within the receptacle. Then let go suddenly, and clap down your cover.

If you have only one compartment in your box, probably this lightning racer will be gone before you can get your hands out; but if you have been wise enough to have an inner dark part of the box with a door in the partition, he will dart in there instead of over the edge, and think himself safely hid, so that you can put a dozen captives into the same double box, and all will stay quietly in the inner room till you get them home.

Lizard-catching is great fun, and some of the lizards make interesting and beautiful pets. One of their peculiarities is the extreme brittleness of their tails, which snap off as easily as if made of thin glass. Nature, however, repairs the loss very quickly, for a new tail soon grows.

AN ANIMAL IN A BOX.

BY CHARLES MORRIS.

IF any of my readers have ever seen the boys of the "Country Week" returning from their week's run and roll in the green fields, they will have seen an amusing sight. These poor little waifs, born in the slums of the city, and most of whom have never seen the verdant meadows or heard the gurgling brooks, come back not only full of delightful memories, but most of them bringing some prize from the treasure box of the country parade. And the most valued of all prizes seems to be a land turtle. Every little urchin who has been lucky enough to secure one of these queer creatures clings to it as proudly as if it was one of King Solomon's jewels, while his less fortunate companions gather around him with curious and envious eyes.

Boys like turtles; that may be set down as an axiom. Whether turtles like boys is another question. A turtle is not much of a thinker. Give him something to eat, and let him alone, and he will get along almost anywhere. And if disturbed too much, he can shut himself up in his shell, like a "jack-in-a-box," and laugh at his tormentors.

And, by-the-way, as most people know the turtle mainly by his outside, and as young and old folks generally are interested in this comical creature, some short account of what there is inside the turtle's box may not be without interest.

The turtle—or the tortoise, to give the little crawler its proper name—is not the only "animal in a box." Oysters, clams, crabs, and many other creatures are boxed-up animals. But they all differ greatly from the tortoise, which is, in fact, a very distant cousin of ourselves; that is to say, it has a backbone and ribs, as we have. The lower orders of animals have no inside bones; all their hard parts are outside their bodies. It is the peculiarity of the vertebrate (or backbone) animals to have their hard parts inside, while their outside is of soft flesh, or is covered with scales, as in the fishes and reptiles.

But the turtle is peculiar in that it has bones both inside and outside. In this peculiar animal the bones come through the flesh, and spread over the body outside. The turtle's shell is made up of its backbone and its ribs, which are spread out broad and flat over its back, the ribs joining at their edges. This tent of bone is covered with a thin, almost transparent, beautifully tinted coating, which is the tortoise-shell from which such pretty combs, knife handles, and like ornamental objects are made.

The lower shell is made in the same manner. Here the breast-bone comes out, and spreads into a broad, flat shell. Thus the tortoise is actually shut up in a box made of its own bones. This is usually joined together above and below, except where the head, tail, and legs come out. And these can be withdrawn at will, and the shell closed by strong muscles, until the little creature becomes like an old-time knight shut up in his iron box of armor.

The head is also covered with a coating of horny plates, and the edges of these plates at the jaws do duty as teeth, since the tortoise has none of these useful organs. These horny jaws are often saw-toothed, so that they cut up food very well.

Our little land tortoise—Cistudo Carolina, to give it its scientific name—is by no means confined to Carolina, but may be found everywhere along the Atlantic coast from Maine to Florida. It is very abundant in the pine forests of the South, and is familiar to almost everybody everywhere throughout the region named.

The shell of the box tortoise is about six and a half inches long by four and a half wide. It is more rounded than is usual with turtles, and has a remarkable variety of colors and markings. Its most common colors are yellowish-brown and bright yellow, but these are so variously arranged that it is nearly or quite impossible to find two tortoises alike.

In its wild state it feeds on insects, and probably on some species of plants; but when confined it very quickly makes itself at home, and will eat nearly everything offered it, such as bread, potatoes, apples, and other civilized fare.

One thing remarkable about it is its wonderful length of life. We are not surprised to hear that the huge elephant can live for two hundred years; there is stuff enough in the great beast to keep it going for centuries. Yet it is hard to conceive that a little crawling tortoise can live as long as an elephant, though writers declare that it can. I doubt, however, if any single observer has watched a tortoise for two centuries.

There is one way of telling a turtle's age, and that is by cutting a date on its shell. The inscription will remain during its whole life. But as it is not uncommon for roguish boys to date such inscriptions twenty years or more back, they are not fully to be trusted.

Yet all boys are not rogues, and we can relate one remarkable and well-attested instance of this character. Mr. William Eyre, a gentleman of Chester, Pennsylvania, relates that when he was a boy of ten he caught a land tortoise and cut his initials on its under shell. Going out afterward for a ride, he took the tortoise with him, and left it at a place ten miles away. That was the last he saw of Master Tortoise until he was an old gentleman of seventy, when, to his surprise, he found the identical creature in his own garden. There were the initials, which he recognized as undoubtedly his own handiwork.

In this incident, which I have good reason to believe actually occurred, the long life of the little creature is only one of the interesting points. It is very remarkable that it returned to its starting-point after sixty years. How far it had roamed during that long interval, what sights it had seen, and what thoughts it had thought, are beyond guessing. But back it came, after an average lifetime, to see in his old age the person by whom in his boyhood it had been marked for life.

There are some few other species of land tortoises in this country. There is one on the Western prairies considerably larger than ours. And in the South there is a very large one, known as the gopher turtle. This creature has a shell nearly fifteen inches long, and is so strong that it can move under a weight of two hundred pounds, so that it might easily carry a man on its back.

It lives in under-ground burrows in sandy forests, and does its prowling by night, often making havoc in the sweet-potato and melon patches of the inhabitants. So the good people of the Gulf States do not altogether relish the gopher.

It is the water turtles, the terrapins of our fresh waters, and the great sea turtles, which are the delight of epicures. Of the fresh-water species we have several varieties, from a little fellow of the waters of Pennsylvania and New Jersey not four inches long, to the great and fierce snapping-turtle with a shell nine inches and more in length. It is said to have been taken of four feet in total length, from snout to end of tail.

To kill this creature does not kill its snapping propensities; the head will live for hours after being cut off, and has been known to snap a boy's finger or the leg of an investigating hen hours after it ought to have been dead. It is not a safe thing to throw the head of a snapper in the grass as a trap for prowling chickens or curious boys.

There is one other odd peculiarity of tortoises and some other reptiles with which we may conclude. If we want to breathe freely, we open our mouths to do so; but if the mouth of a tortoise or a toad be kept open by inserting a stick between its jaws, it will soon suffocate for want of breath.

This may seem impossible, yet it may be easily explained. All the higher animals breathe by pumping the air into and out of their lungs. We do our air-pumping by means of the diaphragm, a broad membrane below the lungs, which moves up and down at every breath, and opens and closes the lungs successively. In the tortoise the mouth is the pump. It takes in a mouthful of air. Then it closes its lips, contracts the cavity of the mouth, and drives this air down into its lungs. If the mouth be kept open, this pump will not work, since the air will rush outward instead of downward.

This is one of the odd facts of nature. As many fish can be drowned by being fastened under water and not allowed to come to the surface, so many air-breathers can be suffocated by being placed in an ocean of air with their mouths wide open.

TOO SMART FOR THE BRIGANDS AN AMERICAN'S ADVENTURE IN SICILY. BY DAVID KER.

A SMALL clearing half way up a thickly wooded hill-side among the ridges that overhang Palermo, a fire of dry sticks in the centre, with a piece of goat's flesh hanging over it by a string; around it a score of swarthy, fierce-eyed, wild-looking figures in picturesque mountain dress which would have been worth any money to a painter; and a little behind them two men in plaid suits, tied hand and foot with stout leathern thongs. The mountaineers were a band of Sicilian brigands; the two prisoners were an English and an American tourist whom they had just captured.

"Any chance of their sending out soldiers to rescue us, do you think?" asked the Englishman, in a whisper.

"Not they, stranger," answered the American, with the stern composure of one so familiar with all dangers that no form of peril could shake his coolness. "If you and I were a couple of kings perhaps they might; but plain Seth Hickman and John Stubbs ain't the sort for these Italian loafers to burn powder for. You may be sure that if we mean to get clear of this trap, we've got to do the whole thing ourselves."

"But how are we to do it?" asked Stubbs, dolefully. "Even if we could get loose (which isn't so easy, with twenty of these fellows mounting guard over us), we should never be able to find our way back to the town."

The Pennsylvania man gave a dry chuckle. "Beg pardon, mister, but you're out there. They thought themselves very cute in blindfolding us when they brought us up here, but they don't fool Seth Hickman and me. I've got the points of the compass right square and honest, where to find the sea, and when I know that, I can make a bee line for Palermo any time I like."

"Well," rejoined Stubbs, brightening up, "if there's any chance of escape, I'm ready to fight as long as I can stand or see."

"That's the way to talk," said his comrade, approvingly; "but you won't want to do any fighting over this job, I guess. Now that that captain of theirs and his two chums have gone down to the village, I calculate I can fix this thing my own way, especially as I happen to know their language. Didn't I ever tell you I was a ventriloquist? Well, I am, and if I don't fool these macaroni eating scoundrels so that they won't know whether they're standing on their head or their heels, call me a Mexican!"

Meanwhile the bandits, having finished their supper, thought it time to feed their captives, having orders from their chief to take good care of them, as being likely to yield a good ransom. As one of the robbers (who had a somewhat more good-natured face than the rest) came forward with some pieces of black bread and garlic and a few morsels of the roasted goat's flesh, Hickman called out to him in Italian:

"Hark ye, comrade, can't you let us have the use of our hands for five minutes? We can't very well get away with so many of you watching us, and we're not clever at picking up food with our mouths like ducks."

The brigand laughed, and untied their hands—a proceeding which evidently angered a ferocious-looking fellow with a black beard who was standing near. But before he had time to speak, a voice, hoarse and broken as if with hurry and fatigue, called out from among the trees:

"Help, comrades!—the captain—he's attacked!"

"Where?" roared the bandits, springing to their feet.

"Santa Rosalia!—the soldiers!" gasped the voice.

"Quick!—he'll be killed."

Instantly guns and knives were caught up, and all was ready. Six of the band staid to guard the prisoners, while the other fifteen went rushing down the hill-side without even waiting to see who had brought the news. Some shepherd, perhaps, or some villager. They could think of nothing now but the rescue of their captain.

"Was that voice really you ventriloquizing?" whispered Mr. Stubbs, suddenly enlightened by the knowing smile that flitted over his companion's statue-like features.

"Guess so," replied the Pennsylvania man, briefly.

"Why, it's really amazing!" said the delighted Englishman. "I would never have believed it if I hadn't actually seen it myself."

In his excitement he raised his voice somewhat too high, as he was speedily reminded by a hearty kick from the savage-looking robber with the black beard. But just then Mr. Hickman called out, in an admirable ventriloquial imitation of the gruff tones of one of the other bandits:

"That's just like Peppino! He's brave enough against a helpless man, but trust him for never striking any one who can strike back."

Round whirled Peppino, and planted his fist full in the eye of the man whom he supposed to have spoken. Instantly both knives were out, and the two were slashing and stabbing at each other like madmen. Successful thus far, the American next tried his ventriloquism on the other four; and a moment later they were at it, too, Giovanni thinking that Tito had called him a liar, and Antonio feeling certain that Battista had made a gentlemanly allusion to his having once been nose-whipped for thieving.

Seth Hickman's plan succeeded beyond his expectations. The brigands were all engaging one another in deadly combat, and it became probable that, unless the remainder of the band quickly returned, the captives would be left unguarded. This idea seemed to occur to one of the bandits, for Battista, having disposed of his antagonist, returned to the prisoners.

Up jumped Seth (who, having his hands already free, had untied his feet during the battle), and with one blow from the butt of a gun that lay within reach, felled him senseless to the ground.

"Now, mister," said he, unbinding Stubbs's limbs, "let's make tracks for the town. If I can pilot the soldiers up

A JOLLY SANTA CLAUS.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

It was Christmas Eve, and we children had been hustled unceremoniously off into the back parlor, while Uncle Jack, our sailor uncle, superintended the carrying upstairs of a certain mysterious-looking basket carefully wrapped in a horse blanket.

We did not mind this so much, for we were used to being hurried out of the way just before Christmas-time; but the group in our little back parlor was by no means so jolly as it had been in former years. Papa looked troubled, and poor mother seemed just completely worried and tired out. As we were pushed into the room by Uncle Jack, who had been entertaining us in the little library on the other side of the hall, papa made an effort to look cheerful, and said: "Well, I suppose there is no use worrying about it. If it is gone, it is gone; but it seems hard, for I know of so many things we could have done with it."

"Yes," sighed mother; "but don't worry; perhaps it may come yet."

"Come!" repeated papa, almost petulantly; "how can it come when we've looked everywhere for it? It's lost, and we must make the best of it."

We hardly understood the importance of the "it" which had been spoken of as lost. We knew that papa had received from grandpa a letter containing a crisp new bill, which papa had said was his Christmas present. The fact that it was a five-hundred-dollar bill did not greatly impress us, as it was no bigger or prettier than a one. In fact, had it been a dollar, I believe the loss would have affected us more acutely, as to us a dollar represented a large amount of candy and other good things; but five hundred dollars, that was beyond the stretch of our imagination, so we did not bother our heads about it; indeed, little Hilda, the baby, had climbed up on papa's knee, and patting his cheek with her soft little palm, had lisped, sympathetically, "Did oo lose the nice g'een pieter?"

But the rest of us were too busy in surmising what was in Uncle Jack's basket to pay much attention to anything else. It was the custom in our family to distribute the presents—with the exception of the few bonbons and tri-here to-morrow as well as I'll pilot you down to-night, I guess we'll have these scoundrels in a pretty close place."

Mr. Hickman spoke truly. The very next day, thanks to his skillful guidance, a detachment of soldiers surprised the bandits, and (as Seth phrased it) "cleaned 'em all up except the captain, whom they kept over to be hanged in honor of his rank."

fles that Santa Claus left in the stockings of the younger ones—after breakfast on Christmas morning, but for some reason this package of Uncle Jack's excited our curiosity more than any other of the packages we had seen brought into the house for the past month. Perhaps because Uncle Jack always knew just what we wanted, and generally got it for us; perhaps because there was an undefinable feeling, as we saw the man bring it in, that it contained something alive.

You may be sure that we did not sleep much that night, for, in addition to the wakefulness occasioned by our curiosity, there were certain mysterious sounds as of gnawing and breaking of wicker-work proceeding from the little hall bedroom where Uncle Jack's box had been placed. But, like all things, the night at last came to an end, and we were up bright and early to ruin our digestions and pass away the time before breakfast in eating the candy we would find in our stockings. But imagine our surprise when we went to the chimney in the nursery and found our stockings gone! There were a few candies scattered on the hearth-stone; a knife, some scraps of paper, and an orange or two lay on the floor; but the stockings were nowhere to be seen. We wondered somewhat at that, but we older ones supposed that papa or mamma had for some good reason taken them away, while little Hilda contented herself with an explanation of her own.

"Santa Claus took 'em up chimney to fill 'em better," and shortly after she ran off to nurse to get dressed, being always the first of the family down-stairs. But this morning she did not have much the start of us, and before long we were all down in the dining-room waiting impatiently for the elders to come to breakfast. They evidently sympathized with our anxiety, for we were seated around the table half an hour earlier than usual.

Just as papa had finished saying grace, Hilda came rushing in from the hall, her big blue eyes fairly standing out of her head with excitement.

"Oh! I've seen Santa Claus! I've seen him! I've seen Santa Claus! Oh, papa, Santa Claus is in the hall by the hat-stand. I saw him!" she continued, turning to papa, and evidently wanting to convince one member of the party.

Papa jumped to his feet. "A sneak thief!" he exclaimed, running into the hall.

We all followed, only too glad to have an excuse for finishing breakfast in such short order. But in the hall there were no signs of anybody having been there, except that in the corner lay Tom's stocking, bulky, and looking as if it might contain presents for the whole family. Tom seized it with a shout of delight, and proceeded to empty it. But what a surprise! An old overshoe, a single glove, mother's pincushion, some candy and coal cinders mixed together, a paper-weight from the library table, and an ink-bottle which came uncorked as Tom drew it out and spilled the contents all over the carpet. We were at a loss to understand the meaning of this, but Uncle Jack looked at papa in a sort of comic despair, and there was an "I-told-you-so" expression on papa's face that made us think that they knew more about it.

Hilda in the mean time kept insisting that she had seen Santa Claus. Suddenly an idea seemed to strike her.

"I know I saw Santa Claus!" she exclaimed. "He was standing on the hat-stand, and he had on a fur coat, and, oh, papa! he put a letter in your overcoat pocket."

Papa winked at Uncle Jack, and thrust his hand carelessly in the overcoat. He took it out again with an exclamation of surprise, holding in it a square envelope. Hurriedly he drew out the letter, and a crisp new green-back fell to the floor.

"Where on earth do you suppose the creature found it?" he exclaimed, turning to Uncle Jack.

"I'm sure I don't know; but now you have your bill, we had better find the creature before he does any more harm," said Uncle Jack.

"I don't think he has done any harm," answered papa. "I'll forgive him a great many tricks for this."

But it was not necessary to search for the "creature," for Hilda came running out of the parlor exclaiming, "Santa Claus is fixing the Christmas tree!"

"We'd better fix him before he fixes it any more," remarked Uncle Jack, as he went into the parlor.

There on the top of the big Christmas tree sat Hilda's "Santa Claus," one of the most comical-looking Brazilian monkeys you ever saw. He made faces at us, and spitefully threw a bit of candle at Tom; but catching sight of Uncle Jack, he sprang down on to his shoulder, and sat there staring at the rest of us with the gravity of a judge.

"This is your Christmas from me," said Uncle Jack, stroking the monkey's long tail, which was twisted round his neck like a tippet. "I did intend to wait until after breakfast before I brought him out, but he took the law in his own hands, and played Santa Claus before I knew it."

"And to very good purpose too," said father.

"Let's call him Santa Claus," I suggested, and Santa Claus he was from that day. He soon learned his name, and was very good to mind. I must say to his credit that he was a living contradiction to the stories about the ill-temper of monkeys. He was as docile and affectionate as a dog, and his mischief was seldom malicious. His great delight was to put things in people's pockets, and while it embarrassed papa, who was a firm hater of tobacco, to pull out half a dozen cigars in the street when he used his handkerchief; or if Uncle Jack was perhaps a trifle angry to find, when out sleighing one day, instead of his gloves, a pair of baby's stockings, yet this was all forgiven in remembrance of the time when he so successfully played Santa Claus.

THE LITTLE RED SKATES.

BY R. K. MCKITTICK.

TWENTY years ago there was a certain little boy who had a pair of red skates; that is, a pair of skates whose runners were fastened into red feet. This shade of red, which would have been beautiful in a gladiolus or a pickled pepper, was vulgar in a pair of skates, as it indicated cheapness, and stamped the skates as being within the reach of every one.

The red skates had a peculiar and most aggravating kind of heel strap, designed to go around the ankle instead of across the instep. This heel band was intended as a substitute for the screw in the heel, the red skates being provided with a peg, which the skater drove into the heel of his shoe by means of jumping and stamping.

The runners were narrow and low, and had a groove which caused them to be known as "gutters," it being considered rather more difficult to whirl about on those that were unbellevled. In front the steels came away out and around in a great curve, ending over the instep in a brass acorn. This feature, if it may be termed a feature, caused the skates to be known as "turn-ups," and they frequently tripped any one that came in contact with them.

In those days boys were judged, among themselves, more by the skates they used than by the company they kept. The boy with the "rockers" in a nice green baize bag was regarded with peculiar envy, which by degrees developed into reverence, for if he was envied for being able to have a pair, he was revered for his ability to fly on them without interfering with the natural symmetry of the back of his head. Club skates were comparatively unknown at this time; not more than one boy in a hundred owned a pair, and if he put them on he was stared at so hard and questioned so freely that he couldn't enjoy his skating.

The little boy who owned the red skates was a very poor boy—in fact, he was so poor that he had no overcoat. He used to wear a huge comforter around his neck, which crossed on his breast, and was fastened in a hard knot at the small of his back. This, with the exercise he had, kept him sufficiently warm, and the boys who wondered that he should possess a pair of skates and not an overcoat soon began to realize that he could get more glowing comfort out of the former. He was a short, stocky boy, and in spite of the fact that his skates were red, he was not subjected to ridicule. He was too much of a fighter not to be respected even more than he deserved.

When he first appeared on the ice he had but one skate, as he believed in the system of learning to skate on one foot at a time. He would run five or six feet, and then strike out and slide twenty. He frequently fell, but as the ice cracked sometimes, and his head never, he concluded he might as well put on the pair. Hardly a week had passed by before he could "grind the bark" and jump over things, a feat that was considered daring on "turn-up" skates. His great trouble seemed to be in keeping the skates on securely. Frequently he had to stamp the peg into his heel, and often he had to thrust sticks of wood under the straps to make them tighter. When he had a sufficient number of sticks under the straps to light a fire with, his face wore the happy expression of triumph, and he would glide along like the wind.

Nothing upset the composure of this freckled youth on the red skates. If he fell, he always arose feeling better.

If any one ran into him, that person always got the worst of it. If he broke through the ice, he came out and skated himself dry in half an hour.

It used to be considered a charming accompaniment to the pastime of skating to have a large dog on the ice. We had a Newfoundland that was as fond of running on the frozen surface in winter as he was of swimming in the pond in summer, and as freely and cheerfully as he would swim for sticks thrown far into the water, he would run for them thrown on the ice. But when the little boy with the red skates was around, the dog would go and lie down by the fire of fence rails on the shore, and keep one eye open, because he seemed to know that a boy could walk and run on land and stones with perfect impunity, and not injure a pair of red skates.

The reason the dog kept out of the way was that one day the boy with the red skates grasped his tail in one hand and beat him with a switch held in the other, and made him run with might and main, while the tormentor held his feet together, and made the hills send back his merry shouts as he flew along behind his four-footed locomotive. The switch kept the dog from turning on him, and he had such a ride as the dog vowed that boy should never again enjoy at his expense.

But in spite of this the little boy was generous. One day he sprained his ankle. It was quite painful. Not sufficiently painful to keep him from skating, but just sufficiently painful to keep him from school. So while he was obliged to skate on one foot, he lent the idle skate to another boy, to whom even a pair of red skates was a dream of princely opulence little short of an Arabian Night. And they skated together in this way until the owner of the "swan necks," as they were called, was able to strike out with both feet. And he skated and played shinny on the ice through that sombre gray winter of twenty years ago, and a jollier or merrier boy never stood on club skates. Perhaps when the spring smilled the little freckled boy exchanged his little red skates for a trap-cage or a base-ball, but this is only a conjecture on my part. I removed from the place in the spring, and have not seen the boy since, but wherever he is, I only trust that he is gliding along as gayly and happily as he once did on his little red skates.

TWO ARROWS:*

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

A MIDNIGHT MARCH.

WHEN Two Arrows parted from Sile he was well aware that the errand of the Red head had more real peril in it than his own, and he would not have had him armed with only a bow and arrows; but, oh! how he did long for a repeating rifle for his own use! He had been hungry enough for one before; but now that there was a promise of war, it seemed to him that the only thing in the world worth the having, except a horse, was one of the white man's terrible weapons. With such as he now had he had killed wild animals, and won for himself a name and fame; but in spite of that he almost despised them. What could he do now, for instance, against an Apache well armed, as all that warlike tribe were said to be?

He also had a prejudiced idea that if Sile were to meet one of them he would be in a manner helpless—a mere ignorant, green, untaught, unready white boy, not the son of a Nez Percé chief, nor skilled in the wiles and ways of Western warfare. As for himself, he felt quite confident that all he needed wherewith to meet and overcome anything or anybody was just such a perfect "repeater" as Sile carried. He somehow overlooked the fact that he had never practiced much with one, while Sile belonged to the race that made them. He had been used to a bow and arrows from the time he had learned to ride, and almost from the time he had learned to walk; so that, after all, they might be his safest weapon.

He rode on steadily for a few miles, and then he crossed the stream, and proceeded under cover of the trees. It was time to travel more slowly, for his pony had no gallop left in him. The approach to the camp even was made with some caution, but there was no need of any.

The sun was going down, and the fires were blazing brightly. The hunters had done well that day, and there were preparations for much eating. Two Arrows knew at a glance that all things were working prosperously, and that his people had no suspicion of any danger near them. The vast importance of his errand filled him very full, and he halted under the shadow of the trees.

Warriors were stalking around here and there, or were lazily stretched upon the ground. Squaws were busily dressing skins, or cooking, or chattering with one another, and children were hungrily watching the cookery, and wishing that their turns to be fed might come pretty soon. Old One-eye was at work upon a well-covered bone before going out for his usual night-watch and patrol, but he was suddenly called upon to drop it and to raise his head for a howl.

Out of the growing darkness in the edge of the woods there came a quick series of sharp, threatening, warning whoops, uttered in a shrill and youthful voice that the dog knew perfectly. So did others, for Long Bear sprang to his feet, exclaiming, "Ugh! Two Arrows!" and answered him with a whoop of such volume and meaning that every brave and boy who heard it understood it as a command, and ran for his weapons first, and then to the corral to see about his pony.

Two Arrows dismounted and led his overriden pony into the camp. Long Bear stood silently and dignifiedly in front of his lodge waiting for him, and the older warriors were gathering fast to hear the news. They knew very well that no Indian boy would have dared to give such a signal as that without good reason, and their faces were clouding seriously.

"Two Arrows, speak quick," said his father. "All hear him."

The young scout felt deeply the pride of his position. He pointed toward the lower valley with all the dignity he could muster, and uttered only the words, "Pache! War-path!"

There was a dismal chorus of "Ugh!" from all who heard him, but there was not one war-whoop. He was at once called upon for a minute and careful account of the whole affair, including the locality and condition of Judge Parks and his party of miners. He made his report with a fullness and keenness of observation that stirred up the old chief's family pride amazingly.

"Young chief," he remarked. "Do something more every time."

It looked very much like it, and his return as an intelligent and successful scout added largely to all his other claims to distinction. Not another boy in the band had ever announced anything so very bad and so important.

That was no time for anybody to spend a thought upon the fame of Two Arrows, however. All the old men said, one after another, that they wished they knew just how many Apaches there were in that war party. Had they known how very strong it was, they might have been even worse puzzled, but Long Bear was really a clear-headed leader, and he decided the whole matter promptly and finally. He told his gathering braves that the place where they were was a bad one to fight in, while their pale-face friends had selected a peculiarly good one. They themselves had but twenty-three warriors armed with rifles, and nearly as many more young men and well-grown boys armed with bows and arrows. That was no force with which to meet Apaches, nobody knew how many, and all sure to be rifle men. To go back through the pass was to die of sure starvation, even if they were not followed and slaughtered among the rocks. The Apaches were plainly making for that very pass, he said; and he was only a keen-eyed chief, and not at all a prophet, when he read the matter correctly and said:

"Pache run away from blue coats. All in a hurry. Not stop. Nez Percé hide and let them go by. Not fight. Keep pony. Keep hair. Good. Ugh!"

The party which had been sent back after the lodges and things was a serious anxiety, and a light-footed youngster was started off at once to warn them. He would be sure to meet them on their way returning, and could tell them to be on their guard, and very little more could be done for them.

Long Bear finished his speech of explanation, and then, without a moment's pause, he gave the order to break up camp and prepare to march, carrying with them every pound of provisions. Not one moment was to be lost in gaining such protection as might be had from the good position of the miners, and from the fact that they were pale faces of some importance, and from the other great fact that they were all good riflemen. There was hardly anybody in the band, old enough to understand what an Apache was, who did not fully appreciate the force of the chief's argument, and every squaw did her best to hasten the departure. Lodges came down, ponies were packed, children were gathered, warriors and braves and boys completed their preparations for fighting; the Big Tongue declared his readiness to kill a large number of Apaches, and One-eye was compelled to abandon forever all the bones he had buried since the people he barked for had settled upon the bank of that river.

There was a good deal of quiet and sober efficiency in spite of the excitement. Two Arrows had farther questions to answer from quite a number of his elders. He was furnished with one of the best ponies in the drove in acknowledgment of his services. He was now, also, to figure as a kind of guide, and he did not once think of or mention the fatigue of his long, hard ride. He very willingly ate, however, the whole of a buffalo steak, broiled for him by one of the squaws, and felt a good deal better afterward. He almost felt that he had earned a rifle, or at least a pistol, but well knew that it was all in vain to ask for one when the supply was insufficient to arm all the braves who were a full head taller than himself.

Still, it was a magnificent thing, at last, to ride out at the head of the cavalcade, by the side of a tall warrior, as the one boy of all that band who was on first rate terms with the pale-faces and knew perfectly the trail leading to them. As for that, any red man of them all could have followed the tracks of the wagon wheels, even at night, but Two Arrows had no idea of surrendering that part of his growing importance. It would have done Natchekah's proud heart good to have seen him, and it would have been well worth the while of almost anybody else to have had a good look at the whole affair, as the motley array poured out into the moonlight from under the shadowy cover of the primeval forest.

There were no sleepy ones except the papooses, and they could sleep under the tightly drawn blankets upon the backs of their mothers as well as anywhere else. All the rest were more or less hardened to the quick changes and migrations of the kind of life into which they had been born. They were not likely to be injured by being kept up pretty late for one night, and there was no need that anybody should walk, now that their four footed wealth had returned.

Two Arrows thought of that, and he could hardly help reminding some of his friends of his share in so good a thing. He received a reply from one gray headed warrior which sounded very much like a snub:

"Ugh! Two Arrows, Red-head, Boys find pony first. Pony there. Brave find next day. Boy talk too much. Kill Pache like warrior. Then talk a heap. Show scalp. Whoop. Ugh!"

As for war and that sort of thing, there was no need for anybody to stir the ambition of Two Arrows up to a greater heat. He was ready enough now to do the wildest and rashest things he could think of. He felt as if he were out upon his first war-path, and that there must be somewhere a great heap of glory preparing for him.

The Nez Percé camp had been broken up with great celerity, and no time had been lost, but, after all, the summons to move had come upon them most unexpectedly. There had been a great deal to do, and but a dim light to do it by, and so it was pretty late before the picturesque caravan was in motion. It took a line of march toward the mountains until its head struck the well-marked tracks of the loaded wagons, and from that point forward its course required little guiding. By a stern command from Long Bear, the utmost silence was maintained, and, after the moon went down, the movement might fairly be said to have been performed in secret. There was no danger that any small squad of Apache scouts would assail so strong a party. Even the squaws and children felt pretty safe, but it was very hard upon the Big Tongue, for that great brave soon found himself in an advanced party, commanded by Long Bear himself, and after that he was under an absolute necessity of not saying anything during the whole march.

THE HAPPIEST CHRISTMAS

BY MARGARET J. PRESTON

‘T WAS Christmas-tide. With tales and talk
That never seemed to tire.
The children, gay with holiday,
Sat round the blazing fire.

They told of many a prank and game,
And many a Christmas past,
And questioned me if this would be
As merry as the last.

“Of all your Christmas-times,” I said,
“So rich in mirth and fun,
I beg that you each tell me true
Which was the happiest one.”

Sweet Bessie turned her radiant face
With wondering gaze on me:
“My Christmas days have been always
As glad as glad could be.”

Then merry Mabel shook her curls
Loose from the prisoning comb:
“Oh, mine was when papa and Ben
And you and Bess came home.”

Ben chuckled, “‘Twas the time I had
With crackers such a lark;
I popped and popped, and never stopped
From daylight until dark.”

“That was the best,” laughed Willoughby,
“Of any that I know,
When Roan and Bay upset the sleigh,
And drowned us in the snow.”

“Such fun it was to see the girls,
And hear them shriek and shout,
To search and sift the ten-foot drift
Until we fished them out!”

“And I,” lisped little Dimple-check,
A-tiptoe in her glee,
“Was happiest when I counted ten Dolls on my Christmas tree.”

The soft-eyed Sophie silent sat,
Nor yet had said a word,
Though I could see some memory
Her tender bosom stirred.

“What is it, darling?” and I kissed
The lips that veiled the blue;
“Tell me, I pray, what Christmas Day Brought greatest joy to you.”

The eyes she raised to mine were filled
With something like a tear,
And sweet and low she answered, so
That I could scarcely hear:

“Last Christmas Day, with all my gifts
Upon the window-sill,
I watched right long the merry throng
Of people in the street.

“And as I watched there stood a group
Of ragged girls and boys
Before the pane, their eyes astrain
With wonder at my toys.

“Poor little foreign wanderers!
My eyes began to fill;
I could not bear to see them there,
So sad and wan and chill.

“I swept my toys into my lap,
And, with a tap and call,
Opened the door, and bade the four
Come to me in the hall.

“They held their aprons, stretched their hands;
And, oh, it was a sight,
As out I poured my Christmas hoard,
To see their wild delight!”

“Each Christmas as it passed has seemed
More happy than the rest,
But of them all I think I’d call
That one the very best.”

THE “LONELY LADY’S” CHRISTMAS.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

Part II.

IT was Christmas-time again; Mrs. Vandyke was wondering if the season would ever cease to be so painful to her. She dreaded it, and yet she believed she faced it well; she imagined, like many other people, that the highest form of heroism was to endure and be silent. There was a light flurry of snow outside, and Mrs. Vandyke, who liked to see her servants enjoy themselves at such seasons, wondered if there would be much of a storm or a drift on the day itself. She moved over to the western window, while old Jonas Potter, her faithful servant, came in to light the lamps, and at this moment she caught sight of the long shed, with its flicker of candle-light briefly showing her the children’s heads—the little group who were trying so hard to make things “feel like Christmas” for their poorer companions.

“What is it, Jonas?” Mrs. Vandyke asked, listlessly. The children had disappeared from view now; the shed looked dark again.

“It’s those children, ma’am, if you please,” said the old servant. “It’s the queerest thing. I do believe they’re getting up a Christmas tree for themselves in there.”

And Jonas, quite respectfully, laughed.

Mrs. Vandyke turned around in surprise.

“Why, who are they?” she asked; and at that instant the front-door bell sounded; Jonas disappeared. Mrs. Vandyke waited, a little impatiently, for his return and the answer to her question, but it was fully five minutes before he reappeared, and then his face betrayed a mixture of perplexity and amusement hard to conceal.

“Well, Jonas?” said Mrs. Vandyke.

The man had in his hand a damp-looking piece of paper, and he held it out with a funny twinkle in his eyes.

“If you please, ma’am,” he explained, trying to look serious, “it was one of them very young ones; and it is a tree they’re fixing up, and—”

But Mrs. Vandyke waited to hear no more; she let Jonas go away and relieve his feelings by a laugh in the kitchen with Joanna, the cook, and then she read the queer little letter the factory children had written her, over and over again, with a feeling of bewilderment, in the midst of which something new to her heart restrained the “lonely lady” from laughing outright, for it must be admitted that it was a very unusual and funny proceeding.

“We’re a goin’ to have a Christmas-tree party in your shed, Missis,” said the note, “and will you come to it, please—seven o’clock on Thursday.”

Always, I believe, there is a voice waiting in the museum—in the outer light—to answer those questions of ours which come from the heart and belong to its better part. Mrs. Vandyke stood still a moment, no longer only surprised and amused. There was something in the poor little word of invitation that knocked gently on the very door of her heart—nay, woke into life the feeling which for weeks had been stirring within her mind that she perhaps had a part to fill toward others in this Christmas season; that it was not doing all her duty just to bow her head in submission or inactive endurance.

The quietest people are often those who act most rapidly on sudden impulses. Mrs. Vandyke rang the bell, and sent for Jonas’s wife, her old housekeeper.

“Matilda,” she said, decidedly, “bring my fur boots and my fur cloak and silk hood. I am going out.”

Matilda gazed and wondered while she helped her mistress on with her warm wraps. Still greater was her surprise when the lady said: “Ask Jonas to get the lantern and come with me. I am going over to that shed. Do you know anything about those children, Matilda?”

“Why, ‘m,” said the housekeeper, smiling broadly, “it seems they’re giving a Christmas party to some other poor children. We didn't drive the poor little things away, 'm, because they seemed so happy and innocent in it. I told Jonas I was afraid it would get to your ears, ma'am; but indeed I don't think the poor little things meant any harm, ma'am."

But Matilda caught her breath suddenly, for into Mrs. Vandyke's face had come the strangest, whitest look.

"Matilda!" she exclaimed, "why—am I so— Yes, I suppose I am just so hard and cold—I don't wonder." Mrs. Vandyke's words came fast and in low tones. The words of her housekeeper had betrayed her to herself.

I have told you that for weeks some new tender feelings had been stirring in her mind, and they had needed just this one touch from some unexpected quarter to reveal to the poor "lonely lady" what a treasury lay unheeded in her daily life. It seemed to her as though Jonas and his lantern never would appear; but they came at last, and in a few moments the old shed was faintly illuminated, while Mrs. Vandyke inspected the children's work with strange and remorseful sensations.

"That will do, Jonas," she said at length, in so quiet a tone that the old servant declared afterward he could not tell what she meant to do or what she was thinking; but as they retraced their steps, and Jonas's lantern swung ahead of her, lighting up large cold patches of lawn and gardens, Mrs. Vandyke's mind was very busy. To begin with, she was delighted to think she had yielded to her impulse to send for the Williams children and Adelaide, the older cousin. What was it that had prompted this? Mrs. Vandyke believed it was something she had heard a child singing the last day she went down to the factory—a bit of an old hymn about Christmas Day and "giving comfort." Mrs. Vandyke remembered the tune and the singer—a little girl with a thin bright face and dark eyes, and an honest, brave sort of way with her work—and as that happened to be Val herself, singing as she planned her "party," the credit of giving the "lonely lady" a merry Christmas belonged to her from the first.

The young Williams had been delighted at their invitation, and yet felt a trifle afraid of spending two whole days with Aunt Irene, who was so cold, although always kind in her manner; but there was a certain sense of exhilaration about arriving on a clear, cold night at the fine house, after a ten-mile sleigh-ride, with the prospect of a good hot supper before them, and a cozy chat with old Matilda, anyway, who was their staunch friend. So while Mrs. Vandyke was looking at Val's Christmas tree, and then laying off her wraps in the library, to which she brought back a much more alert manner and a happier expression, the big sleigh full of Christmas guests was turning the corner at the end of the main street, showing happy young faces to Val and Dolly, who with their mother were out again doing a little—a very little—Christmas shopping. The luxury of fresh meat and an apple-dumpling had been decided, too, to Dolly's infinite delight, although in Mr. Judkin's shop she saw jars of preserved fruit, at which she gazed longingly, while Val was wishing that they could have dinner enough for the twenty little guests she counted on at her party, for whom her mother had made twenty cakes, and Johnny Baker procured twenty sticks of candy.

"There's the 'lonely lady's' sleigh," called out Dolly, as the sleigh whirled by, and for an instant the four pairs of young eyes exchanged bright glances.

"Oh, perhaps she's going to have a party herself!" cried Dolly, in a tone of despair.

Val was a little worried lest her scheme should be interfered with. Still, true to herself, she said, bravely, "What if she is? we won't hurt anything or anybody with ours."

"But we'll be so cold!" said poor Dolly, upon whom the vision of the merry young people speeding toward Mrs. Vandyke's lovely house had a depressing effect. If Val thought this, more than likely she did not say so, but trudged home, keeping Dolly's spirits up by thoughts of how pleased the lame children in the alley would be, and how nice to have a real tree all for themselves. Still, even when the bedclothes were over them, Val had to admit to herself it was turning terribly cold, and a tear or two which she could not very well choke back forced their way from under her eyelids as she thought of the possibility that no fun at all could be expected from a Christmas-tree party given in a perfect ice box.

"I never was more surprised, or amused, I hardly know which," Mrs. Vandyke was saying, after her young guests had enjoyed a delicious supper, and were sitting around the library fire. "And now, girls, I don't suppose you'll mind entering into a plan I have for returning my invitation in the most appropriate manner. I am not certain whether you all know that upstairs—my children's nursery—has been closed for years. Jessie's toys and Phil's are there, suppose, in the character of an unexpected Santa Claus, we take them over and leave the children to discover them?"

Dorothea's eyes fairly snapped with delight; and indeed I think no proposition could have suited all the children better. Long had they known that the nursery wing of the house was closed, and in their rare visits to the house in Dyketown the children had often passed by the closed door leading thereto, wondering what the three rooms above contained; for it was just before a Christmas festivity that Jessie and little Phil had been called away.

Mrs. Vandyke summoned old Jonas, and told her nephew where the keys were, but she herself remained seated before the fire when they went to open the long silent nurseries.

Old Jonas, perhaps, understood better than the rest just all that it meant. For years he had longed to see his mistress give some just such sign as this, knowing how much braver and better and happier her life would be when once the seal was broken, the "founts run free."

"Miss Adelaide," he said, solemnly turning back as he opened the door leading up the "children's staircase," as it was called, "do you remember what I said to Mrs. Williams the last day she was here? I told her, miss, that opening this door would be opening your aunt's heart."

Long ago, in a fit of strange and almost rebellious sadness, Mrs. Vandyke had declared Christmas never again should be "kept" in her house. Locking away the treasures, the toys of all sorts which had come for her children, whose little eyes and hands were stilled in death before they saw or touched them, she had declared she locked away all the Christmas out of her life. So you see what it was had made her a "lonely lady," and why her proud, sad heart, being softened and understanding better its work in life, now longed to open the door behind which she had shut out from her lonely life the peace which belongs to all cheerful workers in the Lord's vineyard.

"We're going down early, mother," Val was explaining, about six o'clock on the morning of Christmas Eve, "to see how the tree looks. The Vincents are going to have twenty-five cents to spend, and I thought we could put a few more candles on. What time can you get home?"

"It's a busy day up at the hotel," said little Mrs. Morison. "But I can get away by half past six—even if I have to go back again."

"Oh, do, mother," cried Val. "It will make you think of home when you see the little tree. And just think how pleased all the children are going to be! Why, I don't believe Milly James slept last night for thinking of it."

Mrs. Morison smiled her assent to Val's words. She was willing enough, poor woman, that her children should extract whatever amusement Val could contrive for them out of the holiday season, yet as she hurried a ray from the old tenement in the cold gray of the December morning, very little promise was ahead for herself or them, and it was hard work for the poor widow to keep back the tears that sprang to her eyes at mention of "home" or "old times."

"I TOLD HER THAT OPENING THIS DOOR WOULD BE OPENING YOUR AUNT'S HEART!"

"Come, now, Dolly," Val said to that young person, as they, too, emerged into the wintry street. "we'll have a good look at the tree on our way down, and then won't it be fun to tell all the children—and if only Josie Vincent has that twenty-five cents!"

Nothing outside the shed looked different to the children as they approached; but the very moment they opened the door, Val thought she must have lost her senses. What—just please tell her what had happened.

The tree was there: not a fibre of its branches changed, but even in the gray morning light it fairly twinkled with little shining ornaments, silver and gilt, candles and ribbons, and stars and crescents. And more than that, in what seemed a royal profusion toys of all kinds were scattered about, from a French doll with real hair to a big hobby-horse, a sled, skates, and a big doll's house.

Now Dolly simply began to cry. Val said afterward she was glad of it. It roused her.

"Dolly!" she shrieked, wild with delight, "don't be a goose. Somebody's done it. But, oh! who, and can it be for us?"

A few minutes later there was no reason to doubt this, for Dorothea and Irene Williams had been up almost at daylight, and old Jonas was on the watch too; so by the time the first excitement had subsided, the children beheld the old man coming from the back kitchen of the "lonely lady's" house with a big stove in his arms, followed by two girls about their own ages, who introduced themselves to Val and Dolly as Mrs. Vandyke's nieces.

We all know that young people very soon make acquaintance with one another, and so in ten minutes the four girls were chatting together—Val had told the story of her tree, Irene Williams had explained Mrs. Vandyke's approval of the invitation, and by the time that Joanna sent out word that breakfast was waiting hot in the kitchen for the little Morisons, Irene had betrayed further and more bewilderingly delightful plans for Val's Christmas-tree party.

Val may live to give those who are about her many a happy Christmas Day, Dolly's blue eyes may dim with age, and gray hairs make their way into the little dancing golden locks, but never can either of the sisters forget the joys of that morning. First of all there was the request to the factory that the Morisons be excused from work; then a message was sent to Mrs. Morison, asking her to dinner at the "lonely lady's"; and then, when Val was just beginning to fear her little comrades would think themselves forgotten, the big sleigh came to the door, and she and Dolly were carried off with Adelaide, Irene, and Dorothea tucked in somehow to make certain more substantial purchases for Val's little friends, and her mother, sister, and herself, and to give Johnny Baker news of what was going to happen, and let him mount the seat by old Jonas, and enjoy this part of the day with them.

As for the Williams children, they declared they asked no better Christmas fun than all of this; and to have seen Val's expression when a new cloak and a muff and boa were purchased for her mother, and dresses and new hats for Dolly and herself—to say nothing of the rosy-cheeked doll that the little sister had so long watched with dreamy delight in a store window—was worth any or all the trouble involved.

And what had it cost—all this pure honest joy in so many hearts, old and young, all this bath of sunlight in dark lives? Only that the real meaning of the day should have been apparent to Val, who did not sit down in idleness because nothing came to her hand, but did her best with whatever she could find to use for the happiness of those around her, and that one lonely and dissatisfied heart should have opened its door on Christmas Eve to let in all the flood of peace and joy which comes of well doing.

"Well, there are all sorts of Christmas charities," Irene remarked on that eventful occasion: "but, do you know, this is the first time I ever heard of things being reversed, and the poor children doing the good and teaching the rich ones their duty."

But no one ever had to regret Val's Christmas treat party. Before the next year the little sisters were in good luck, Mrs. Morison had easier work, and a prospect of being back in the old home very soon, while Val's guests, beginning with Johnny Baker, were never forgotten, in season or out, after her own nieces and nephew, by one whom never again did it occur to Val or Dolly to call the "lonely lady."

SANTA CLAUS'S TOOL BOX.

YOUNG INVESTIGATOR. "Oh, sister, I'm having such a jolly Christmas! I've been finding out how all the toys are made, and how to put them together again."

Oh, what shall my blue eyes go see?
Shall it be pretty Quack Quack to-day?
Or the Peacock upon the yew-tree?
Or the dear little white lambs at play?

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

AMHERST, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am one of the older ones, but I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and want to tell you of it. Our fourteen-year-old Sarah has taken it from the first number, and now has six volumes. Four-year-old Willie used to sit in my lap by the hour and winter, looking at the pictures and listening to the stories, of which he had his favorites.

As we have lived six years in Burma, we were much interested in David Ker's account of the two missionaries who came so near losing their lives in the first Burmese war. One of them was the Rev. Jonathan Wade, D. D., who reduced the Karen language to writing. One evening in March, 1859, while sitting on the veranda after dinner, I asked whether he had received any maltreatment at the hands of the Burmans during the war. "Well," said he, "in his slow, deliberate way, "that all depends on what you call maltreatment." Then he proceeded to relate the story substantially as Mr. Ker told with some additional particulars which he remembered.

The other missionary was Mr. Hough, who became a government teacher, and was positioned after many years of service. He died at his residence in Maulmain in 1850. At the present time two of his grandsons are civil officers in Burma. Dr. Wade died in 1872, at the house of Rev. Dr. Binney, in Rangoon, where I heard him tell the story of his narrow escape from death. The good missionaries lived to do much work in Burma as well as in other lands. I have a picture of him, and my children wheel me along the sidewalk in a wheel-chair. One day I espied a swallow that had impaled itself upon the sharp point of a lightning-rod while trying to descend too rapidly to its nest in the chimney. A school-mate of my daughter told me that she saw the poor thing when her house was being built, and that several swallows came around with much ado and great twittering, and tried to help their unfortunate comrade. They seem to have become discouraged, for the chimney was deserted when I first saw the dead swallow. It remained there several weeks, until it was removed by some painters.

S. B. RAND.

Thank you very much for this letter, and for the kind words of commendation which we do not print, because they are interwoven with personal details not intended for publication. But we must be permitted to thank parents when they tell us that they consider HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE "bright, healthy, and instructive," and that they long for its success.

Another story about the swallows shall follow:

BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I have no pets to write of, so I would like to tell you a curious and true story about some swallows. When my aunt Anne lived at her home near Reading, Pennsylvania, a pair of swallows built their nest under the eaves of the house, facing the yard. After a while little ones were hatched, and used to come and sit on the chimney, and my old-fashioned cellar door opened into the yard, and one of the doors stood open almost all the time. A favorite cat liked to sit on one of the doors and watch the little swallows. The old swallows did not like that, so several times they flew around and pecked at the cat as they went by, but that did not seem to discourage it. One day, when the cat was sitting on the fence near by watching the little swallows, they began to fly around and peck at her again, but could not make her budge; so she went away, but returned presently with a whole flock of swallows. They flew around the house, and began to peck at the cat as they went by. After they had done this several times, the cat was alarmed, jumped down from the fence, and ran into the cellar as fast as she could; and my aunt said she never saw the cat watching the little ones again.

ROBERT GRISCOM, B. (aged 11).

EBERSBERG, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl four years old. I can not write yet myself, so I had to get my mamma to write this letter for me. I wish I could brought to go to school and get whipped. I have six dolls.

Their names are Mary, Woolie, Oh! Sewie, and a rag dollie. I got a new doll of my daddy. He calls her Blanche, after myself. She is a French doll. Woolie has to lend, but I love her anyway.

My papa works in the bank. I have no sister or brother. I wish I had for I get so tired playing by myself. I got your paper for a birthday present. I like it very much. I can not read it myself, but my mamma reads it to me. I do not like to hear the letters read so much! I have two grandmas and two grandpas. One of my grandmas and grandpas do not live here, but I see them very often, but I see the others nearly every day. I like to go to my grandpa's, she always has such good things to eat. It will bring me to mind, when we are ready to get turkey for dinner. I wish I could live in the country; I think it would be such good fun to climb the trees and fences. I do not like cold weather. I wish it was always warm, so I could run out and play. I hope you will not think this letter too long to print, as I am very anxious to have it read to me.

Your little friend, A. BLANCHE B.

A very sweet little letter, for which Blanche should have a kiss if I were near enough to give her one.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE four years, and like it very much. My father is a sailor, and is nearly thirty years old, and Nellie, my sister, is nearly thirteen. Thanksgiving Day we have a church service and harvest festival. The Sunday-school children sing fruits and vegetables from the church; then they are nicely arranged; after the service they are distributed to poor families. I have written this with my typewriter to show you how I can use it. With much love,

Your friend, CHARLIE B. R.

ASPEN, COLORADO.

I have read a great many of your letters, but have not had time to write one like a school girl eight years old. I have a kitten; her name is Kitty Clover. I am going to school, and in the Second Reader. I have a very nice teacher. I live where there are silver mines all around us. I have been down in the mines twice, where the men dig out ore, and I think it very nice. I should like to go on a long sea-voyage. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since I could read. I like it very much, and like to read the letters from other little girls. I wish I could write to you again when I have something to write about.

JEAN A.

P. S.—For fear you could not read my writing, I tapped my papa to copy it for me. My papas are generally very glad to oblige good little girls, and I wish they would do this way with you. I love you, and your letter is a very welcome one to my dear.

EDMUNDS, IRELAND, YORKSHIRE.

The last time I wrote to you I was at Clamart, a small country place near Paris. Now I am at Ilkley, near Leeds in Yorkshire. Ilkley is a very pretty hillside watering place. The river Wharfe flows through it. The town is called Ilkley on the hill, called "The Cow and Calf." On one side of the Cow there is a face resembling that of a sphinx, and on the top of the rock there is the head of a Bull. People believe that every body steps on the same place that it has become so large. There are a lot of very large rocks, and some queer marks on them, called "Tommy-ting" marks.

I am living with my grandparents at present; my father and mother are in Paris. We have several pets, and all of them are cats. We had a Newfoundland puppy a short time since, but alas! he died. I was so sorry! He was named King Cole; we called him King Cole, when we were in Paris, when he came to Ilkley from Paris we brought them with us. They are Angora kittens. The eldest is now about five months old; he is yellow and white, and his tail measures about five inches in width; he is called Milord. The other two are four months old; they are brother and sister, and are like each other, having white chests and tails, and black and brown backs; the brother is called Bell and the sister Mimi. Then there is also the cat grandma had before she came, and she is quite a good one, and I like her very much. Sometimes she will ask me to sit down, so that she can sit on my knee, and if I won't, she jumps on my shoulder. Whenever she hears any rustling paper in the house, she comes to me, and if I have a paper ball for her to play with. I do make her very often, and she will continue bringing paper balls as long as I continue to make them. There are paper balls all about the house and garden. Once, when Mimi had been in the garden, she came trotting upstairs, and she laid a leg down before me. All the little cats and army calls them follow me about the house and garden, and whenever I call they are sure to come. When they are left by themselves they begin to cry. Sometimes Mimi will take her paper ball and bring it near her pot of milk, and when she is ready she takes it up again, and goes away and plays with it.

We have got a bicycle, a sociable, but it is out of order, so we think of having another. Aunty has got a beehive with about twenty thousand bees in it. There is a lot of honey, and in five days ago we took out three frames and all the sections. The weather has been rather cold and rainy this summer, so the bees have not made as much honey as they would have done if the weather had been favorable. It is very interesting to watch them struggle with the wasps, which want to get into the hive, and to see them take possession of the honey. Sometimes I pick up a dead bee or a bit of leaf and put it on the front of the hive, and in a few minutes it is there, and one will fly off with it and drop it at a distance.

I have one brother; he is called Clarence, and he is sixteen years old. I am fifteen. I do not go to school at present, because I have been ill. With much love, VIRGINIA LUCY B.

STANFORD, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I am a boy eleven years old. I go to school, and study definitions, geography, reading, grammar, philosophy, and history. One day one of the scholars brought a horse, and we had a fine time riding it. I had a pretty little dog, and it was just beginning to get lame, when the cat caught it. In the Post-office box lately I saw a letter from a boy in Troy, New York, and his initials were J. N. H. I saw a grandfather's, whose name was Augustus Lawrence Converse, so I am writing to ask him if his name is Converse, and if he will send me some of his letters, as we can not meet we will have to write to each other. My grandfather has given me this paper ever since it was first published, and I think it more interesting every week. J. N. H.

MILWAUKEE, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I live in Milanville, with my grandma and mamma. I go to school, and study reading, spelling, and writing. I have a kitty for my pet; she is very playful. I am seven years old. MARY L. N.

ETICA, NEW YORK.

I am eleven years old, and go to the advanced school, and I like to read and write. I do not like to take music lessons. I have four sisters and one brother. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is a present from my grandfather, and I like it very much. My favorite stories are "Koff House" and "Two Arrows." My brother and I have a pair of rabbits (mine is pure white), but we do not know what to name them.

LAURA G. B.

Why not name them Lily and Blanche?

CAMP MITCHELL, ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

I am a little boy ten years old. I have three pets—a pair of ducks, a cat, and a horse. We live at Fort Barrancas, but we are at the camp now. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE one year. Please print my little letter for me. THEODORE A.

NEWARK, CONNECTICUT.

I have been wishing to send you a letter for some time, but have not known what to say. I have seven rabbits; their colors are black, gray, white, and blue. I have also a dog, and I have many. I sell them at twenty cents apiece, and I have sold four dollars' worth. I had a little dog that came to us, and we named it I wish. My mamma was sewing one day, and she thought she heard a knock, and she went to the door, and there stood a little Skye terrier, and she let him in. My mamma was so surprised, and she gave him a dy-cake, and he would do it every time you held your finger up. But at last we had to give him away, because he got so naughty. He was everybody's dog. He would chase people's wagons, and go home with them, and in a few days come back, and we chained him up, and a grand old man from North Street came and got him, and he did not take much time to get back. We chained him up for the second time, and this time a man in Western town, and we have not seen him yet, only we hear that the man says he would not take fifty dollars for him now. G. H. S.

Poor little Skye! If he had been good and staid at home, you would have had him still, I suppose.

LANCASTER, OHIO.

I read every story in this paper, and I like "Two Arrows" better than any other. I am eleven years old, and I have a little sister, five nine years old, and a brother, five. We are going to celebrate her birthday with a little party. My grandpa is the editor of the Lancaster Gazette. We have a cat named Glossy, a hamster named Joey, a canary-bird, Chirp, and a horse, Topsy.

JEMIE E. G.

CLACKAMA, TENNESSEE.

My last letter was not published, so I thought I would try again. Nearly all of my school-mates love to hunt here, although there is not much game. I don't like to report much about fish when I can get good bites. "Two Arrows" is my favorite story now; I hope it may continue for a long time to come. Although we have Haverly, Va., for a study at school, it is real fun to use it in that way. Some of the lessons require a great deal of study. ALF. B. M.

TOM GREEN.

Tom Green was a little boy ten years old, who lived in one of the poorest parts of London. His father tried his best to earn money to support a delicate wife and four little children, as times were hard, he did not get very high wages; so Tom thought that he would try to help his father. He started out one morning with a net, and went to many shops to see if he could get a place as errand-boy. For one or two days he was not successful, but on the fourth day, as he was going down one of the streets near his home, he saw a shop to which he had not been before. It was a fruit shop. A good-natured looking man was standing at the door talking to him. He was very active, and willing to work. There was another boy in the shop who disliked him, and tried all he could to put his master against him. One day his master called him to his home, and said that he had missed some fruit, and that he feared Tom had taken it. He denied it, but was about to be sent away, when the other boy was seen, who some apples in his pocket. He was sent away, and Tom was placed higher in the shop, and at last got a shop of his own. His father went into the country with his wife, and the other boys went into offices. WILLIE C.

MELBYR, ILLINOIS.

I am twelve years old, and I like to read his delightful paper very much. I have two brothers and one sister. All the others tell about their pets, so I will. We have three kittens, named Kit, Tiger, and Maudie; and then we have some birds and horses, named Queen, Bessie, Kate, and Prince. I have written once before, but it was not printed, so I thought I would try. I hope you will not think this too long to print. I will write again, and tell about the lotus beds, if you would like to have me.

MAUD E. C.

Certainly I would like you to do so.

AMHURST, MASSACHUSETTS.

We are two brothers, Harry and Charlie. We have an older brother, who plays on the violin, and I (Charlie) take drawing lessons. We have one pet, which is a beautiful English setter, and his name is Tiger. He often comes down to school to meet us. We go nutting every fall, and gather a great many nuts. We have two chestnut-trees on our place. We have a pond full of gold-fish. Good-by. HARRY and CHARLIE T.

SCOTTSBURGH, CONNECTICUT.

My sister Fannie found some little blue spots on the 21st of November, something very uncommon here. We have two cats; both are tabbies. The youngest can jump over our hands when he is quite high. The other is a grey, but she has not learned so many tricks. We also had a pet calf, which knew its name and would come at call, but my papa sold it; her name was Lila. I go to Sunday school, and also to day school, and have a splendid teacher. I am having vacation now. LILIA A. H.

GOLEA, FLORIDA.

I am a boy thirteen years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly six months, and I like it very much. I think "In the Unknown World" is my favorite story, and also "Two Arrows" is nice. I have a little printing press, and

I am learning to print advertising cards. My father has an orange grove. CHARLES W. D.

JEROME, ILLINOIS.

I have no pets except a pretty canary bird that sings very sweetly. I am very glad Mrs. Little's to write another story for me. I think "Sam" and "Toll House" are charming. "Jo's Opportunity" is sounds beautiful. I like Miss Albert, Mr. Ernest and Mrs. Francis, and also Mr. Sam and Miss Warner very much. I have read "The Wild, Wild World" and have "Quickly now" Have you ever read them, and do you like them, dear Post-mistress? I have read lately "The King of the Pansy," and liked it so much. I am always interested in the Post office box. Harry's letter from Bangor, Maine, was so nice. I would like to write again. Four years ago, when I was eight years old, I went East on a visit to friends at Salisbury, in New Hampshire, among the mountains here Mount Kearsarge. There were a great many blueberries; I think I picked some, and I know I ate a great many. I went to Lynn, in Massachusetts, an old town, and very interesting. I liked it better than any city I ever visited. One day while I was on the beach the waves washed up to my feet a five-cent piece. I picked it up, and have it now. How nice! I think the sea god Neptune intended it as a gift to my family with. I also stopped in Boston and Chicago, good-by for this time. JEROME C.

I'll call all the authors you mention.

LIBERTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl eleven years old. My father is a farmer, and he has other boys and girls, and magazines. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much; I am interested in "Two Arrows" and I have a large dog which came from Italy. Good-by. MESSIE M.

NEW YORK CITY.

Last year we had two canary-birds. One got sick and died, and the other missed it so much that it died too, so then we did not have any. This year we have a little dog. Her name is Gwen. My sister, who is only four, takes her out on Park Avenue most every day. She does not like to get washed, and when she hears the water running in the tub she hides. My mother gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for my birthday. I like the story of "Two Arrows" very much. There was

BARTOW, W. VAN V.

I live in St. Johnsbury, Vermont. For pets I have two cats. Their names are Pepper and Mustard. They have nice times playing together. The bigger cat has a bell that he rings when he wishes to come into the house. I also have some fan-tail pigeons. I have a canary, and she has a bell in his cage. I have learned the poem "Little Leaves" in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

CORNELIA F.

WATERBURY, NEW YORK.

My brother John has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, so papa gave it to me, and I like it very much. I like "Howard" and stories and the letters best. Last summer my papa and I went to the Adirondack Mountains. There are two ways of entering the woods—one by riding on horseback and the other by driving a truckload. We rode eleven miles in a bed of sand, and six miles in the woods over the roughest kind of road. I got up on the top of an ever so high boulder, and we would all scramble to the other side of the wagon to balance it, and in a second the other wheel would be sinking into the mud, and we would have to get out. That we were in danger of going through to China, but the horses were stout and we were soon out and on the top of another rock ready to be pitched out again. Sometimes we had to get out and walk around a tree that had fallen across the road. We reached the top of a half past seven, after riding nine hours in the hot sun and dust. We had a good supper, and went to bed tired and sleepy. The next day we met over a many children from a vicinity about New York city, and all parts of the United States. We had great fun rowing, fishing, and wading on the lake-shore. One day we took a guide, and walked six miles through the forest. Eagle Falls, one of the wildest spots in the wilderness. We followed a trail, where the path was so difficult to find that we had to stick papers into the trees to find our way back. When we got there, the guide cooked our dinner at the foot of the mountain. When we had eaten dinner we went to the top of the mountain, and as we were climbing it we had to take hold of the grass in order to get up. We returned home ready to enjoy our supper, which was really very good. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, if they want a good time next summer, DO GO and see for themselves. CLARA R. A.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS, I have not very many pets to tell about; in fact, all that I have are two little p. p. p. s. They are very cunning little birds, and are a fine team. They sing beautiful, and everything is nice about them, except the horrible noise that they sometimes make when they go to school here, and study arithmetic, French, German, grammar, and so on.

FRANKLIN, MASSACHUSETTS.

My father is a farmer. He raises corn, cotton, wheat, and oats. I am going to school now. My teacher is Professor M.; he is a good teacher, and we are well pleased with him. I have two dogs. Their names are Guess and Tap. They are very young, and I am training them to hunt.

SAMUEL L. R.

INDICA, NEW YORK.

I am a little boy twelve years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for five years. My aunt would send it to me first, while she lived, and since her death I have continued it, and wish all little boys and girls might have a paper they could enjoy as much as I do. There is a beautiful town. We have hills, a valley, and a lovely lake. In winter we have nice coasting on the hills, and in summer we have the lake to enjoy for boating, camping, etc. We have splendid schools here and beautiful school buildings, and Cornell University is located on East Hill. Now shouldn't any little boy or girl be happy with a good home in so favored a place? EDWARD B. DE L.

AN ERRAND TO SANTA CLAUS.

MR. POLICEMAN, please tell me the way:
 You're the right one to ask, all the folks say.
 Must I cross over, or go straight ahead?
 I'm going to see Santa Claus— What's that you said?
 He came to see me once; he's coming again—
 Pretty soon too, I guess—don't know just when.
 I want to tell him, whenever he comes,
 To bring me a dolly, not trumpets or drums:

That is what Jack wants—Jack is my brother.
 Santa Claus might take one for the other.
 I don't know his house, but it must be quite near;
 The windows are all full of playthings right here.
 I hope there's a door, and I won't have to go
 Down the chimney to get in, as he does, you know.
 Well, if I don't start I sha'n't reach there to-day,
 So, Mr. Policeman, please show me the way.

HOW THE PELICAN TOOK A BATH.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

THE pelican is a funny-looking bird. His wings are very strong, and under his lower bill he carries a queer kind of a pouch, which he finds very useful when he goes on a fishing excursion. His upper bill is provided with a strong hook, and this is all the fishing-tackle he requires, and there is no necessity of his carrying any bait. He generally catches enough fish at one haul to last him for some time, and the supply is as handy as if he had a market in the house.

It would have made a whole school of fishes laugh uproariously to have seen the pelican take a bath in the pool provided for him and some feathered companions at the Central Park, New York. Such a dirty bird as he was! You wouldn't imagine he had taken a bath for a month at least.

One bright October day the pelican made up his mind that what he needed most was a good washing, so he waddled along to the bath-tub provided for him, and paddled and splashed until he was thoroughly wet, and there was almost as much water outside the tank as there was inside.

When you come out of the bath, you generally fly for a towel. So did the pelican. The air was his towel, and he flew around at such a rate, with his wings extended, that all the other birds got out of his way as soon as possible.

Then you would have laughed to have seen him dress himself, all the while keeping his wings stretched, so that every tiny feather might dry, as our clothes dry on a clothes-line. Then with his funny bill he went to work as a laundress does with her iron, and smoothed every feather, one at a time, down his breast.

O what a brilliant success he was making out of the Pelican Laundry! Why, you wouldn't have known the bird. Instead of a great, dirty, dingy-looking biped, here was a web-footed water-fowl in magnificent white plumage, worthy to associate with swans, and casting into the shade all his dull-colored companions.

A CHRISTMAS TURKEY, AND HOW IT CAME.
 BY LOUISA M. ALCOTT.

"I KNOW we couldn't do it."
 "I say we could, if we all helped."
 "How can we?"
 "I've planned lots of ways, only you mustn't laugh at them, and you mustn't say a word to mother. I want it to be all a surprise."

"She'll find us out."

"No, she won't, if we tell her we won't get into mischief."

"Fire away, then, and let's hear your fine plans."

"We must talk softly, or we shall wake father. He's got a headache."

A curious change came over the faces of the two boys as their sister lowered her voice, with a nod toward a half-opened door. They looked sad and ashamed, and Kitty sighed as she spoke, for all knew that father's headaches always began by his coming home stupid or cross, with only a part of his wages, and mother always cried when she thought they did not see her, and after the long sleep father looked as if he didn't like to meet their eyes, but went off early.

They knew what it meant, but never spoke of it—only pondered over it, and mourned with mother at the change which was slowly altering their kind, industrious father into a moody man, and mother into an anxious, over-worked woman.

Kitty was thirteen, and a very capable girl, who helped with the housekeeping, took care of the two little ones, and went to school. Tommy and Sammy looked up to her and thought her a remarkably good sister. Now, as they sat round the stove having "a go-to-bed warm," the three heads were close together, and the boys listened eagerly to Kitty's plans, while the rattle of the sewing-machine in another room went on as tirelessly as it had done all day; for mother's work was more and more needed every month.

"Well," began Kitty, in an impressive tone, "we all know that there won't be a bit of Christmas in this family if we don't make it. Mother's too busy, and father don't care, so we must see what we can do; for I should be mortified to death to go to school and say I hadn't had any turkey or plum-pudding. Don't expect presents, but we must have some kind of a decent dinner."

"So I say; I'm tired of fish and potatoes," said Sammy, the younger.

"But where's the dinner coming from?" asked Tommy, who had already taken some of the cares of life on his young shoulders, and knew that Christmas dinners did not walk into people's houses without money.

"We'll earn it," and Kitty looked like a small Napoleon planning the passage of the Alps. "You, Tom, must go early to-morrow to Mr. Brisket and offer to carry baskets. He will be dreadfully busy, and want you, I know, and you are so strong you can lug as much as some of the big fellows. He pays well, and if he won't give much money, you can take your wages in things to eat. We want everything."

"What shall I do?" cried Sammy, while Tom sat turning this plan over in his mind.

"Take the old shovel and clear sidewalks. The snow came on purpose to help you."

"It's awful hard work, and the shovel's half gone," began Sammy, who preferred to spend his holiday coasting on an old tea-tray.

"Don't growl, or you won't get any dinner," said Tom, making up his mind to lug baskets for the good of the family, like a manly lad as he was.

"I," continued Kitty, "have taken the hardest part of all; for after my work is done, and the babies safely settled, I'm going to beg for the leavings of the holly and pine swept out of the church down below, and make some wreaths and sell them."

"If you can," put in Tommy, who had tried pencils, and failed to make a fortune.

"Not in the street," cried Sam, looking alarmed.

"Yes, at the corner of the Park. I'm bound to make some money, and don't see any other way. I shall put on an old hood and shawl, and no one will know me. Don't care if they do." And Kitty tried to mean what she said, but in her heart she felt that it would be a trial to her pride if any of her school-mates should happen to recognize her.

"Don't believe you'll do it."

"See if I don't; for I will have a good dinner one day in the year."

"Well, it doesn't seem right for us to do it. Father ought to take care of us, and we only buy some presents with the little bit we earn. He never gives us anything now." And Tommy scowled at the bedroom door, with a strong sense of injury struggling with affection in his boyish heart.

"Hush!" cried Kitty. "Don't blame him. Mother says we must not forget he's our father. I try not to; but when she cries, it's hard to feel as I ought." And a sob made the little girl stop short as she poked the fire to hide the trouble in the face that should have been all smiles.

For a moment the room was very still, as the snow beat on the window, and the fire-light flickered over the six shabby little boots put up on the stove hearth to dry.

Tommy's cheerful voice broke the silence, saying, stoutly: "Well, if I've got to work all day, I guess I'll go to bed early. Don't fret, Kit; we'll help all we can, and have a good time—see if we don't."

"I'll go out real early, and shovel like fury. Maybe I'll get a dollar. Would that buy a turkey?" asked Sammy, with the air of a millionaire.

"No, dear; one big enough for us would cost two, I'm afraid. Perhaps we'll have one sent us. We belong to the church, though folks don't know how poor we are now, and we can't beg." And Kitty bustled about, clearing up, rather exercised in her mind about going and asking for the much-desired fowl.

Soon all three were fast asleep, and nothing but the whir of the machine broke the quiet that fell upon the house. Then from the inner room a man came and sat over the fire with his head in his hands and his eyes fixed on the ragged little boots left to dry. He had heard the children's talk, and his heart was very heavy as he looked about the shabby room that used to be so neat and pleasant. What he thought no one knows, what he did we shall see by-and-by; but the sorrow and shame and tender silence of his children worked a miracle that night more lasting and lovely than the white beauty which the snow wrought upon the sleeping city.

Bright and early the boys were away to their work, while Kitty sang as she dressed the little sisters, put the house in order, and made her mother smile at the mysterious hints she gave of something splendid which was going to happen. Father was gone, and though all rather dreaded evening, nothing was said; but each worked with a will, feeling that Christmas should be merry in spite of poverty and care.

All day, Tommy lugged fat turkeys, roasts of beef, and every sort of vegetable for other people's good dinners on the morrow, wondering meanwhile where his own was coming from. Mr. Brisket had an army of boys trudging here and there, and was too busy to notice any particular lad till the hurry was over, and only a few belated buyers remained to be served. It was late; but the stores kept open, and though so tired he could hardly stand, brave Tommy held on when the other boys left, hoping to earn a trifle more by extra work. He sat down on a barrel to rest during a leisure moment, and presently his weary head nodded sideways into a basket of cranberries, where he slept quietly till the sound of gruff voices roused him.

It was Mr. Brisket scolding because one dinner had been forgotten.

"I told that rascal Beals to be sure and carry it, for the old gentleman will be in a rage if it doesn't come, and take away his custom. Every boy gone, and I can't leave the store, nor you either, Pat, with all the clearing up to do."

"Here's a by, sir, slapin' illigant forinist the cranberries, bad luck to him!" answered Pat, with a shake that set poor Tom on his legs, wide awake at once.

"Good luck to him, you mean. Here, What's your name, you take this basket to that number, and I'll make it worth your while," said Mr. Brisket, much relieved by this unexpected help.

"All right, sir," and Tommy trudged off as briskly as his tired legs would let him, cheering the long, cold walk with visions of the turkey with which his employer might reward him, for there were piles of them, and Pat was to have one for his family.

His brilliant dreams were disappointed, however, for Mr. Brisket naturally supposed Tom's father would attend to that part of the dinner, and generously heaped a basket with vegetables, rosy apples, and a quart of cranberries.

"There, if you ain't too tired, you can take one more load to that number, and a merry Christmas to you!" said the stout man, handing over his gift with the promised dollar.

"Thank you, sir; good-night," answered Tom, shouldering his last load with a grateful smile, and trying not to look longingly at the poultry; for he had set his heart on at least a skinny bird as a surprise to Kit.

Sammy's adventures that day had been more varied and his efforts more successful, as we shall see, in the end, for Sammy was a most engaging little fellow, and no one could look into his blue eyes without wanting to pat his curly yellow head with one hand while the other gave him something. The cares of life had not lessened his confidence in people, and only the most abandoned ruffians had the heart to deceive or disappoint him. His very tribulations usually led to something pleasant, and whatever happened, sunshiny Sam came right side up, lucky and laughing.

Undaunted by the drifts or the cold wind, he marched off with the remains of the old shovel to seek his fortune, and found it at the third house where he called. The first two sidewalk jobs were easy jobs, and he pocketed his ninepences with a growing conviction that this was his chosen work. The third sidewalk was a fine long one, for the house stood on the corner, and two pavements must be cleared.

"It ought to be fifty cents; but perhaps they won't give me so much, I'm such a young one. I'll show 'em I can work, though, like a man;" and Sammy rang the bell with the energy of a telegraph boy.

Before the bell could be answered, a big boy rushed up, exclaiming, roughly: "Get out of this! I'm going to have the job. You can't do it. Start, now, or I'll cluck you into a snow-bank."

"I won't!" answered Sammy, indignant at the brutal tone and unjust claim. "I got here first, and it's my job. You let me alone. I ain't afraid of you or your snow-banks either."

The big boy wasted no time in words, for steps were heard inside, but, after a brief scuffle, hauled Sammy, fighting bravely all the way, down the steps, and tumbled him into a deep drift. Then he ran up the steps, and respectfully asked for the job when a neat maid opened the door. He would have got it if Sam had not roared out, as he floundered in the drift: "I came first. He knocked me down 'cause I'm the smallest. Please let me do it—please!"

Before another word could be said, a little old lady appeared in the hall, trying to look stern, and failing entirely, because she was the picture of a dear, fat, cozy grandma.

"Send that bad big boy away, Maria, and call in the poor little fellow. I saw the whole thing, and he shall have the job if he can do it."

The bully slunk away, and Sammy came panting up the steps, white with snow, a great bruise on his forehead, and a beaming smile on his face, looking so innocently like little Santa Claus who had taken a "header" out of his sleigh that the maid laughed, and (so old ladies are apt to) "Bless the boy! he's dreadfully hurt, and doesn't know it. Come in and be brushed and get your breath cold, and tell me how that scamp came to treat you so."

Nothing loath to be comforted, Sammy told his little tale while Maria dusted him off on the mat, and the old lady hovered in the doorway of the dining-room, where a nice breakfast smoked and smelled so deliciously, that the boy sniffed the odor of coffee and buckwheats like a hungry hound.

"He'll get his death if he goes to work till he's dried a bit. Put him over the register, Maria, and I'll give him a hot drink, for it's bitter cold, poor dear!"

Away trotted the kind old lady, and in a minute came back with coffee and cakes, on which Sammy feasted as he warmed his toes and told Kitty's plans for Christmas, led on by the old lady's questions, and quite unconscious that he was letting all sorts of cats out of the bag.

Mrs. Bryant understood the little story, and made her plans also, for the rosy-faced boy was very like a little grandson who died last year, and her sad old heart was very tender to all other small boys. So she found out where Sammy lived, and nodded and smiled at him most cheerily as he tugged stoutly away at the snow on the long pavements till all was done, and the little workman came for his wages.

A bright silver dollar and a pocketful of gingerbread sent him off a rich and happy boy to shovel and sweep till noon, when he proudly showed his earnings at home, and feasted the babies on the carefully hoarded cake, for Dilly and Dot were the idols of the household.

"Now, Sammy dear, I want you to take my place here this afternoon, for mother will have to take her work home by-and-by, and I must sell my wreaths. I only got enough green for six and two bunches of holly, but if I can sell them for ten or twelve cents apiece, I shall be glad. Girls never can earn as much money as boys somehow," sighed Kitty, surveying the thin wreaths tied up with carpet revellings, and vainly puzzling her young wits over a sad problem.

"I'll give you some of my money if you don't get a dollar; then we'll be even. Men always take care of women, you know, and ought to," cried Sammy, setting a fine example to his father, if he had only been there to profit by it.

With thanks Kitty left him to rest on the old sofa, while the happy babies swarmed over him; and putting on the shabby hood and shawl, she slipped away to stand at the Park gate, modestly offering her little wares to the passers-by. A nice old gentleman bought two, and his wife scolded him for getting such bad ones; but the money gave more happiness than any other he spent that day. A child took a ten-cent bunch of holly with its red berries, and there Kitty's market ended. It was very cold, people were in a hurry, bolder hucksters pressed before the timid little girl, and the balloon man told her to "clear out."

Hoping for better luck, she tried several other places, but the short afternoon was soon over, the streets began to thin, the keen wind chilled her to the bone, and her heart was very heavy to think that in all the rich, merry city, where Christmas gifts passed her in every hand, there were none for the dear babies and boys at home, and the Christmas dinner was a failure.

"I must go and get supper anyway, and I'll hang 'em up in our own rooms, as I can't sell 'em," said Kitty, wiping a very big tear from her cold eyes, and determining to go away.

A smaller, shabbier girl than herself stood near, looking at the bunch of holly with wistful eyes, and glad to do as she wished some one would do to her. Kitty offered the only thing she had to give, saying, kindly,

FIVE HAPPY LITTLE SOULS SKIPPED GAYLY ROUND THE TABLE.

"You may have it—merry Christmas" and ran away before the delighted child could thank her.

I am very sure that one of the spirits who fly about at this season of the year saw the little act, made a note of it, and in about fifteen minutes rewarded Kitty for her sweet remembrance of the golden rule.

As she went sadly homeward she looked up at some of the big houses where every window shone with the festivities of Christmas Eve, and more than one tear fell, for the little girl found life pretty hard just then.

"There don't seem to be any wreaths at these windows; perhaps they'd buy mine. I can't bear to go home with so little for my share," she said, stopping before one of the biggest and brightest of these fairy palaces, where the sound of music was heard, and many little heads peeped from behind the curtains as if watching for some one.

Kitty was just going up the steps to make another trial, when two small boys came racing round the corner, slipped on the icy pavement, and both went down with a crash that would have broken older bones. One was up in a minute, laughing; the other lay squirming and howling, "Oh, my knee! my knee!" till Kitty ran and picked him up with the motherly consolations she had learned to give.

"It's broken; I know it," wailed the small sufferer as Kitty carried him up the steps, while his friend wildly rang the door-bell.

It was like going into fairy-land, for the house was all astir with a children's Christmas party. Servants flew about with smiling faces, open doors gave ravishing glimpses of a feast in one room and a splendid tree in another, while a crowd of little faces peered over the balusters in the hall above, eager to come down and enjoy the glories prepared for them.

A pretty young girl came to meet Kitty, and listened to her story of the accident, which proved to be less severe than it at first appeared; for Bertie, the injured party, forgot his anguish at sight of the tree, and hopped upstairs so nimbly that every one laughed.

"He said his leg was broken, but I guess he's all right," said Kitty, reluctantly turning from this happy scene to go out into the night again.

"Would you like to see our tree before the children come down?" asked the pretty girl, seeing the wistful look in the child's eyes, and the shine of half-dried tears on her cheek.

"Oh yes; I never saw anything so lovely. I'd like to tell the babies all about it," and Kitty's face beamed at the prospect, as if the kind words had melted all the frost away.

"How many babies are there?" asked the pretty girl, as she led the way into the brilliant room. Kitty told her, adding several other facts, for the friendly atmosphere seemed to make them friends at once.

"I will buy the wreaths, for we haven't any," said the girl in silk, as Kitty told how she was just coming to offer them when the boys fell.

It was pretty to see how carefully the little hostess laid away the shabby garlands and slipped a half-dollar into Kitty's hand; prettier, still, to watch the sly way in which she tucked some bomboms, a red ball, a blue whip, two china dolls, two pairs of little mittens, and some gilded nuts into an empty box for "the babies"; and prettiest of all, to see the smiles and tears make April in Kitty's face as she tried to tell her thanks for this beautiful surprise.

The world was all right when she got into the street again and ran home with the precious box hugged close; feeling that at last she had something to make a merry Christmas of.

Shrieks of joy greeted her, for Sammy's nice old lady had set a basket full of pies, nuts and raisins, oranges and cake, and—oh, happy Sammy!—a sled, all for love of the blue eyes that twinkled so merrily when he told her about the tea-tray. Piled upon this red car of triumph, Dilly and Dot were being dragged about, while the other treasures were set forth on the table.

"I must show mine," cried Kitty; "we'll look at them to-night, and have them to-morrow;" and amid more cries of rapture her box was unpacked, her money added to the pile in the middle of the table, where Sammy had laid his handsome contribution toward the turkey.

Before the story of the splendid tree was over, in came Tommy with his substantial offering and his hard earned dollar.

"I'm afraid I ought to keep my money for shoes. I've walked the soles off these to-day, and can't go to school barefooted," he said, bravely trying to put the temptation of skates behind him.

"We've got a good dinner without a turkey, and perhaps we'd better not get it," added Kitty, with a sigh, as she surveyed the table, and remembered the blue knit hood marked seventy-five cents that she saw in a shop window.

"Oh, we must have a turkey! we worked so hard for it, and it's so Christmasy," cried Sam, who always felt that pleasant things ought to happen.

"Must have turty," echoed the babies, as they eyed the dolls tenderly.

"You shall have a turkey, and there he is," said an unexpected voice, as a noble bird fell upon the table, and lay there kicking up his legs as if enjoying the surprise immensely.

It was father's voice, and there stood father, neither cross nor stupid, but looking as he used to look, kind and happy, and beside him was mother, smiling as they had not seen her smile for months. It was not because the work was well paid for, and more promised, but because she had received a gift that made the world bright, a home happy again—father's promise to drink no more.

"I've been working to-day as well as you, and you may keep your money for yourselves. There are shoes for all; and never again, please God, shall my children be ashamed of me, or want a dinner Christmas Day."

As father said this with a choke in his voice, and mother's head went down on his shoulder to hide the happy tears that wet her cheeks, the children didn't know whether to laugh or cry, till Kitty, with the instinct of a loving heart, settled the question by saying, as she held out her hands, "We haven't any tree, so let's dance around our goodies and be merry."

Then the tired feet in the old shoes forgot their weariness, and five happy little souls skipped gayly round the table, where, in the midst of all the treasures earned and given, father's Christmas turkey proudly lay in state.

FINISHING THE CHRISTMAS GIFT

CHRISTMAS IN THE ARCTIC

BY LIEUTENANT FREDERICK SCHWATKA.

AFTER the Thanksgiving dinner to our Eskimo friends in the village around us (of which I told you in No. 317 of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE), you may be sure that they heard of Christmas coming with unfeigned delight, especially when it was known to be another day rounded off with a feast.

Of course there was one essential element wanting to the perfection of Christmas, and that was a Christmas tree. Around the edge of some of the low marshy fields not far from our village we had noticed, before the snow fell in September and October and covered the ground, a few stunted arctic willows. The thickest limb was not larger than one's little finger, while the trunk itself—if it could properly be called such—was not larger around than a thumb, and not over a foot high, sprawling over the ground, in fact, like some stunted trailing plant at home. I could not help thinking these willows looked very much like the smaller clumps of sage-brush I had seen on the Western plains when out hunting. They might have served as Christmas trees for the Lilliputs of whom we read in Gulliver's Travels, but for the present race of human beings to use them as such was out of the question. A good sized Christmas present tied to a little limb would tear it off.

So, at least, we all thought until a member of my party suggested that about a half-dozen of these stunted willows be pulled up by the roots—which could be done as readily as if they were so many cabbage—the roots then to be put into the soft snow of the top of the snow-house dome as far as they could get stuck in with the fingers, and then a little water dashed or sprinkled over the roof to form a sort of cement of ice to hold the little willows in their

WHICH DO YOU LIKE BEST?

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

THERE'S a little frolicsome maid I know
Who has a question she puts to me
Whenever close to my side she comes,
Or into my lap, where she loves to be.

"Which do you like best?" says the little maid,
Her face with conical furrows lined,
"Summer or winter?" and then she waits
To give me a chance to make up my mind.

If "Summer" I answer, she pinches me well—
You wouldn't believe that she had such might—
And says, at each nip with her finger and thumb,
"Skeeters! skeeters! Oh, how they bite!"

If "Winter" I say, she will double her fists
And pommel me well, and at every blow,
"Snow-balls! snow-halls!" she cries aloud,
And laughs to find that she hurts me so.

'Tis a pretty play, and I do not care
How thick the snow-balls or "skeeters" fall;
For I love both summer and winter time,
But I love my darling the best of all.

places, upside down of course, so that the Christmas trees would dangle downward from the roof, or stand on their heads, so to speak. On the hanging branches could be tied the few simple but useful presents we should give away to our native friends, and when the ceremony was all over, the Christmas trees could be torn out by the roots once more and thrown away.

We accordingly asked two small Eskimo boys to make a visit the first fine day to the willow patch, about a mile away, and bring us a few of the largest, a service which we intended to repay by presents, as well as a good dinner, should they be successful. Away they went, no doubt wondering what in the world a lot of willow brush could have to do with a proposed feast, for no other way of celebrating a day could enter their minds than that something good must enter their stomachs, and when that was over, all was over. Possibly they thought that we wanted to use the willows to cook some of the Christmas victuals, for in the summer-time, if they be near a patch of these willows, the Eskimos often wander among them to pick out the dead ones to build a fire to cook their food with. There is no use for them whatever in the winter, as the natives then have plenty of seal and walrus oil with which they can do their cooking, and so I suppose our two little fellows busied their little brains with what we could want with the willows, until they had thrown them down at our feet.

The presents were simple but useful—a can of powder, a box of musket caps, or a bag of balls here and there to the best hunters; a jackknife or rubber match-box to the boys; a pair of scissors or a few three-cornered needles (for all the sewing is done on reindeer-skins, requiring gloves' or three-cornered needles) to the women, and some beads and cheap jewelry to the little girls.

And better, far better than all other things to these simple-minded natives, who think only of the present, we had a tremendous dinner, which looked very much smaller after they had gotten through with it. They are enormous eaters. Captain Parry, of the British navy, writes that an Eskimo boy he fed, while wintering among that people not very far from my own winter-quarters in the northern part of Hudson Bay, managed to devour in one day over ten pounds of solid food, which he washed down his throat with a gallon and a half of tea, coffee, and water. A man of the same tribe also ate ten pounds of solid material, which included a couple of tallow candles, and drank of various liquids with which he was furnished a gallon and a half, and yet these people, devouring all this food, are only from four to four and a half feet high when full grown.

Captain Parry does not say so in his book, but probably he was giving them a Christmas dinner at the time; at least I thought so when I looked at the place where my huge dinner had been, and I considered it fortunate that Christmas only came once a year, although our friends were no doubt willing to have it come three hundred and sixty-five times in that period. These Eskimo of the northern part of Hudson Bay are not altogether unfamiliar with Thanksgiving and Christmas, for quite often the American whalers who come to these waters to catch whales winter their ships among them, and the natives gather around like flies about a sugar barrel to get a little bread and molasses, or weak coffee sweetened with cheap sugar, for, like all savages, they have a very sweet tooth in their heads. So we spent our first Christmas in this lone northland.

The second was even more lonesome and less cheerful than the first. We were sledging along Back's Great Fish River, going from the Arctic Ocean to Hudson Bay. The days were only a couple of hours long, and even that was all twilight coming from the south, where the sun ought to be, and we were making but five or six miles a day from one snow house to the other. Right glad were we, in fact, if the snow house we had left in the morning was out of sight behind some friendly bend in the river when we commenced building our new one as darkness came on, for nothing could be more discouraging than to see it staring us in the face.

This slow travelling was not altogether due to the short days, but also to the intense cold and the bad sledging on the river ice. The day before Christmas we made but five miles, and built our igloo—as the natives call the snow house—with a keen wind blowing from the northwest, although the high bluffs of the river protected us considerably. That morning the thermometer had been sixty-eight degrees below zero, or just one hundred degrees below the freezing-point, and you can see that we were cold enough to wish we were home for our Christmas. As a wind would spring up, the thermometer would always show that it was getting warmer, as it did this Christmas Eve, but if a person got caught in such a wind he would be inclined to think it was ten times colder.

We knew by the way the black storm came up that it was going to last a day or two, and that we should spend our Christmas in-doors—if we can speak of being in doors in a snow house where there are no doors. Toooloah, an Eskimo, threw three or four feet of extra snow on top of the igloo, knowing that it would be a bitter cold night and that we would need this additional covering, but despite this we could feel the strong gale penetrating the walls of our house, and a candle held to the windward side had its flame blown inward very perceptibly.

We did not have much reindeer meat, and the fish we had gotten at the mouth of the river were rapidly diminishing, so that our dogs were being fed only every third or fourth day. We had intended to feed them next day, or Christmas, but that very night, shortly after midnight, they broke into the little snow house built alongside to store the food, dog harness, and other things, and stole the food we had intended for ourselves. Toooloah, half-dressed, got out of the snow hut as soon as he heard them scrambling around and fighting over the spoils, and secured the greater part of it again in a cold so intense that almost any white man would have frozen to death. And this is the way the dogs got their Christmas dinner.

We had started April 1, 1879, on our sledge journey, with only a month's civilized provisions, although we knew we should be gone almost a year, expecting to live on the game of the country. We stretched our supply out, however, with the assistance of the reindeer we killed, until the 24th of June, when we ate the last of our civilized provisions, and from that time on until we got back to Hudson Bay—a year, lacking only ten days—we lived almost altogether on reindeer meat, with a few seals for a change.

Christmas morning, Henry, our cook, slyly informed us that he had saved enough coffee for a mess, also a little sugar and condensed milk for it, and some cornstarch with which to thicken our reindeer soup, and make a sauce for the big salmon we had caught—civilized food which had not passed our lips before for exactly six months to a day, and which it was three months, lacking only four days, before we should taste again. We had very little seal or walrus oil with which to cook our delicacies, so long had we been away from the sea; but stormy as it was, some of the Eskimo boys went out on the hills and gathered some black moss, beat the snow off it against the rocks, and with a very little oil sprinkled over it, we cooked our salmon to serve for a turkey, and called the cornstarch cranberry sauce.

I think we all believed it was the best Christmas dinner we had ever had. We all felt so good over it, simple as it was, that we voted, without a dissenting voice, to pound up some of the frozen white-fish we had in the store igloo, and give them to the forty-five half-starved dogs, though they did not deserve it, after the way they had acted in the terrible storm during the night.

A SLEIGH FOR THE BABY.

We talked it over. What shall be done to give Baby his daily rides in winter? Why not buy a little sleigh? was suggested; but my fourteen year-old brother said, "I'll make one for you." And he succeeded so well that I must tell how he did it, that other families may be at little or no expense in having a sleigh for the little one to go out in when the ground is covered with snow.

In order to have it light and durable, strong bass wood three-eighths of an inch thick was selected for the top, and maple used for the runners. The side pieces were marked out on boards two feet long and one foot wide, as in Fig. 1. The measurements were: from a to c seven inches, and from d to e three inches. The curve from f to c was then carefully drawn. The ends were cut off on the marks with a fine saw, and the board, after being secured in a bench vise, was curved with a drawshave roughly, and finished with a spokeshave. With one completed, the other was easily marked out by this pattern and worked into shape as before.

The backboard (Fig. 2) was made from a piece of board fifteen inches square. If a board of sufficient width can not be found, glue two pieces together; in order to do this the edges must be carefully planed square, and put together with hot glue, leaving them to stand twelve hours or so. Fig. 2 shows how it was marked out. From a to b and from d to c is one and a half inches respectively; e and g are each three inches from the upper edge. The lines b e and c g were marked out with a pencil. Taking the point at f as a centre, a part of a circle was drawn from e to g.

The dash-board was seven inches wide, and was marked out by using the backboard as a pattern, using only the part as high up as the line h i in Fig. 2.

The board for the bottom was slightly more than twelve inches wide, so that when the edges and ends were bevelled it fitted exactly. Soft steel wire nails were used in nailing together the parts, which was done in the following manner: The backboard was firmly held in a vise while one side piece was being nailed to it. To prevent splitting, a brad-awl was used for each nail. Four nails two inches long were enough to firmly secure it. The other side piece was nailed on in the same manner, and then the dash-board was put in place, and finally the bottom.

Two three-eighth-inch strips an inch wide and eight inches long were screwed to the sides three inches from the bottom to support the seat, which was ten inches wide, with bevelled edges to fit the sides, and nailed in place with inch brads. The completed top was smoothed and sandpapered, and was ready for painting.

Now for the sled. If you happen to have a frame sled of the right dimensions, use it, for it will be better than any you can make, because of its lightness.

Place the top in position on it, and bore two quarter-inch holes in the middle of the bottom, one in front and the other under the seat near the backboard. Let these holes pierce the board of the sled; then secure both together by two two-inch bolts, with nuts.

For those who have not a proper sled of the right dimensions I will write a description of the one we had. The runners were made from two boards seven inches wide, three feet long, and three-quarters of an inch thick.

Mark out the shape (Fig. 3) on one board, commencing with the curve at the bows. Begin the under curve eight inches from the end, a, and have the point come at the corner of the upper edge; eight inches from which point make a line two inches from the edge, running to the opposite end. From the bows draw a curve to meet this line, and at the other end, at b, three inches from the extremity, on the upper edge, draw a straight line to the lower corner. With saw and drawshave work down to the lines, and finish with a spokeshave.

One being completed, use it for a pattern. Mark out the other, and when both are finished, make two cross-bars of hard wood an inch and a half wide, one inch thick, and twelve inches long. Make a tenon at each end, as shown in Fig. 4, three-quarters of an inch deep. The mortise for the forward one will come fifteen inches from the forward end, while the other will be fifteen inches nearer the stern. Carefully mark the places with square and pencil half an inch from the edge on both sides of the runner. With mallet and chisel cut half-way through; then turn the runner over, and finish from the other side.

Having finished, place the bars in position, secure with screws, and get a board ten inches wide by half an inch thick, and two feet long, screwed to the bars. Take the frame to a blacksmith, and he will put on the irons and braces and rings for the rope. Secure the top to the sled in the manner before described. Paint the sleigh some suitable color, mixing with the paint a quantity of Japan varnish, which will give the surface a hard, glossy appearance when dry. With a dainty cushion on the back and sides, stuffed with some soft material, you will have a pretty sleigh for the baby, and, withal, the satisfaction of having made it yourself.

THE SLEIGH COMPLETED.

THE CHRISTMAS STATION

"A SHORTER WAY."

BY MARY E. VANDYNE.

"BRING up your men," the order reads.
 Forth from the camp the Captain leads,
 And on, with steady step and slow,
 In serried ranks, the veterans go
 To where, beyond yon forest glade,
 Two great hosts stand in arms arrayed.

But stop! A childish voice is heard,
 With accent wild in every word:
 "Halt! Sir Captain. Halt! I say.
 Mother says there's a shorter way."

Slowly the leader turns his head.
 "What do I hear the boy hath said?"

A small hand clasps his bridle rein;
 Clearly the words ring out again:
 "Mother has sent me here to say
 You best would go by the shorter way."

The Captain smiled. "Lead on!" he cried.
 "Behind this lad, my men, we'll ride.
 Go forward, boy, to the battle fray,
 And lead us there by the shorter way."

It is eventide. A blood-stained band,
 The veterans near their General stand.

"Where is the leader who led to-day
 Your gallant band in Victory's way?
 By you indeed was the battle won
 Ere the clash of arms had well begun."

A veteran holding a childish hand
 Stands forth before the admiring band.
 "Our Captain's form in the dust lies low.
 Here stands the leader to whom we owe
 A field well won, and a battle plain
 Where waves our glorious flag again.
 Too late had we reached the scene to-day
 Had a lad not shown us a shorter way.
 Through rain of bullets, mid cannon's roar,
 We marched where his slight form went before.
 Though one by one brave men fell dead,
 We could not halt while a lad still led.
 To God and a child our thanks be given;
 The foe is fled, from a lost field driven.
 No victory had we won to-day
 Had a lad not shown us a shorter way."

THE MYSTERY OF THE FIVE UMBRELLAS.

BY ARTHUR PENN.

IT was not at all a large family, for there were only five of them. But it was an eminently respectable family, for they all owned umbrellas.

There was Mr. Brown, there was Mrs. Brown, there was Uncle Bob, there was Jimmy, and there was Lunny.

Mr. James Brown was a very good man. He was quiet and dignified, and president of a bank; and as he left his house (a high-stoop, brown-stone dwelling, with a two-story extension, hard-wood trimmings, and all the modern improvements) every morning at half past nine, so as to arrive at the bank just five minutes before ten, he generally carried in his right hand an umbrella which reflected and suggested the solid position and trustworthy character of its owner. Mr. Brown's umbrella was a huge, robust, wide-spreading cotton tent.

Mrs. Brown was a very pretty little woman, who went out shopping every morning after breakfast, and her umbrella was as indicative of her gentle character as her husband's more massive combination of whalebone and cotton. Mrs. Brown's umbrella was a firm but delicate little article of silk and steel.

Uncle Bob was Mrs. Brown's brother, and he was a bachelor and a newspaper man; that is to say, he worked on the Gotham Gazette. Lunny generally called him

"Unks," but his name was Robert White, and his umbrella was a sturdy specimen of bamboo architecture.

Jimmy liked to be called Mr. James Brown, Jun. He had just been graduated from Columbia College, where he had kicked in the foot-ball eleven and taken the Greek prize. He was now at the law school, and he was supposed to give his days and nights to the solution of difficult legal questions, such as, "Was the case of the six carpenters a packing case or not?" Jimmy was very neat and natty, and he was as dainty in his dress as possible. Jimmy's umbrella was one of those wonderfully made imported English umbrellas that roll up so tight they look like a walking-stick with the mumps.

Last of all, but not least in her own estimation, there was Lunny herself. On her tiny little visiting cards you might read, Miss S. Louise Brown.

The S. stood for Sarah, to Lunny's great disgust, because Unks sometimes called her Sally, which is a country girl's name, and not good style for city wear; and one of those Hitchcock girls once overheard him, and Lunny is teased by being called Sal every time that odious Molly Hitchcock loses her temper, which is very often, because Miss Hitchcock is freckled, and has no talent for French verbs. Lunny is thirteen years old, and goes every morning to Parlier's French Institute for Young Ladies. Lunny's umbrella is a well-worn silk one that has seen better days, so she is not afraid of losing it.

On the morning of Tuesday, the twenty-ninth day of February, the family were all seated at breakfast, except Uncle Bob. Jimmy finished his last buckwheat cake, and went over to the fire-place to warm his toes and to glance at the Gotham Gazette.

"More sneak thieves!" he said, as his eye ran down the column of the robberies and jobberies of the preceding twenty-four hours. "I should like to be District Attorney for a few weeks."

"Or even longer?" suggested Mrs. Brown, smiling at her son's vehemence.

"Something really ought to be done about it!" said he, energetically. "This thing ought to be stopped at once, or we shall have these fellows coming in our front door soon, and carrying off our overcoats and our umbrellas."

"Lunny, that reminds me, my dear," said Mrs. Brown. "The probabilities indicate local rains in the Middle Atlantic regions. Be sure and take your umbrella."

Lunny began quickly, "I'm very sorry, mamma, but—"

But just then Mr. Brown, who had arisen from the table and taken his comfortable chair near the fire, interrupted her, saying, in a grave and judicial tone, "It looks like rain, and I feel my rheumatism returning."

Before Lunny was able to explain why she was sorry, Mrs. Brown had left the room. And just then the clock struck half past eight, and Lunny knew she had only just time to get to school.

Twenty-four hours passed and thirty-six hours passed, and it was the evening of Wednesday, and the family was gathered about the lamp in the library—all except Lunny, who had gone to bed.

"I've been writing a short and sharp article against these sneak thieves," said Uncle Bob. "They are stealing coats and umbrellas all the time."

"There's a question whether or not you can steal an umbrella," said Jimmy, the law student. "I found a case in the New York Reports where it was held that the taking of an umbrella during a shower was not theft."

"But there has not been any shower to-day, or yesterday either, although Old Probs predicted it; and yet my umbrella has most mysteriously disappeared," declared Uncle Bob.

"So has mine," said Jimmy, in surprise; "and when I went to borrow Lunny's this afternoon, that was gone too."

"I am sure Lunny has not lost it," said Mrs. Brown; "she is generally careful."

"Lunny couldn't lose three umbrellas; the idea is absurd," remarked Mr. Brown. "It's the fault of the police. To allow three umbrellas to be stolen from one house is simply disgraceful—that's what it is! Fortunately they have not yet attempted to take mine. Just let me catch them at it!"

The next morning it was snowing hard, and although the change in the weather was talked about, there was no further allusion to the missing umbrellas. One after another the family made ready to go out. Lunny skipped off to school first. Then Jimmy started early to read over his notes before lecture. Shortly afterward Mr. Brown put on his overcoat and his muffler and his ear-tips and his overshoes and his fur gloves and his warm cap, and then he reached his hand out for his umbrella. But the umbrella was not there. The place that had known it now knew it no more. He had left it reposing in the stand, and suddenly it had vanished. Mr. Brown was wroth, but his dignity was as great as his indignation. He walked to the bank in the snow without an umbrella.

The morning after, the family sat at breakfast again, and Lunny was talking to Jimmy, who was enjoying her fondness for long words, and now and then a six-syllabled epithet retired much the worse for her misusage.

"Do you know, Jimmy," she began, "I'm going to save up and investigate my money in an umb—"

"Investigate your money?" asked Jimmy.

"Jimmy," said Lunny, seriously, "it's real mean of you to laugh at me. Don't! Stop!"

"Don't stop?" retorted Jimmy. "Well, I won't," and he laughed again.

"Jimmy," said his sister, gravely, "do you know what you are? You are an idiotsmerazy. There!"

"A what?" he queried.

"An idiotsmerazy. You know what I mean," she answered, angrily; and as he only laughed the more, she ran out of the room, and hurried off to school.

Perhaps she left the door ajar, and perhaps a sneak thief slipped in, and of a certainty when Mrs. Brown went to go out, her umbrella was gone. It was the fifth umbrella which had strangely disappeared from that one house in one week, and no one had any clew whatever toward the clearing up of the mystery.

That afternoon as Mrs. Brown was standing by the window, talking to Jimmy, who had just come in, and to Uncle Bob, who was just going out, suddenly she said, "Dear me!"

Now when Mrs. Brown said "Dear me!" suddenly, her brother and her son knew there was something the matter. "What is it?" they asked, both together.

"It's Lunny! She's crossing the street. And just look at the child!" answered Mrs. Brown.

Uncle Bob went to the window. "How daintily she walks along!" said he.

"But what has she got under her arm?" asked Mrs. Brown.

"That's what puzzles me," added Jimmy; and it was very rarely that anything puzzled Jimmy, for he had not yet discovered that even the youngest of us does not know everything.

As they stood gazing at Lunny, and wondering what it might be that she had under her arm, suddenly Uncle Bob began to laugh. Now Uncle Bob was a gifted laughier, and his merriment was loud and long.

"What is there to laugh at?" asked Jimmy.

Uncle Bob shook with amusement until he resembled a jelly-fish with chills and fever, and he said, "It's Lunny."

"I see it is Lunny," said Mrs. Brown, solemnly. "but I do not see what there is to laugh at."

"I see it all now," said Uncle Bob, ~~resounding his mouth~~. "She has all our umbrellas under her arm."

"What?" shouted Jimmy, while Mrs. Brown said, "Dear me!"

"Gradually, one by one, that child has taken her umbrella and all our umbrellas, and forgotten them at school, and to-day she has remembered, and she is bringing them all back, all five of them, under her arm."

And so it was. In five minutes more the five umbrellas were in their five places in the stand, and Uncle Bob went down to the Gotham Gazette and wrote an editorial on "Murder Will Out."

TWO ARROWS:*

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,
AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

PREPARING FOR AN ATTACK.

A GOOD while before Two Arrows reached the camp of his people, Judge Parks and Yellow Pine discovered that they had done about as much as they could at the mouth of what was yet to be the mine until they should have men to help them. The Judge handed to Na-te-kah another book of pictures to wonder over, and then he and Pine went upon a tour of inspection. They found the choppers busy with beetles and wedges upon the lengths of easily cloven pine, and the heap of long, wide slabs or shingles for the roof was growing rapidly.

"We can make it weather-tight with moss packing," said Pine, "and if we can't have sash and glass, we can make good solid doors and shutters."

"There will be storms," said the Judge.

"Yes, but the winters are never hard down here. Even if we got snowed in, it wouldn't stay long, and the supply train 'll get here before the end of next month. Can't lose its way."

"I should say not. But now just look at that wall."

It was worth looking at, if only for the way in which it was rising. The mud and stones went into place with a perfect rush. At that rate there would quickly be a finished house there, such as it was to be. All was well and solidly laid too, and the inner face was smooth enough. That was more than could be said for the outside, and Pine remarked, "Reckon nobody 'll care to rub himself very hard against the side of that shelter when it's done."

From the house they both strolled away for a look at the animals, and then on down to the mouth of the notch. They were noting with care the several peculiarities of the rocky elevations to the right and left, when the Judge felt his arm gripped very hard, and Yellow Pine exclaimed: "Look there, Judge! Something's happened to the young red-skin."

Judge Parks carried a spy-glass as good as Sile's, and it was up instantly. "That's Sile, but the horse he's leading isn't a pony. Look, Pine."

"I'd call it— How close this thing does bring 'em! I could count his buttons. He's carrying two rifles and a lance. Something mighty queer has turned up, Judge, but you can see that Sile's all right. What can have become of Two Arrows? I hope he hasn't been wiped out. He was the likeliest kind of a young chap."

"We'll know when he gets here."

Waiting was about all they could do, but they grew more and more impatient until Sile came within hail. After that the questions and answers chased each other back and forth until the entire account of Sile's hunt and its ending was perfectly understood.

"WE WON'T SEND YE TO THE HOSPITAL FOR THAT."

Sile saw his father shudder and turn pale, and then flush fiery red, while he described his encounter with the Apache. He had dismounted before he got to that, and the next thing he felt was a pair of arms around him, and he heard Yellow Pine exclaim: "I could a most hug the young rooster myself. It was jest the gamest kind of thing to do. I say, Sile, he barked ye on yer left arm. I'd call it, now, if that there wasn't close work. Take yer jacket off."

Sile had hardly paid any attention to that matter, although his arm had felt a little stiff, and there was really not much of a hurt. In another instant his father was saying so, but he said it with a peculiar look upon his face. The Indian's bullet had been a "Minie-ball," of course, and, as it grazed his arm, one of its ragged edges had torn through the cloth and touched the flesh only just enough to break the skin and draw a little blood. Sile could fairly say he was "wounded," and no more, and Yellow Pine remarked: "Reckon we won't send ye to the hospital for that; but I'm mighty glad it didn't go any nigher. It's jest on a line to where it would ha' knocked yer arm off, if it had struck onto the bone. It's the narrest kind of an escape."

Judge Parks had nothing more to say, for some reason, and seemed willing that Sile should go right on with further particulars of the day.

"Two Arrows is right," said Pine. "He'd know a war party, sure. It's war with us, anyhow, and there isn't but one thing to be done. The men must knock off from the house, and come right down and block this 'ere opening with logs and rocks. We can make the best kind of a rifle-pit. Only leave room for one man or for one horse at a time to get in or out."

"That's it," said the Judge. "Now, Sile, come along. You must let the men see what you've been up to. They'll know exactly what it means."

Sile had a curious sense of bashfulness about it, but he followed his father, and in a few minutes more the rough, bearded, red-shirted fellows were giving him three of the most ringing cheers he had ever heard. Ha-ha-pah-no and Na-tee-kah looked at him with something that was half wonder. They could not have believed it but for the horse and the lance, and the rifle and the belt. Here was the Red-head, a mere pale-face boy, bringing in trophies of which a great warrior might have been proud. Na-tee-kah had a sort of notion that Two Arrows must have done it somehow, until well assured that her brother had not been present, and that the Red-head had not taken the scalp of the slain Apache. She had heard that the pale-face warriors sometimes neglected that duty, but could not well understand why, even when Ha-ha-pah-no explained to her that it was "bad medicine" for a white man to scalp anybody.

The situation called for something more than cheers, however, and the miners hurried to the mouth of the notch. To pack it breast-high with fragments of wood and stone was no great matter, and the breast-work was finished in time for a late supper.

"Tell ye what, Jedge," remarked one of the men, "if I was a red-skin I wouldn't be in a hurry to ride up to that there bar, with half a dozen rifles peepin' over it.

Reckon it'd take the cleanest kind of grit. A feller could stand behind it and pepper away, and be a'most safe agin anything short of cannon."

The wagons and other things were left as they were, and the entire notch was a perfectly safe corral for the animals. All the human beings moved their bivouac down toward the barrier they had made, leaving the fires behind them.

"They're all right there," said Pine, "and we needn't kindle any down hereaway to tell jest where we are."

There was sense in that, and one sentry was as good as a dozen to keep watch at the narrow entrance left, for even that was securely closed until there should be a good reason for opening it.

Sile found himself the hero of the camp, and the scratch upon his arm excused him from guard duty. At first he was well pleased to lie down and go to sleep after the severe fatigue and excitement of his great ride. Never before had he raced after such a fashion, and every lone and muscle felt the effects of the long strain. He saw, too, that everybody else was taking the matter with perfect coolness. All those miners had been in tight places more than once, and they had great faith in the prudence of red-skins about charging upon white riflemen hidden behind rocks. Sile ate a hearty supper. In fact, he was compelled at last to be very positive with Ha-ha-pah-no. She would have gone right on cooking for him until morning if he had let her, and so would Na-tee-kah. They were positively proud of the privilege of bringing him his coffee. He was assured that the horse and weapons of the Apache warrior were his own personal property, and he examined them again and again with a sense of ownership that he had never felt for anything else. He could not tell why, until Jonas remarked to him:

"If you hadn't pulled straight, your plunder'd be in the 'Pache camp 'bout now, scalp and all. It was just a question of grit and shootin'. I'm powerful glad you made out to throw yer lead to the right spot."

So was Sile, but it was not easy, somehow, for him to make up his mind that he had really killed anybody. He found a queer idea in his mind several times that before long that Apache warrior would wake up and wonder what had become of his horse and his weapons. Not long after supper he curled up in his blanket at the foot of a tree, and in a few minutes he was soundly asleep. He did not hear his father say to Yellow Pine, as the two bent over him,

"My brave boy!"

Nor did he hear Pine grumble:

"If he hasn't earned a good snooze, then nobody has. Tell ye what, Jedge, that feller'll be gunver of a State one of these days. I'd vote for him. I'd like to have seen him changing shots with that there red skin."

They moved away, and the Judge remarked,

"We are safe enough for to-night, but they'll find us to-morrow."

"Maybe; maybe not. I can't quite make it out as to what could bring 'em away up here. Two Arriers told Sile they was a war party, and if that's so, they must have been licked somewhere. They'd never have cut it for these ranges without somebody was after 'em."

"Perhaps so. We'll see. Anyhow, we can keep a sharp lookout."

There was no danger that any sentry would sleep on his post that night, but all the first part and the middle of it went by as peacefully as if the valley were uninhabited.

Sile slept and slept, and when at last he opened his eyes, he could not have told what he had seen. The stars were shining. The night air was crisp, and the fire was warm under his blanket. It took him almost a minute to gather his thoughts and understand where he really was. That was partly because he had been sleeping heavily, and partly because, at the very last, he had dreamed of being at home, and of leading a remarkable horse into the sitting-room to show to his mother.

It was a strange place to wake up in, and he could dimly see the forms of other men, rolled in blankets, lying near, each with a rifle by his side ready for prompt use.

"They won't be taken by surprise," said Sile to himself. "I'm going down for a look at the barrier. I've lain still long enough."

He felt a little stiff when he first rose to his feet, but it passed away when he stretched himself and began to walk. His left arm pained him more than he had expected, and he found it slightly swollen. It was not precisely like the same-sized scratch made in any other way, and he was glad that there was no more of it. Still, he hardly knew what he had that he valued more highly than that slight hurt upon his arm. It had made a sort of soldier of him. It was a promotion, and he vaguely hoped that it would leave a scar. Then he half wished that the scar might come out upon his face, where it would not be forever covered up by his coat sleeve.

"My new horse is in the corral, and I couldn't pick him out now. My lance and things are in the wagon. I'll go and have a look at the barrier. I'm feeling tip-top."

it for the glimpse it gives us of Windsor Castle, with the men coming from some window of our house. My favorite landscape is the castle seen from Windsor Park, lighted up by the glorious evening sunsets, every window flashing and reflecting upon the sparkling water of the lake with the beautiful foliage of magnificent trees all around. I think there can be nothing like it. Perhaps you will perhaps not say so, but rather an exaggeration, as I have seen so few places. I am not going to say any more about my old home, or else I shall go on forever, till you get quite weary of it. I will say some more about where I live now and my favorite occupations. Ours is a very pretty house, and we have rather a large garden with old vines and a peach tree which I think in the summer evenings, and which I am very fond of. My favorite animals are horses, and we children have them driven by plenty of men, and I have some of them. First there is Naomi, and then come the ponies Beauty, Meteor, Coquette, Jack Russell, and Goumou. As you once had a pony; he was a dear thing, and I have a great fondness for it. I forgot to tell you we have an old pony, which all the little ones ride, and we always take her when we go blackberrying. I should like to write another letter, if this one is accepted, about my first riding tour, as some of HARPER'S young readers may be as fond of horses as I am.

HELEA V.

Write again, dear. There are so many of you in the Rectory that you remind me of Miss Yonge's novels. Isn't that a compliment?

SKIBBERREN, IRELAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have an aunt living in New York, who has sent us HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every year since 1855, and she is of an age, and I am thought to be very tall. I like reading the letters in the Post-office Box, and I like looking at the funny pictures too. I should like to write to her to let her know that I will spare a corner for it. I live in Skibberren, a town in County Cork, in the south of Ireland. I have three brothers and one sister, whose names are Robert (two years), David (four), Alice (six) and Lillie (nine). I will now tell you something about my pets. I have two very nice rabbits, one black and white and the other black; they are very tame; and we have chickens and a tortoise-shell cat with three nice little kittens. We have no vineyards or orange groves, as your little American friends here, but we have a garden with many other kinds of fruits, such as cherries, plums, peaches, pears, apples, strawberries, raspberries, gooseberries, and blackberries, which will grow wild.

HELEA V.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA.

I have never seen a letter from Virginia City, and I thought one might be interesting. I have no trees here—nothing but sage-brush—and so we can not enjoy picnics as other children do. We have lovely times in the summer on our visits to the dunes in the dandy carts and play with the pony. There are a great many mines here, but I have never been in any of them. My favorite stories are "Into Unknown Seas" and "Two Arrows."

WILLIE E. (eight years of age).

MONTAGE, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little boy eleven years old. I have two little sisters; one is ten and the other is eight. I like writing to you and I will tell you what I have taken this paper for four or five years, and like it very, very much. I think "Two Arrows" is splendid, and can hardly wait from week to week to get my new paper. For I love the squirrel. We let him out in the dining room every evening, and he has a fine time flying and running around the room, and we enjoy watching him. He is very tame and will run up and hide in our pockets. I have a cat, and her name is Clover, and every morning she comes upstairs and sits on my bed. She will sit on my legs and beg for her food. Papa thinks she is very cunning. We have about one hundred and twenty hens. We have two hens that are five years old, and we think a great deal of them.

WILLIE C. D. T.

ARCADIA VALLEY, MISSOURI.

Permit a twelve-year-old boy, a resident of this pretty valley in the Ozark Mountains, to tell you of a funny discovery on the map of the United States. It is that of a human figure, extending from the lakes of Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and marking off the States of Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana. It is formed in profile by the Mississippi River. Iowa forms the face in profile—forehead, nose, mouth, and chin—looking westward. Missouri forms the body; Arkansas, the lower body and hips; Louisiana the legs and feet, even to the moccasins. The marking of the States is in the hands of the figure. Papa calls this Mississippi the Father of Waters. He says it presents a better copy than any other fanciful likeness of objects on the map. He has painted it on a piece of paper (painter), and he teaches my sister Flora Bella and myself drawing, French, astronomy, history, short-hand, and other things, but we take our music lessons from Miss H., who lives a mile from here, in the village of Arcadia, and she attends the Brethren Conservatory in St. Louis. We saw the new star in the nebula of Andromeda, but did not get a photograph of it. I have no respect, I am your little friend, Augustus S. H.

CULLICO, TENNESSEE.

We want to tell you of our school here in Cullico. In this school Harper's Young People is used as a text-book, and we think that a more agreeable and improving one could not be found anywhere. Besides HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, we have had the story of the "Three Weeks" to see we are kept quite busy. Your little friends, SAM and WILLIE.

ISLE OF HOPE, GEORGIA.

We live about eight miles from Savannah at a place on the "sails," called Isle of Hope, where people from Savannah come and spend the summer. One of my uncles belongs to a yacht club, and we have lovely times in the summer on the regatta. I wonder if HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE visits another home like ours, where there are four in the family, and we have two and two great-grandmothers and two grandmothers. I have also nine aunts, so I think that I am well off for relations. I am very fond of reading, and have had the story of "Miss Alcock" which I like. Mrs. Whitney's books very much also.

MATTIE G. B.

GROSVENOR VILLA, ISLE OF WIGHT.

I have two sisters, Daisy and Lily; Daisy is the eldest. I hope you like his paper; I received it for my birthday present. My favorite authors are Jimmy Brown, Allan Forman, Kirk Munroe, Sherwood Ryse, Mrs. Lillie, and David Ker. Jimmy Brown is very amusing.

LANGHORN, DEWEESBOROUGH, N. B.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have often thought I would write and tell you how very much my brother and myself enjoy reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and how much we like the pictures. We are delighted with the pictures. My papa took HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE for four years; both he and mamma think it the best magazine they have ever read. The illustrations are splendid. I must now tell you a little about the town we live in. It is situated in the valley of the Esk, which beautiful river flows through it. It is surrounded by lovely hills, the highest of which is Whita, being 1256 feet above the level of the sea. On the top of this hill is erected a monument to the memory of Sir John Malcolm, who rendered valuable service to his country. In the summertime, when the trees are covered with beautiful green leaves, and the hills with heather, the scene which presents itself is of a great beauty. We boys delight in wandering in the woods in search of wild flowers, raspberries, and nuts, but even more than all, in the search of a hole in a tree to burn. Unlike many of your correspondents, I have no pets, but have two brothers and three sisters younger than myself. Here are their names—Robert, John, and Emily. My mother's name is Kate Ethel, and Emily Constance. How do you like them? With best love to you, dear Postmistress (whom I send to know), and to our little friends across the ocean. I must now close.

CHARLES GILBERT M. (nine years of age).

This is a very good letter, and I thank my little correspondent and send him my love. What pretty names you all have!

LEZENNE, NEW YORK.

I live in Luzerne, twenty miles from Saratoga. I am eleven years old. I go to school, and take music lessons. There is a lake here, and when she found them she boxed their ears. My dog will play "I spy," and when you tell him to smile he wrinkles his nose all up. He had his picture taken at the Convention, and the first letter I have ever written to you, though I have been a good many. I thought you might like to hear about a trip I took this summer up to the State of Mackinac Island. It is a lovely island, but it is not very large; it is about nine miles around. There is a large fort on it, and nearly all of it belongs to the Government. There are many parks. There are lovely woods on it to walk or ride through. The woods are all of evergreen trees.

BESSIE R. H.

KROOK, IOWA.

Here is a bright letter from a Western girl: I have three kittens and a dog. Two of my two kittens had been with me, and I guess their mother had been looking for them, in which she found them she boxed their ears. My dog will play "I spy," and when you tell him to smile he wrinkles his nose all up. He had his picture taken at the Convention, and the first letter I have ever written to you, though I have been a good many. I thought you might like to hear about a trip I took this summer up to the State of Mackinac Island. It is a lovely island, but it is not very large; it is about nine miles around. UNDER THE MISTLETOE.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have just returned from a delightful trip to California, and so have a great deal to write about. I left here on the 20th of June, accompanied by my grandpapa, and reached San Antonio the next day. We stopped there a day, visiting friends, and on the evening of the 1st of July started in a beautiful palce-car for San Francisco. When I woke up on the next morning we were in the beautiful scenery of southwestern Texas. The cars were running along a high cliff, with the Rio Grande far beneath on the left and a perpendicular wall of rock, from 200 to 300 feet high, on the right. It was imposing to see, and a scene for an artist's pencil. For about two hours we were running along this cliff, now going through dark tunnels and then over massive bridges built of solid rock; but at length we left the river, and took a northwesterly course across the plains of western Texas. Here there was nothing to see except tall grass, a few prairie-dogs, and some low mountains in the distance. A repetition of this occurred throughout New Mexico, and in Arizona we saw little besides sage-brush and cactus, so I will skip over these few days, and tell you about California, in which we arrived on the Fourth of July. In the southern part of California we passed many wheat and barley fields, orchards and vineyards, and beautiful little villages with neat little houses painted white. We took dinner on the Fourth in Los Angeles, where there is a splendid eating-house. Los Angeles is about the prettiest city I ever saw. It has twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and is like a large orchard from one end to the other, with houses scattered about. From Los Angeles to San Francisco there is some very pretty scenery, and the Valley of the San Joaquin is beautiful, not for fear of making my letter too long. I can not describe it. If this is published, I will write you another letter about San Francisco. JOSEPH H. (twelve years old).

SUFFOLK, ENGLAND.

I'll have never before written a letter to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I was fourteen last July. There are nine of us—five brothers and four sisters. Gwynedd is the eldest of us all, and our baby Gladys is the youngest. We have four brothers between her and the next girl, so she is made a great pet of by us all. Before her comes Norman, then Alan, Donald, and Hylal, and then my sister Violet and myself; my brother Owen, and Maude and Gwynedd, are all older than myself. Gladys is a year and a half old. We live quite in the country. A mile and a half from us is our station, a very small country town, but our shopping town is Ipswich, which is ten miles from us. We drive in every week, with our pair of ponies, for drawing lessons. We have only lived here four years. The country about here is very ugly, and not to be compared with my old home, which used to be at Eton. I think there is no place in the world like Eton, not only because it was built there as I suppose every one knows the place where he or she was born, but I love Eton for everything and everybody in it, for its dear old chapel, the playing fields, where the boys and girls used to play, and where, on the 4th of June, you see them in the prettiest of all colors, "Eton blue," and lastly and most, I love

Daisies and buttercups grow all over the island. The hotel where we staid was made out of the old limestone, where the hotel was built a year ago. There are a good many Indians there now. There was a large rock on the shore, and the centre had fallen out and left a hole. When you look out to see the lake, which is lovely. In the fort there were some old block-houses, built by the British in 1780. I was on a revenue-boat, the Essex, with a captain and crew in sailor costume. The railings and stair steps, and all such things, were in brass, and they were so beautifully kept that you could see your face in the brass. The lake was very rough when we came down, and I was very seasick, and I didn't feel as if I wanted to go near a boat again for a long time. I think it is a pretty little letter from a girl twelve years old.

LACRA M. P.

NAPOLIENVILLE, LOUISIANA.

I live on a sugar plantation called Woodland, on the Attakapas Canal, near the beautiful Teche-country described by Longfellow in his story. I have a pony named Pet, and I ride all the time that I am not in school. I have also a little dog named Nellie, she is a setter, and we often go to teach her to hunt. My grandpapa is making sugar now, and we have ever such nice times going down to the sugar-house and watching the sugar-boil. I like to eat the sugar-cane now. In my next I will tell you how we make sugar. Your little Southern friend, ALLIE B. (twelve years old).

The type-writer printed this little girl's view beautifully:

NEWTON, NEW JERSEY.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little girl nine years of age. I go to school and study German. I have taken this charming paper three months, and can hardly wait for the next number. I have a pet, a little kitten. Can you tell me a suitable name for it? I have two little brothers and two large sisters. I like Howard Pyle's stories very much. I hope to see my letter in print. I am afraid my letter is getting too long, so I must close.

KATE VAN B.

I find it hard work to think of names for so many kittens. Would not you like to name your pet after one of the kittens in Mr. Dunner's play, which you saw in the Christmas number?

TORONTO, ONTARIO.

My favorite story is "Rolf Hogue," but I like Jimmy Brown's funny stories very much. Last year we sang the "Christmas Carol" at our mission school, and every one liked it so much that I expect we will sing the one for this year also. I live in a very pretty place on a hill just out of Toronto, about ten minutes' walk from the street cars. We have a beautiful view of Lake Ontario, and on clear days we can see the spray rising from Niagara Falls. My younger brother and myself have school at home, and I study English, French, and German.

BERTHA FLECKO G.

STOCKTON, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—As I have never seen any letters from Stockton, California, it would please me very much to see mine in print. We have taken Harper's Young People since Christmas, and think it a lovely paper. I am particularly interested in the Post-office Box. I do not go out to school, for we have a governess, a young German girl, who speaks French and English. Three days in the week we speak German, and three days French. Sundays we are allowed to speak whatever language we choose. I have two sisters and one brother. I will be thirteen at Christmas. My older sister will be fifteen in June. The one after me we call "Bright Eyes," and she is always so wide awake and happy. Next comes my little brother, who is six years old, and already reads and writes German. The little girl whose letter was printed a week or two ago, would perhaps like the name of Imogen, which is the name of our little baby sister. With the love of your interested subscriber, FANNY H.

SEAFORD.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I see that other boys have written to you, and so I will write a few lines. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is sent to my room and me by my dear friend in Ohio. I like your paper very much. I am nine years old, and have no pets. I study reading, arithmetic, writing, drawing, geography, and grammar. Stamford is at the head of the Delaware River, and is in the vicinity of the Catskill mountains, and is a delightful summer resort.

ALFRED N. R.

WOODBURY, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little boy eleven years old. I go to school and study grammar, disgramming, drawing, writing, arithmetic, reading, map-making, mental arithmetic, and geography. I have a little brother four years old, and he is lame. I had a dog named Rover, but he became mad, and a canary bird named Joe, and it died; so I have no pets at present. I live near Charles and Lewis and Willie B., who have taken this lovely paper since Christmas.

GEORGE E. P.

PORTERS, MASS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—This is the first letter I have ever written to you. I have a cat called Poker, and two kittens. I go to school. There are only eight at it. I like Harper's Young People very much. I think "The Lost City" and "Into Lighthouse Seas" are the nicest stories. I go with a little girl called Maggie S.; she attends the same school as I do. I am eleven years old. I live near the Grant's causeway. People think it a very curious place; I have been there. Maggie S. is going to write to you. I went for a walk yesterday with Mr. and Mrs. M., and a number of turkeys chased us down a lane, and we ran.

KATIE D.

MORRISDALE, NEW YORK.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE nearly five years, and I like it very much, and I mean to take it next year if I can. When I get through with the papers, I let two friends of mine take them. I should like to correspond with a girl in Florida from twice to five or six times a week, but I am thirteen, but will soon be fourteen. I read a letter in the Post office Box from a girl in Porto Rico, and I would like to have her write to me. If she would, and I would answer her letter. I hope you are well. I wish you could see what a view we have here. We see steamers on Lake Champlain, seven miles distant, without a glass; also the city of Burlington, and we can build out a church in Winooski, two miles from Burlington.

CARRIE L. FLECKO.

CINCINNATI, ENGLAND.

I live just out of Chicago, in a suburb called Oakland. From our back window we can see Dressel Boulevard, which is very pretty. One day I went down to South Park, and they had a picture, made of cactus, of General Grant. It seemed wonderful to me. They also had a sun-dial made of the same, which told the time well. My only pet is a canary-bird by the name of Dick. He is quite tame, and once I was lying back on a chair, and Dick perched on the back of my chair. One day I am thirteen years old, and he was passed to the Sixth grade in school. I attend the Oakland school.

LOTTIE W.

POSTOFFICE BOX NUMBER. A DEAR POSTMISTRESS, I have solved your puzzle, and submitted it and so I think you would not object to printing it. I will try in future to write you often, and please send the Post office Box with answers, so that I may be able to send short stories only. Thank you for your words is quite long enough for the puzzle. Your position we can publish.

A VERY SERIOUS QUESTION.

"Papa said that when people were freezing to death they felt awfully pleasant. Wonder if I'm freezing. I feel so good playing out here in the cold!"

PRESIDENT BRAND'S CUNNING.

A LONG the Orange River and in its neighborhood, in South Africa, live a farming and cattle-raising people of Dutch descent, called Boers. They are simple-minded folk, used to an out-of-door life, hardy, good marksmen, independent, industrious, and greatly given to attending to their own affairs. Far removed from the most stirring part of the world, scattered over a thinly settled region, with no large towns, they are not educated and progressive, as are the people crowded in the densely populated regions of Europe and the eastern part of the United States, but keep many good old customs and ideas, honest and kindly, which have been sent to the garret in livelier parts of the civilized world.

Among other features distinguishing these quiet farmers in South Africa is their belief in a great many superstitions which elsewhere are not paid attention to any longer, and their general reverence for all religious ideas and observances. How a sharp man among them can sometimes turn this simple-minded faith into profit is shown by an incident that occurred in their history several years ago.

The Boers were at war with a tribe of savage negroes called Basutos, who were raiding their northern frontier settlements, and had massacred several communities, besides burning houses and stealing cattle. The Boers had driven this enemy into the mountains, but had by no means conquered them. A large party in the undisciplined army, however, were satisfied with this much, and clamored to turn back to their homes, where, it was true, the fields and the cattle were suffering because of their absence.

John Brand, the President of the Republic, who was in command of the army, felt that this would not do. He saw that to make the victory complete the Basutos must be kept shut up in the hills, and not allowed to go back to their villages and cultivate their own rude crops, upon which their life chiefly depended. He called a meeting, and explained to the influential men in his little army how important this was, but he saw that their anxiety to be disbanded and go home was too great to be overcome by argument. He stopped talking, therefore, and said: "Very well. We will submit this question to the decision of Heaven by the drawing of lots, according to the ancient practice. Let that method decide whether we shall go home now, and then gain this victory all over again next year, or stay now, with self-sacrifice, and complete our work so well begun."

Then, after writing upon them, he threw two rolled-up pellets of paper on the floor of the council tent, saying: "There are the lots. By them let us be guided. Let the oldest man here pick one up and read it. I, for one, will be guided by the decision."

An aged man went forward, picked up one of the papers, and read, "Remain and finish the war."

The Boers now gave in, and with the utmost cheerfulness accepted the decision that they believed was direct from God. They did not know that on the other lot, which the President himself picked up and secreted in the tumult, were exactly the same words, so that whichever lot was drawn the result was fore-ordained, not by Heaven's hand, but by John Brand's cunning.

THE MINISTER'S BARREL

A Christmas Story.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

"JANE, what are you doing?" cried out an uneasy little girl who was playing with a pug-dog that seemed as tired of the amusement as she was, and that turned an equal look of curiosity upon the elderly woman who was bringing in an armful of cloaks and dresses.

The room was large and luxurious, with heavy, elegant draperies at doors and windows, and a bright fire dancing on the tiled hearth, for the day was a keenly cold one. But flowers filled the air with fragrance, and the beautiful books and pictures and velvety rugs and delightful warmth made one forget that outside winter's surly blasts were blowing, and the season of wretchedness for the many had begun.

"What am I doing?" repeated Jane. "I'm looking over all these things to see if they can be used."

"Why, Jane," said Emily, rising from her corner in the sofa, and letting her dog run off to his cushion by the fire, "you don't mean to make any of those things over for aunt, when she's just brought such beautiful new ones?"

"No," said the seamstress; "these would do nicely, though, for what I want."

"Well, what is it you do want?"

"I want to help fill a barrel for a minister's family out West."

"Are they beggars?" asked the child.

"Oh no!" said the horrified Jane; "but they are very poorly paid, and so are glad to get ready-made garments. See, here is the list;" and she handed Emily a paper on which were written the age, size, and sex of various members of a clergyman's family in need of help.

"Jane," said the child, reading it, "there's a little girl just my age; and, I declare! her name is Emily. Isn't that funny? If I went to your church I'd like to do something for her."

"I don't think it makes any difference whether you go to my church or not," answered Jane, rather surprised at the unwonted interest Emily showed. "It would be very nice if you would do something. The barrel is to go next week, so you have plenty of time."

"But I don't know how to do anything. I hate to sew. I tell you what—I'll write her a letter, and ask her to tell me what she looks like, and where they live and what they all do. Aunt doesn't care, so long as I am quiet and don't bother her, and I am so tired of everything, though I did think measles would be fun; but they ain't when you're getting well and not allowed to go out; besides, aunt is going to have a dinner party, and I'm only to look over the balusters at the people in all their grand satins and laces. I'll tell Emily that, and I'll tell her about my dog Jip, and what I want for Christmas."

"All right," said Jane, very glad that her little charge had found something to occupy her. "Here is paper and pen. Now don't spill the ink, and do try to spell properly."

Nothing was heard for many minutes but the scratching of the pen as Emily, leaned over the table, her long hair tumbling on both sides of her expressive face, which was twisted into all sorts of grimaces as she diligently plied her pen handle. She was an ardent little scribe when she chose to be, though her spelling was very queer and her punctuation queerer; but at last she gave a long sigh, and looking up at Jane, who had made a neat bundle of several costly garments, and was ripping up another which she intended to make over, said:

"Jane, when do you think this will reach the little girl?"

"When the barrel goes, dear."

"But that is so long, Jane?"

"Only next week."

"Oh, I can't wait that long! I want to know that other Emily right straight off."

"I can tell you a little about her now."

"Can you? Well, what is it?"

"She is one of several children, and her mother is dead, but the oldest daughter takes care of the little ones. The father is a poor man; he has to work on his farm as well as preach. These clothes will be a great help to them."

Emily listened eagerly, but seemed dissatisfied. "But I want to know what Emily looks like. Has she hair like mine, and brown eyes? and how tall is she?"

"Ah! that I don't know."

"Jane"—after a long pause—"won't you send my letter now?"

Jane looked at the list again, and found the address.

"It seems kind of queer, but I suppose there's no harm in sending it before the barrel goes. Yes, I will, if you want it very much."

"Oh, thank you, Jane! Now you may read what I've said. See; I've asked her to tell me everything, just as I have told her all about myself and Jip, and you and aunt. Do you think she'll answer me? Do you s'pose she'll care as much as I do? If she does, I will put one of my dolls in the barrel, and send her my photograph."

The letter sped on its way, and reached the lonely little snowed-out village of Greenfield on a Saturday, just in time to be put with the small package of groceries which was going to Mr. Dunbar's house.

Very small, indeed, was the provision for the many who lived in that parsonage, and Rex Dunbar had been hopping eagerly from foot to foot at the gate for the sleigh when its welcome bell was heard. Seizing the package, he rushed into the house, where the hungry children were waiting for supper, and gave it to his sister Mary, saying,

"Jim asked me how Em was, but I was so cold I couldn't stop to talk, and father can't come home to-night 'cause Mrs. Packer's dying; but get supper quick."

"I will in a minute. So poor Mrs. Packer's dying," she murmured. "You can cut the bread, Polly. Rex, we want more wood. Why, children, isn't this strange? Here's a letter for our Em."

"Let's see," cried one and all, from little Tom up to big Rex, and they crowded around Mary as if a letter were the most extraordinary thing imaginable.

"I'd better not give it to her till she's tried to eat something," said the thoughtful Mary. "Don't make such a noise, children." But here a feeble little voice from the next room was heard to say:

"Oh, please tell me what it is!" and forgetful even of supper, the hungry little crowd pushed into the presence of a feeble little form perched among pillows as a bird might have been, so slight, so small, so bright-eyed was it.

"A letter for you, Em," cried out Rex.

"A letter for you," echoed the others, in chorus.

While Mary said: "Hush! you will make her poor head ache. Here, dearie; it is a letter all for your very own;" and she put the envelope in the thin trembling hands, while she tenderly dropped a kiss upon the white brow.

"A letter for me!" repeated the sick girl, as she turned it over and over, her eyes growing bigger and bigger. "Who can it be from? Do I know anybody, Mary, who could write to me? I think it must be from—an angel."

"Oh," gasped Mary, "not yet, dear. Shall I open it?"

"Please do."

"Will you try and eat a morsel first, Emmie?"

"Really, I couldn't, Mary; but I will afterward."

And then the wondering little crowd watched Mary as she deftly parted the envelope and took out the soft satiny sheet, with its pretty blue and silver G in the corner, while Emily's big brown eyes absorbed every detail. Each word was listened to as if it were that of an oracle, and all had something to say about it, but so soon as their curiosity was satisfied, hunger again asserted itself, and Emily was left alone with her letter.

The invalid girl read and re-read the letter, folded it, kissed it, and again spread it out before her.

"Oh, if she only knew how glad it has made me!" she whispered to herself. "But she is a strong, well Emily, and can't know how tired I am. How I would like to see her, and Jip, and Jane! I would kiss her and love her, I know. But that aunt I should be afraid of, I'm sure. And to think her name is Emily—Emily Grafton—while mine's Emily Dunbar. Mary must let me try to answer this. Oh, how I wish I was strong! I wonder if I can't just scratch a word or two? Here's my pencil and my old copy-book."

With trembling eagerness she wrote, "Dear Emily," but she could not do any more, and when Mary came to give her some milk, she found her hot with fever.

"It was too much excitement for my little lamb," the sister said, as the long weary hours of the night went past. But it was only a little temporary increase of trouble. By Monday Emily was better again, and nothing would satisfy her but that Mary should answer the letter for her.

"Tell her everything, Mary—just how big Rex is, and what blue eyes Polly's got, and what a queer name, Poly-anthus, and how Tom chops the wood, and that we have three kittens, and tell her" (with a sigh) "when spring comes I'll send her some wild flowers—if I'm here." But seeing Mary's eyes fill, she added, "You needn't put that in if you don't want to, and I'm so tired I can't think of another word."

The minister had heard nothing of these letters; he had been so much taken up with his pastoral duties that he had not been home long enough to know what was going on. His mind was overburdened with care, not the least of which was the condition of his child, who needed medical advice such as was not procurable in his remote parish.

But one thing cheered him: he knew that busy hands and hearts were preparing clothing for his young family. The long-promised gift was on its way from the helping city church that did so much to sustain Western pioneers, and when one bleak day word came from a distant town which boasted an express office that a barrel shipped to him had arrived, he went from the desolate churchyard, where he had at last laid poor Mrs. Paeker, to procure a neighbor's help in securing the timely gift.

"Where's that barrel I've come for?" called out Mr. Dunbar, as the store-keeper was shutting up for the night.

"Ain't you got it yet?" was the reply.

"No. I've only just heard it was here."

"A man come over this mornin', and said you'd sent him for it. I give it to him as a matter of course."

"Without the receipt?"

"Oh, he said he'd forgot that; left it to him."

"Then I am afraid it has been stolen," was Mr. Dunbar's quiet but despairing reply.

"Not so bad as that, I hope," responded the store-keeper. "I never seed the man afore, but it must be somebody that knowed you."

"No, it wasn't. No one in my congregation would do such a thing, and no one out of it, so far as I know, kink what I was expecting."

"Well! well! well! it does look bad; but we'll hex to hunt it up somewhar," said the man, in a vague, sorrowful sort of way, and Mr. Dunbar had to return home cold, heart-sick, and weary.

The children were dancing with eagerness and expectation. Emily lay on the lounge, wrapped in a shawl, and all were awaiting the coming of the long-looked-for barrel in the family sitting-room. But Mary saw at once that her father had no good news for them, and when he told his story in a few words, sudden darkness seemed to drop down upon the merry group.

No barrel! no Christmas things! no money nor warm new clothes! no kind remembrance!—it was too hard! But these children had learned from their father to bear adversity with fortitude. Only Rex's eyes flashed fiercely as he whispered to Polly: "I'll find that man, and have him punished. See if I don't!"

And a little while went up from Emily: "My picture of my Emily is gone! Oh dear! dear!"

"Hush, darling; don't cry," said Mary. "I'll write to her, and ask her for another."

It was just one week before Christmas, and Miss Grafton had been giving presents for her friends—beautiful things of gold, silver, and ivory—which Emily was looking at with a child's curiosity, when Jane came in from her weekly work at her church sewing-room in unustual agitation, saying: "Isn't it too bad, Miss Grafton? The barrel we all took so much time and pleasure in filling for the minister's family out West has been either lost or stolen. I could cry about it when I think of all those disappointed children, and one of them sick, too! and we working so hard to get the things off before any heavy storms should come, so they could all have a happy Christmas!" and here Jane had to stop for tears.

Miss Grafton looked languidly up from her book, saying, gently but indifferently, "It is, indeed, a pity."

But Emily pushed away the pretty inkstand and jewel case and dignity statuette, crying out, passionately, "Then Emily Dunbar won't get my picture, nor the lovely doll I dressed all by myself! Oh, Jane! it's worse than too bad; it's horrible than anything, that poor, dear, sick little Emily Dunbar should be treated so!"

"Whom did you say?" said Miss Grafton. "What do you mean, Emily? I do not understand."

Then Jane, in a few words, explained what Miss Grafton had not heard before—how the two children had corresponded, and how interested they had become in each other. She smiled at the idea of her little fly-away niece writing letters, but the name Dunbar seemed to call to mind long forgotten memories, and she began to question Jane more closely. Jane told her all she knew of the family, but it was not satisfactory, and she was about taking up her book again, when Emily said,

"Oh, there's a lot of children, auntie, and one has such a funny name; it's Polyanthus."

"Polyanthus Dunbar?" exclaimed Miss Grafton, excitedly. "Why, I went to school with her."

"Oh no, auntie; you must be mistaken," said Emily; "for Polly is younger than I am."

"I tell you I did go to school with Polyanthus Dunbar—not a hundred years ago either—and I loved her dearly. Why, Jane, who can this be? Polly had a brother Rex." "Yes, yes, yes," cried Emily; "our Polly has a brother Rex too."

"Mr. Dunbar must be Polly's brother."

"No, he's her father," said Emily, jumping into her aunt's lap and kissing her. "Oh, auntie, let's go see them. You know the aunt Polly, and I know poor Emily, and I want to see them. I'll go without Christmas and everything if you'll do it. Please give it to me for a present—I mean the visit. Will you—won't you, auntie? ah! do, please; there's a good girl."

"A good fifty-year-old girl," answered Miss Grafton, laughing, but wiping her eyes. "Yes, Emily, we'll go, and if they are my Dumbars, their Christmas shall be the best I can make it."

THE LAUNCHING OF A SHIP.

BY KIRK MURDOX.

THE launch of a great ship is, to most boys and girls, an event so novel, so thrilling, and so intensely interesting that, having once seen it, they will never forget it.

To begin with, a ship is, of course, built on land, and generally close to some river or arm of the sea, into which it can be launched when finished. Not always, though. When Noah built the ark, he did not care whether it was near the water or not, but waited for the water to come to it; and you all know what a time poor Robinson Crusoe had with the great boat that he built, so far from the water that, after all his pains and with all his efforts, he failed to get it afloat, and had to give it up as a bad job. I once knew a man down in Maine who spent all his leisure time for years in building a schooner just back of his house, on the top of a hill, half a mile from the water. He had a curious theory as to how he was going to launch it, but, when the schooner was completed, the theory failed to work, and he finally roofed his vessel over, cut a big hole, for a doorway, in its bottom, and turned it into a barn.

SCENE AT THE LAUNCHING OF A MAN-OF-WAR

Generally, however, ships are built close to the water, and are supported by a frame-work of heavy timbers that raises them above the ground sufficiently to allow the workmen to walk beneath them, and thus get at every part of their keels. This timber frame-work is built on an angle; that is, the part of it farthest from the water is much higher than that close to the water's edge, so the ship, while resting on it, looks ready to coast backward down-hill. And that is just what she does. When ready for launching, and before her masts or machinery have been put in, she rests in a huge timber cradle, which, in turn, is supported on two solid timber railway tracks that extend from the ship yard, along the bottom of the river, far out into the water. These are called "ways," and it is on these that ship, cradle, and all will slide down with a mighty plunge into the water.

While the ship is building it is surrounded by tier after tier of scaffolding, from which the carpenters work; but finally this is all taken away, the great bare hull is gayly decked with flags, and just before high tide on the day set for the launch a select party of invited guests clamber up the high sides, and station themselves about the decks, prepared to be launched with the ship. In the mean time the ways have been coated thickly with grease, the hundreds of "shores," or timbers that have held the ship in place and kept it from sliding into the water before it was ready for swimming, have been knocked away, and only a single stick of timber holds the gigantic cradle in place. At last all is ready; a man with a saw begins to cut through this timber, and everybody awaits the great event in breathless silence.

Suddenly a cracking of wood is heard, and the great ship trembles as though it had just become conscious of existence. Then, still resting in its cradle, it begins to move slowly toward the water, sliding easily along the greased ways. Faster and faster it goes; the grease melts and hisses with the heat of the friction, until at length, amid the wild cheering of perhaps thousands of spectators, and the shrill whistles with which waiting tugs and steamers greet the birth of their new sister, the stately craft plunges into the water, and glides majestically far out on the bosom of the river.

The moment she begins to move on the ways a young lady, or sometimes a little girl, breaks a bottle of wine over the ship's bows, and says, "I hereby christen thee"—mentioning the name that the new ship is to bear.

The most important launching that has taken place in this country for many years was that of the new United States cruiser Chicago, recently launched into the Delaware River from a ship-yard at Chester, Pennsylvania. As the Chicago is already a very famous ship, and is the largest, strongest, swiftest, and most powerful man-of-war owned by this nation, many thousands of spectators were gathered to witness her launching; and when she finally floated gracefully and beautifully on the bosom of the river, her builders were very proud and happy men.

At the moment this mighty craft began to move toward the water, a young lady, named Miss Edith Cleburne, who had in her hand a bottle of wine covered with braided red, white, and blue ribbons, broke it over the ship's bows, and said, "In the name of the United States I baptize thee Chicago. May victory and success attend thee!" When the ship was fully launched and floated on the river, Miss Edith opened the door of a bird-cage that she had brought with her and liberated a canary, an oriole, and a linnet, which, by their flight, were significant of the liberty and happiness that it was hoped would attend the ship.

This is a custom that we have just learned from the Japanese, who, when they launch a government ship, give liberty to hundreds of caged birds, and to all the prisoners who may at the time be confined in the government dock-yards and arsenals.

TWO ARROWS:

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.

FROM BOW TO RIFLE.

LEANING over the upper log of the barrier, rifle in hand, and peering out upon the starlit slope beyond him, stood the form of Jonas, the miner. Not a sound came to him from the mists and shadows of the valley, and he was just remarking, aloud, "It's as quiet as a corn field," when a voice at his elbow exclaimed:

"Hist! Ha-ha-pah-no—sh-sh!" and Na-tec-kah dropped upon the ground, and pressed her little round ear against it. So, almost instantly, did Ha-ha-pah-no, and Jonas heard Sile saying,

"Their ears are better than yours or mine."

"Didn't know there was one of ye nigh me," said Jonas. "That's the way for a feller to lose his hair—looking too hard in one direction while somebody comes up behind him. No, I haven't heard a thing."

Na-tec-kah sprang to her feet. "Horse come. Ugh!" and she held up her hand for silence, while Ha-ha-pah-no also arose, listening intently.

"Indian ears for it," said Jonas. "'Pears to me I can hear something now myself."

"I can't," said another voice. It was that of a sleepy miner, who had waked up to follow Sile, just as he had been awakened by even the noiseless movements of the squaws.

"Hark!" exclaimed Jonas.

It was the sound of galloping, and then a shrill whoop. "Two Arrows!" screamed Na-tec-kah. "Pache get him!"

Jonas had already thrown down the logs of wood in the opening, and now he shouted, "Rifle, boys! ready!"

There was a great shout from the bivouac behind them, but it seemed almost no time before a pony and his rider dashed into dim view before them, followed by a larger shadow, from which came whoop after whoop.

"Take the hind one; give it to him," shouted Jonas, as a streak of fire sprang from his own rifle muzzle. Two other shots followed, as if there were any chance of hitting a galloping horseman in such a half darkness as that. Hit or no hit, one Apache warrior was so utterly astounded that he drew rein, all but throwing his horse upon his haunches, and the pony-rider he was pursuing wheeled sharply to the right. Half a minute later, and all would have been over with Two Arrows, in all probability, but, as matters had now turned, it was his enemy who had made a blunder. He sat for several precious seconds almost motionless, although not a shot had touched him, and by so doing he put himself up for a target at very short arrow range. The next instant he was dashing wildly away into the darkness, for the horse had an arrow in his flank to spur him, and the brave himself had a similar token of the skill of Two Arrows projecting from his right thigh.

"Sile," said Jonas, "he got it. You can tell that by the yell he gave."

"Come on in," shouted Sile. "There may be more of 'em. We're all up and ready for 'em."

It looked like it, as man after man came hurrying forward, but Two Arrows quieted them on that head. He had been sent forward by Long Bear to announce the coming of the Nez Percés, and he had encountered the Apache less than half a mile from the notch. It had been a close race, although he had a fresh pony and a good start. Any hurt to his pride on account of arriving in that precise manner followed instead of following—was more than cured by the undoubted fact that he had sent an arrow into his pursuer.

"There wasn't really any show for bullet-work," said Jonas; "but lead'll hurt just as bad in the dark, in case it gits there."

"All come," said Na-tec-kah. "Good. Two Arrows great brave now. Strike warrior. Fight a heap."

Judge Parks was not sorry to hear of such an addition to his little garrison, as the Nez Percé warriors could be fully depended upon to fight well for their ponies and lives. It was not a great while before the head of their cavalcade came out of the shadows, and deeper and louder whoops answered that of Two Arrows.

In a few minutes more the Nez Percé ponies were squeezing their packs through the narrow entrance of the notch, and a succession of approving grunts from Long Bear testified the satisfaction he felt at getting into so secure a fort. He perfectly understood the value and use of that barrier. When daylight came he again said "Ugh!" several times while he was examining the evidences of the skill and zeal of his pale-face friends.

There was no more sleeping done in the notch, but there was an immense amount of very early cooking and eating, not to speak of the smoking and consultation, and the very general expression of a bad opinion of the entire Apache nation. They and their works, past, present, and to come, were condemned unsparingly. At the same time their fighting qualities were freely admitted, and with them the certainty that no Apache war party would turn away from a bit of war so well begun as was this.

"Them Paches'll come and go," said Jonas, "but we've got to have this 'ere wall finished." And at it they went, well assured that the barrier and all the land near it would be well watched, and that it was an easy thing to do to pick up a rifle if an alarm should come.

Sile felt less interest in the mine somehow. The story of his exploit had been told, of course, to his Indian friends, and he could but see that it had made him an object of respectful admiration. There was not a warrior among them who would not have been proud of such a feather as that victory, but the effect upon Two Arrows was peculiar. He had regarded himself as Sile's superior in all things which did not belong especially to a young pale face. It had not occurred to him that Sile was or ever could become a "great brave." Some of the "blue-coats" were, he knew, but Sile was not a blue coat. He had heard stories of the prowess of other pale-faces, but Sile was a mere boy, and dreadfully green to the ways of the plains and mountains. He could not think of one boy of his band who really knew less of the things most important to be known, except rifle shooting.

"LEANING OVER THE BARRIER RIFLE IN HAND"

Na-tee-kah was enormously proud of that arrow, and Ha-ha-pah no was compelled to remind her that her hero brother had brought in neither scalp nor horse, and had saved his own by the timely rifle practice of Sile and the men at the gap. For all that, Na-tee-kah had a vivid persuasion that if the pale-faces had not interfered and driven away the Apache, there would have been more glory earned by the young chief of the Nez Percés.

After a brief consultation with his father, the Red-head went to the wagon and brought out the rifle he had won, and with it a box of cartridges. It was a capital weapon, in good condition, and Sile showed it to Two Arrows with a great glow on his face, and with a sense of standing up uncommonly straight.

Two Arrows held it for a moment, with a look which did not need any interpreter. It was intensely wistful, and had a quick flash of keen jealousy in it. What was there that he could not do with such a splendid tool of destruction as that, instead of his lance and bow? He was nothing but a poor red youngster, after all, compelled to wait, he could not guess how long, before he could hope to be armed as a complete brave. He held out the rifle to Sile dejectedly; but then something like a shiver went all over him, for Sile only pushed it back, saying:

"No; Two Arrows keep it. Take present. Good friend." And then he held out the little water-proof box of copper cartridges of the size called for by that rifle.

Two Arrows required a breath or so before he could believe that the thing was a reality, and then he broke out into a yell of delight.

Every Nez Percé brave present deemed it his duty to shake hands with Sile, and Long Bear was summoned at once to do the same. Two Arrows found himself terribly short of words to tell how he felt about it, but he flatly refused to make a trial of that gun then and there. He did not know how steadily Sile had insisted on trying several shots every day since the mining expedition started. At all events he had mounted one round more in the ladder of his ambition, and had a better prospect for the next.

"NUMBER 101."

A STORY OF CHRISTMAS EVE.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

"NEWFOUNDLAND" detained at Quarantine overnight. Will land passengers about ten to-morrow morning.

"STEM, STREDSBY, & CO."

When Fred Meredith had read the above telegram, he crumpled it up into a ball, flung it to a far corner of the room, and turned to flatten his face against the window-pane, with the muttered exclamation: "Well, isn't this provoking! If the dispatch had only come a little sooner, Cousin Bab wouldn't have—well, I s'pose she wouldn't have gone home for Christmas."

"Cousin Bab" was Miss Barbara Emerson from Troy, who, while Mr. and Mrs. Meredith were away on an autumn trip to Europe, had come to New York to keep house for Fred. They had expected to be home again two or three days before Christmas, but the steamer was not sighted until noon of the 24th, and according to the first telegram received from the agents there would be time enough for Fred to take his cousin to her train before going down to the pier. But on his way back from the depot he had stopped at the house for an umbrella, and found the second message waiting for him.

"To think they're so near home and yet can't get here!" he went on muttering to himself. "I feel like doing something desperate. If it was only summer, and I had a boat, I believe I'd row down to Quarantine."

Then, as Fred recollected that if it was summer it wouldn't be Christmas Eve, he turned away from the window with his act of desperation decided on.

"I'll go over to the Forty-eighth Street bridge for it," he exclaimed, as he hurried off down-stairs. "I must have some fun a night like this, and I'll have time for half a dozen good coasts before dinner."

Just above the Grand Central Depot there are a very cross street bridges built over the numerous tracks forming the railroad yard, and the inclines leading up to these bridges are among the few hills city boys can avail themselves of when snow comes. But on this particular occasion, when Fred reached the foot of the ascent, there was not another boy or sled to be seen.

"Of course all the other fellows are at home getting ready for Christmas," he told himself, dolefully.

However, the coast was such a splendid one that the boy began to grow more cheerful in spite of himself. He was trudging up the incline for his fourth skim, when he became aware that two boys had stopped on their way over the bridge to watch him.

"I say, Pedie, wouldn't yer like ter be him!" he heard one of them say to the other a minute afterward, as he flew by them on the Dasher.

"If they're there when I go back I'll let them have the sled for a coast apiece," Fred suddenly resolved.

The two boys were there when he arrived at the starting point again, and by the light from the street lamp over their heads Fred saw that they were both thin and pale, and that neither of them wore an overcoat.

"Would you like to try it?" he said at once, offering the rope to the smaller one.

"Bet I would!" was the quick reply.

The rope was fairly snatched from his hands, and the next instant the young stranger was at the foot of the hill.

"You can go next time," continued Fred, turning to the other lad, who had meanwhile been staring steadily at the Dasher's owner, up from his rubber boots to his seal-skin cap, and down again.

"Oh, can I? Bully for—" Here the boy stopped short, as if suddenly remembering that this way of saying "Much obliged" might not be understood by everybody.

But Fred laughed, and submitted meekly to a second close inspection of himself, this time from Pedie, which was presently abruptly terminated by the flight of the latter down the hill in response to a call from his friend.

"Good-by to my sled," thought Fred, instantly trying to decide whether or not he should give chase. "But I'll never use it again, so they may as well have the good of it," he reflected. "Still, it was mean in them to steal it from me after I'd let them have the coasts."

But now he perceived, it must be confessed somewhat to his surprise, that the two boys were not making off at double quick with their booty at all. On the contrary, they were standing still at the corner, evidently having quite a discussion between themselves.

"I declare if I don't believe they're squabbling over which one of them is to have the Dasher right under my very eyes. But, hello! here they both come, with the sled, too. Wonder what they're up to, anyway?"

It was strange, but for the past five minutes or so Fred had quite forgotten about his lone and lorn condition on this Christmas Eve; and now, when the two street boys arrived in front of him, one urging the other with, "You ask him; I don't like ter," he actually found that he was enjoying himself over the mystery.

But the two lads kept disputing so long between themselves as to which of them should do the explaining that finally Fred broke in with, "You can each have another coast if you'd like to ask—"

"No; that wasn't what we wanted ter ask yer," answered the bigger boy. "Yer see, you was awful good ter let us have yer sled, so me and Pedie wants ter give yer sabbin back, if ye'll take what we wants—"

"Oh, he can't take it, Sim," here interrupted Pedie, in a loud whisper. "Yer know we gives it, an' he—"

"Yes, we gives it," went on Sim, thus corrected; "but you can—can— What is it, Pedie?"

"Except," prompted Pedie.

"Yes; yer can except the invite," continued Sim. "We'd be awful glad ter have yer. It's Christmas Eve, yer know, and 'tain't often we can have sich a bully place ter spree it in as ter-night. Pedie he found it, an' it's ter be there all night. 'Tain't very far from here, nuther."

"Where you live, you mean?" put in Fred. "I know mother wouldn't like to have me go there," he was reflecting, inwardly. At the same time, in his present desperate mood, he felt ready for anything that promised novelty and entertainment for this lonely Christmas Eve.

"No; 'tain't our house," returned Sim, with a laugh, as he added: "Me an' Pedie ain't got no house. We sleeps where we can, an' eats 'most anywhere; but this Christmas Eve we're goin' ter have a reg'lar spread. Yer see, me an' Pedie's sold more matches nor common—'bout this time o' year folks are feelin' good-natured—so we're rich ter-night, an' we was a-wonderin' whether we'd buy plum-cake or snaps when we seed yer a-coastin', an' stopped ter watch yer."

"An' then we thought 'twould be more like a reg'lar Christmas party," put in Pedie, "if we was ter invite you ter ours this evenin'. You'll come, won't yer? We'll stop for you if you tell us where you lives."

"Well, if I ever heard or read of anything to beat this," Fred was meanwhile saying to himself. "Yes, I'll accept, with pleasure," he added, aloud, as Pedie paused.

"Good for you!" cried both boys at once, and Sim made a motion as if to slap Fred on the back, but let his arm fall midway, as if the Melton overcoat had warned it off.

Fred saw the motion, guessed what the trouble was, and at once gave a hand to each of the boys, saying, as he shook theirs: "Good-by now; I must get back to dinner. I live in the corner house over yonder; you can see it from here. I'll expect you to stop for me at seven."

The two urchins grinned their delight at this display of good-fellowship, and the last thing Fred heard, as he shot down the hill, was, "My, Pedie, ain't he a daisy!"

The big dining-room at the Merediths' had never seemed so big and chill in its grandeur as when Fred sat there that Christmas Eve, eating dinner all by himself. Even the butler appeared to be more solemn than usual.

"Why didn't I ask those two chaps to dinner?" was the sudden thought that now struck Fred. "To be sure, they wouldn't be as well dressed as Gus Burns or Harry Gainsway, but I've no doubt they'd have a good deal better appetites. Pshaw, what a stupid fellow I was! I say, William," he said, aloud, to the butler, "what have you for dessert?"

"Mince-pie, ice-cream, and fruit, sir," was the answer.

"Well, then," went on Fred, "don't have the cream taken out of the can, but pack it and the pie in a good sized basket. And along with them you can put in some apples, oranges, bananas, and a lot of fancy cakes. And I want you, please, to tie the basket on to my sled, and have it ready for me at the basement door by seven o'clock. That's all," and Fred got up and walked out of the room.

But "What would mother say if she knew?" was the question that troubled Fred on his way upstairs.

This was indeed a perplexing problem, for sometimes he felt as if his having promised to go off with these two strange boys of the street was about the most imprudent thing he had ever done; then, again, he would argue to himself that he was keeping to the spirit of the Christmas season in a way that would delight his mother's heart.

Just as the clock on his mantel chimed seven, he heard the front door bell ring, and hurried down for fear William might not think that the two callers were really friends of his. He reached the lower hall in time to overhear a timid voice inform the butler that "we're here; please tell the young feller, an' we'll wait outside for him."

"Oh no, you won't," exclaimed Fred. "Come in and get warm while I am putting on my coat."

The two snow-covered figures slid in with an expression of pleased surprise on their little pale faces, and as Fred shut out the storm and pointed them to seats on the carved bench under the hat rack, Sim gave utterance to an involuntary "My jiminy crick!"

As for Pedie, he kept his eyes fixed on Fred, who soon announced himself as ready to start for the surprise party. "And at that sort of party," he added, as they went down the steps, "you know the guests always take some of the refreshments along with them. Mine's on my sled in the basement. Wait a minute till I get it."

William had it ready for him, and there was room beside the basket for the smallest boy to sit, and that boy was Pedie. So Fred told him to get on, and then he and Sim took hold of the rope and trotted off, as well-matched a team as anybody could wish for, although one wore an overcoat with a velvet collar, and the other's only extra wrap was a long red comforter wound about his neck.

"Um! oh! I smell oranges," proclaimed Pedie, presently, hugging the big basket affectionately.

"Good nuff!" cried Sim, excitedly.

"Whereabouts are we going?" he inquired when they were under way again.

"Up by the Park," answered Fred. "We don't want ter tell you enny more till we shows it ter you."

The night wasn't a very dark one, nor was it cold either, and as he ran along through the softly falling snow, Fred could feel his heart growing lighter and lighter.

"Here we are!" called out Pedie, suddenly.

Fred looked about him in considerable astonishment, for they had reached an up-town portion of the avenue where there was only the Park on one side and vacant lots on the other, and not a house to be seen.

"But where's here?" he inquired.

Then Sim struck an attitude and pointed to a street-car that had been lifted from the track and temporarily abandoned near the curb-stone.

"Yer see, she run off inter the snow this afternoon an' busted one of her wheels," Pedie went on to explain, when the three boys and the Dasher were once inside and the door closed. "Leastways, I s'pose 'twas some thim' or other like that, for I heard the men sayin' as how they'd better leave her here till to-morrow, when they could send a wagon up ter take her down ter the shop. An' don't it just make a daisy parlor for us fellers?"

"But what if some of the conductors on the other cars should see us in here as they're a goin' by?" Sim suggested, a little anxiously, as he proceeded to unload his various pockets of broken bits of a mixture of plum cake and ginger-snaps.

"We'll duck whenever we hears a car comin'," returned Pedie. "Whew, Jiminy!"

This latter exclamation was caused by Pedie's discovery of what was in the basket.

"An' is all this truly for our party?" cried Sim, joyfully, a minute or so afterward, hugging the cold ice-cream can to his heart as if it had been a warming brick.

"THEY HAD REACHED AN UPTOWN PORTION OF THE AVENUE"

"Of course it is," answered Fred, who, ever since he had been invited into the car, had seemed ready to explode into a hearty laugh for some reason or other: "but I don't see how it's going to do any of us much good without spoons to eat it with. If I'd known—"

"Drop! drop!" cautioned Pedie, himself setting the example, as a jingling of bells was heard.

"We're nabbed this time," whispered Sim, hoarsely, the next instant, as the bell jingling suddenly ceased, and the car jarred beneath a heavy tread on the platform.

"Hush! keep still!" continued Sim, after an instant's suspense. "Perhaps he won't come inside."

Fred could not have spoken if he had wanted to. He was actually writhing in merriment as he lay there on the seat listening to the whispers of the boys.

Then, "Tain't broke at all," he heard one of the men say outside. "We can easily tow it down to the depot behind the plough. All put your shoulders under now."

The next minute the car was lifted with a suddenness that sent Sim and Pedie rolling down the floor to the other end, with the sled, the basket, and the ice-cream can on top of them. But to lads accustomed to such hard knocks in life as were the young match-sellers this little incident was a mere nothing, and their principal concern was as to whether the refreshments had suffered any harm.

Luckily, however, the basket's cover fitted snug, and the lid had not yet been taken off the ice-cream, and the three boys were trying to laugh over the mishap without making a noise, when all at once the car was tipped up at the other end, and the tumbling act repeated.

There was no keeping in the laugh after this, and if the railroad men had not made so much noise among themselves, the presence of passengers in Number 101 must surely have been discovered.

"We'll have ter git out of this," Sim found voice enough to say at last. "They'll be mad when they finds out we was in here ter make it heavier when they lifted it."

"We're a-movin'!" cried Pedie, jumping to his feet.

It was true. The men had succeeded in placing the car back on the track, and attaching it to the rear of the big snow-plough, and the boys were now being whirled off down-town by eight-horse power, and with the two giant revolving sweepers to clear the way.

"How's this for a free ride?" exclaimed Sim, bobbing about from one window to another in great glee. "But I say," he added, more soberly, the next minute, "we'd better jump off 'fore we gets ter depot quarters."

"An' lose our Christmas party we was a goin' ter give?" put in Pedie, mournfully.

"Isn't this gay sport, boys?" cried Fred at last. "Why, I don't believe even the President ever rides behind eight horses like this, and I'm sure he never has a special path swept for him. Just listen now till I add another sound to this merry Christmas jingle;" and Fred gave three or four sharp rings to the conductor's bell.

"Crickety! look out!" warned Sim. "They'll ketch us sure. Pedie an' we wouldn't care so much, but I reckon you ain't used ter bein' took up by the perlice."

"Oh my! this beats me," murmured Fred, displaying symptoms of another laughing fit. "The idea of my bein' arrested for being here."

"Hello! here we are at the depot," exclaimed Pedie, catching up the can of ice-cream. "Quick! jump off 'fore they ketches yer."

"No; stay right where you are, boys," commanded Fred, in a voice of authority. Then throwing open the door, he stepped out on the front platform, and beckoned to a gentleman who had just come out of the office.

"Oh, Mr. Dillon, I want to speak to you a minute."

"At this Sim and Pedie looked at each other with such mingled expressions of amazement and terror on their faces that Fred thought he had better explain.

"You needn't be afraid of being 'nabbed,'" he said, quietly. "My father is President of the road."

Up over the car house, in the Superintendent's private office, the belated Christmas Eve party of Pedie and Sim finally came off. A table and complete outfit, including napkins and a waiter, were hired from the restaurant over the way (to be paid for out of Fred's own pocket), and the ice-cream, pie, fruit, plum-cake, and "snaps" disappeared amid much snacking of lips, cracking of jokes, and a toast from Fred "To Number 101, the triumphal car that brought us down to spoons and saucers."

"Which way do you go now?" he inquired of his young hosts, when the three were out in the street again, with the Dasher in tow. "And—oh yes—I want to know where I'm to make my party call."

"We're goin' ter try an' stick to the Newsboys' for a week any way," answered Sim. "I reckon we can make enough these holiday times ter pull us through."

Then having ascertained their last name—which revealed the fact that the boys were brothers—Fred left them at the corner of Sixth Avenue, and sped off toward home, with Pedie's last words ringing in his ears: "Good-night. You've just been bully to Sim an' me."

Fred went down to the lodging-house to make his "party call" within the week, and his father went with him, and Pedie and Sim never had cause to regret having invited a guest to share their Christmas feast in Number 101.

THE ADORATION OF THE MAGI.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

IF there is a little babe in your home, a wee helpless darling with a hand like a crumpled rose leaf, innocent, wide-open eyes looking in great wonder out on this strange world, and soft round cheeks that feel like the very smoothest satin, you do not need me to tell you that the baby in his weakness is the very strongest person in all the house. Although he can neither walk nor talk, can do nothing for himself or for any one else, although he would die if mamma did not care for him night and day, still he rules everybody. Just because he is so fragile and so little and so precious, everybody loves and tries to protect him. The greatest men and women, kings and queens and presidents, statesmen and poets, write in showing kindness to the little baby, who is dependent upon care and kindness for his continued existence in the world.

Now the central thought of the Christmas joy which is flooding every heart, the meaning of the Christmas trees and the Christmas gifts and carols, and the shining wreaths of green all starred with holly and mistletoe, is found in this, that the Babe was born in Bethlehem, God's gift to the whole human race. As often as Christmas comes, with its ringing bells and pealing anthems, its cheer and blessedness, which are alike for old and young, for rich and poor, for high and low, we remember again the song of the angels who came flying from heaven in the night, the flaming of the star in the East, the simple worship of the shepherds, and the adoration of the Magi.

I like to think about the group who in the early dawn took their way up the steep hill path to Bethlehem, and knelt together before the Child in His mother's arms, Judea in those days was a province of Rome, and Rome was the mistress of the whole known world. You could go nowhere that you did not see the Roman eagles, meet the Roman soldiers, and find the Roman tax-gatherers.

Alfred Domett, in his beautiful Christmas hymn, brings out vividly the contrast between the scene in Rome and the scene in Judea on the night when our Lord was born.

"'Twas in the calm and silent night,
The Senator of laughing Rome
Impatient wrast his chariot's flight,
From loudly revel rolling home,
Triumphal arches gleaming swell
His breast with thoughts of boundless sway.
What reeked the Roman what betell
A paltry province far away,
In the solemn midnight
Centuries ago!

"Within that province far away
Went plodding home a weary boor;
A streak of light before him lay,
Fallen through a half-shut stable door,
Across his path. He halted, for naught
Told what was going on within.
How keen the stars! his only thought;
The air how calm, and cold, and thin!
In the solemn midnight
Centuries ago."

We have read in our New Testaments the story of the three Wise Men from the East, who observing a very remarkable star, followed it till it came and "stood over the place where the young Child lay." The astrologers of Media and Persia were accustomed to study the heavens, and they thought that the movements of the planets had a great deal to do with what was going on in the earth, foretelling political changes, wars, and conquests. To them the sky was a great open book, and the stars were the letters on its pages.

Tradition tells us that the Wise Men were three great kings, their names Melchior, Caspar, and Balthasar. The first was a grand old man, with flowing hair white as snow, and a long, sweeping, snowy beard; the second was a beautiful boy, with bright eyes and rosy cheeks; and the third was dark and swarthy, a man in the prime of life; they thus symbolizing the three periods, age, middle life, and early youth, and these periods in their persons bowed at the cradle in the manger.

Following tradition again, we find in the three Wise Men three nations represented, the Hindoo, the Greek, and the Egyptian. They had not lived together, nor together studied the sky and watched the wonderful star, but, each in his own land, walking out by night under the silent heavens, had been attracted by something far brighter and more beautiful than he had ever seen before, and setting out, provided for a long journey, the three had traversed the leagues hopefully, until they were satisfied when the star brought them to their journey's end.

Fancy, dear children, the slow progress made by these travellers, as, mounted on their dromedaries, they passed over wide spaces of desert, the shifting sands blowing about, the fierce sun beating down, with here and there a welcome oasis where green-fringed palms and fruit-bearing dates showed the presence of water. Perhaps at some point on the way, in the shadow of a bare white mountain of Arabia, the three travellers met.

You must not think that they were solitary pilgrims. It was not safe then, as it is not safe now, to cross the desert without a number of retainers, armed to the teeth and prepared to fight, to take either the offensive or the defensive as may be necessary. At night when the Prince halted, that man and beast might rest, there was always a strong guard as a protection against robbers and surprises, and fires were kindled to keep wild beasts away. Surrounded by a circle of flame and a circle of watchful sentinels, the caravan arrested its movements when it reached a place where the bit of green herbage or the silver gleam of a fountain invited the weary to repose. The hours for slumber would speed on swiftly, and very early in the morning there would be a stir and an air of haste and confusion, for the call would be, "Up and onward!" before the sun should pour down his tropical heat. And ever in the eastern sky, large and golden, would be the beautiful and glorious star.

Melchior and Caspar and Balthasar, meeting on their way to Palestine and joining their forces, the Orient Kings would ride leisurely in the van, the thoughtful eyes of the Hindoo glowing with ardor, the fair face of the Greek lighted with enthusiasm, the dark brow of the Egyptian weighted with a solemn purpose. It must have been only a glimmer of the truth which shone upon their minds. They did not know, as we do, that the star had risen to announce the advent of One who should be Prince of Peace, and reign over the kings of the earth.

But they went with tender reverence where the star led them. When they found that it was not to a palace, but to a stable, not to a throne-room, but a manger, that their steps were guided, they showed no disappointment, but with lowly prostrations and deep obeisances, they worshipped the new-born Babe, when they found Him with Mary His mother. And opening their treasures, they presented him with gifts, gold and frankincense and myrrh, the precious myrrh a type of healing, the sweet perfume a symbol of prayer, the enduring gold a sign of wealth consecrated. Or, if you prefer it, the myrrh to indicate praise for the human nature of the Lord, gold to adore the King of the earth, and incense to arise to the divinity. This is too mystical for young readers to understand, so I will make it plainer by saying that the Magi gave of their very best to Jesus. Shall we do less?

BY HOWARD PYLE.

THERE was a woman who owned a fine gray goose. "To-morrow," said she, "I will pluck the goose for live fethers, so that I may take them to market and sell them for good hard money."

This the goose heard, and liked it not. "Why should I grow live fethers for other folks to pluck?" said she to herself. So off she went into the wide world with nothing upon her back but what belonged to her.

By-and-by she came up with a sausage.

"Whither away, friend?" said the gray goose.

"Out into the wide world," said the sausage.

"Why do you travel that road?" said the gray goose.

"Why should I stay at home?" said the sausage. "See, now, they stuff me with good meat and barley meal over yonder; but they only do it for other folk's feasting. That is the way with the world."

"Yes, that is true," said the gray goose; "and I too am going out into the world; for why should I grow live fethers for other folk's picking? So let us travel together, as we are both of a mind."

Well, that suited the sausage well enough; so off they went, arm in arm.

By-and-by they came up with a cock.

"Whither away, friend?" said the gray goose and the sausage.

"Out into the wide world," said the cock.

"Why do you travel that road?" said they.

"Why should I stay at home?" said the cock. "Every day they feed me with barley-meal, but it is only that I may split my throat in the mornings calling the lads to the fields and the maids to the milking."

"Yes, that is true," said the gray goose. "Why should I grow live fethers for other folk's picking?"

And, "Yes, that is true," said the sausage. "Why should I be stuffed with meat and barley-meal for other folk's feasting?"

So the three being all of a mind, they settled to travel the same road together.

Well, they went on, and on, and on, until at last they came to a deep forest, and by-and-by whom should they meet but a great red fox.

"Whither away, friends?" said he.

"Oh, we are going out into the wide world," said the gray goose, the sausage, and the cock.

The Gray Goose meets the Sausage

"And why do you travel that road?" said the fox.

"There was nothing but tangled yarn at home—the goose grew live feathers for other folk's picking, the sausage was stuffed for other folk's feasting, and the cock waked in the morn for other folk's waking. That was the way of the world over yonder, and so I had left it.

"Yes," said the fox, "that is true; so come with me into the deep forest, where every one can live for himself alone."

So they all went into the forest together, for the fox's words pleased them very much.

"And now," said the fox to the gray goose, "you shall be my wife;" for he had never had a sweetheart before, and even a gray goose is better than none.

"And what is to become of us?" said the sausage and the cock.

"You and I shall be dear friends," said the great red fox. Thereat the cock and the sausage were content; for it took but little to satisfy them.

Well, everything was just as the great red fox had said it should be: the goose kept her own feathers, the sausage was stuffed for its own good, the cock crowed for its own ears, and everything was as smooth as rich cream. Moreover, the great red fox and the gray goose were husband and wife, and the great red fox and the sausage and the cock were dear friends.

One morning says the great red fox to the gray goose, "Neighbor Cock makes a mighty hubbub with his crowing."

"Yes, that is so," said the gray goose, for she always sang the same tune as the great red fox, as a good wife should.

"Then," said the great red fox, "I will go over and have a talk with him."

So off he packed, and by-and-by he came to Neighbor Cock's house. Rap, tap, tap, he knocked at the door.

"See, Neighbor Cock," said the great red fox, "you make a mighty hubbub with that crowing of yours."

"That may be so, and that may not be so," said the cock. "All the same, the hubbub is in my own house."

"That is good," said the great red fox; "but one should not trouble one's neighbors, even in one's own house, so, if it suits you, we will have no more crowing."

"I was made for crowing, and crow I must," said the cock.

"You must crow no more," said the great red fox.

"I must crow," said the cock.

"You must not crow," said the great red fox.

"I must crow," said the cock. And that was the last of it, for, snip! off went its head, and it crowed no more. Nevertheless, it had the last word, and that was some comfort. After that the great red fox ate up the cock, body and bones, and then he went home again.

"Will Neighbor Cock crow again?" said the gray goose.

"No; he will crow no more," said the fox.

By-and-by came hungry times, with little or nothing in the house to eat. "Look," said the great red fox, "yonder is Neighbor Sausage, and he has plenty."

"Yes, that is true," said the gray goose.

"And one's friend should help one when one is in need," said the great red fox.

The Fox calls on the Cock

"Yes, that is true," said the gray goose again.

So off went the great red fox to Neighbor Sausage's house. Rap, tap, tap, he knocked at the door, and it was the sausage himself who came.

"See," said the fox, "there are hungry times over at our house."

"I am sorry for that," said the sausage; "but hungry times will come to the best of us."

"That is so," said the great red fox, "but, all the same, you must help me through this crack. One would be in a bad pass without a friend to turn to."

"But see," said the sausage, "all that I have is mine, and it is inside of me at that."

"Nevertheless I must have some of it."

"But you can't have it," said the sausage.

"But I must have it," said the great red fox.

"But you can't have it," said the sausage.

And they talked, and talked, and talked, but the end came at last, for one can not talk forever on an empty stomach. Snip! snap! and the sausage was down the great red fox's throat, and there was an end of it. And then the fox went back home again.

"Did Neighbor Sausage give you anything?" said the gray goose.

"Oh yes; he gave me all that he had with him," said the great red fox, and that also was very true.

After that the world went around for a while as easily as a greased wheel. But one day the great red fox

Then you should have heard the gray goose talk and talk. But it was no use: when times are hard with one, one's wife should help to feather the nest; that was what the great red fox said.

Snip! snap! crunch! crunch! and off went the gray goose's head. After that the fox ate her up, body and bones, and there was an end of her. Then he lay upon soft feathers and slept easily.

Now this is true that I tell you: when a great red fox and a gray goose marry, and hard times come, one must make it soft for the other; mostly it is the gray goose who does that.

THE FOUR PRINCESSES.

Four Princesses lived in a Green Tower—
A bright Green Tower in the middle of the sea;
And no one could think—oh, no one could think—
Who the Four Princesses could be.

One looked to the North, and one to the South,
And one to the East, and one to the West;
They were all so pretty, so very pretty,
You could not tell which was the prettiest.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

TERRACONDA, NORTH CAROLINA.

Not long ago I saw a request from two girls for an idea about birthday celebration. I will suggest two:

First, "A Pink Tea." Invitations must be sent about a week beforehand, so as to give the guests time to prepare. They are to be sent in pink envelopes, and should run as follows:

The Misses—request the pleasure of your company on Thursday evening, the 12th.
Fidelity 008. Chancellor de rue.

Every girl must come in pink, and the boys must have pink cravats. Every guest must have a card on the left arm, a long narrow pink ribbon, and a small pink T attached to its end. On the "eventful" evening everything must be pink.
The lights may be made so by pink tissue paper shades over the chandeliers. The evening may be passed away pleasantly by games, music, dancing, etc., until supper is announced. Each boy takes in a girl, and at the dining room door each couple is presented with two little fans, pink, with the names of the hostesses, and the date written over them. These are wrapped in pink tissuepaper, and are intended to be mementos of the occasion. The table is in the shape of a T, and covered with a pink cloth. After supper all retire to the parlors, where some nice games, music, or songs, conclude a very pleasant evening.
This entertainment is much finer if the girls live in a city, and are in their "toons."

For children, especially those living in the country, a "house picnic" is the nicest of all. Let the house be opened from garret to cellar from 7 to 11 P. M.; supper at 8:30; games, music, etc., pass a way the evening, and the pleasure of the young folks is added to by a "candy pull."

By trying these ideas, if put into use, will succeed,
I am hoping you think.

Thank you on behalf of the little people.

Thank you, little Alice, for the kind invitation at the close of your bright little letter, which all will agree with me is very bright for a nine-year-old girl.

ECONOMY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am living in a little town called Economy. It is a very nice place, and I wish to tell you all about it. The town is owned by the Harmony Society. There are not more than fifty members in the Society now, and Mr. H. and Mr. L. are the trustees. There is only one store in this town; the post-office is in it too. They used to make silks, satins, velvets and plushes, but they do not make any more, for they have enough to do to last some time. Some of the men of the Society used to have a string band in the church, but they do not play any more. They have only one church here. The steeple on the church is about one hundred feet high. If you go up the four flights of stairs in the church tower you may step out on a little platform with a railing around it, and see many miles down the Ohio River. From here you could see nearly all the Economy Farm, if it were not for the high hills on the east side. They are covered with beautiful trees, and our whole school sometimes goes out to the woods and gathers autumn leaves. A choir of boys and girls, and a few men sing in church every afternoon; I am one of them. There is a large garden here, and on some Sunday evenings the silver cornet band plays the tune, and the people come and walk around to see the flowers and hear the music. At home we have a little orchestra of our own. Many people say these large orchards are the finest they ever saw. There is a laundry here, where all the people in the town have their clothing washed. There is an old cannon beside the river-bank, near our house; we use it to play on. One of our friends here has a very pleasant house. In the parlor they have two pianos, with covers, which, as well as the window-curtains, are made of Economy silks. They also have a music-box and a gold clock that play tunes.

They have two lovely oil-paintings of the Savour; one is a picture of the Babe in the stable, with the shepherds kneeling around, and the other is a very large picture of "Christ Healing the Sick," which our teacher says was painted by Christ, a famous artist. He made some wax fruit about fifty years ago, and it stands on the mantel on each side of the gold clock. Before church in the afternoon some of the men that belong to the Society have a committee when they meet in this parlor. They have a few orphans here, but most of us have parents, who are liked to do the work. The farms here are somewhat like a sunrise and sunset, and the graveyard is in the most beautiful of the orchards.

If you come this way some time, I wish you would stop at Economy, and go to the store; my grandmother would tell you where I live, and I would take you to these places that I am speaking of. Mr. H. said last year that I was as old as he was when I was eight years old, and my name is Ott, and 8 and 0 are 80. ALICE C. O.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have begun to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I think it is very interesting. I think it must be very pleasant to write to the Post-office Box.
I see that some of the children write stories.
May I send "An Autobiography of a Gold Dollar" which I wrote myself? I would like to become an author when I grow up. I have many nunts and uncles living in New York, and when I go to see them I shall take great pleasure in visiting you. I have read nearly all of Alcott's series, and I think them the loveliest stories ever published. I also love Martha Finley's
"Elsie Books," and Dr. Gilber's Inquiries, and other stories. I am twelve and a half years of age. My papa is a professor of music. I could say more, but I am afraid that my letter will tire
you. With love, REGINA H.

I can not promise to publish in the Post-office Box a story or composition which I have not seen, but if you will send the "Autobiography of a Gold Dollar," I will read it with pleasure, and if it is very good, and there is room—an important consideration—it will be one of these days appear. It is an honor to have a story in the Postoffice Box. The first steps toward becoming authors are being taken by some of our little contributors in just this way.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I like Howard Pyle's stories very much. I am a boy twelve years old. I was born in Chicago, and went to live in Maryland before I was three months old, and I am now living in Brooklyn. I read the Bible and the Holy Scriptures, and play, grammar, composition, reading, drawing, etc. I see that your correspondents nearly all tell about their pets, so I will do the same. We have a cat fish and a water lizard, and feed them on Shepard's food. The cat fish likes this, but the lizard does not seem to eat it; he is fond of flies.
He is about two inches long, including his tail, and evenings, when we have the globe on the table, he comes out and travels all over the table, and our books too when we are studying, all the time. He likes to hold up his long tail, and looking very funny indeed. WALTER E. M.

ADALBERTO, GREENFIELD, NEW SOUTH WALES.

DEAR POSTMASTER.—I am ten years old, and like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, so I thought I would write a letter and tell you about our pets. There are four of us—live at home and two at school. Four of us are taught by a governess, and when we come out of school I like to go and play with the cats, and the dog, bunnies, some pretty white rats and pet lambs, and I have a Shetland pony named Rodger, which I like best of all. Mamma will not let us have birds, but she lets us go to the woods to study sometimes, and often have a drive in the buggy with papa and mamma. I like living in the bush, and I like to go to the woods for rides and lots of pets. I hope you will print this letter, as it is the first I have written you.

MAY MCX.

This dear little letter was penned by the patient little fingers on the fifteenth day of last August.
Think of the little girl who has done so well, and wish that our little friend had told us more about them and their ways? I do, for one.

CHESTER VALLEY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I live in Chester Valley, near York, Pa., about eighteen miles from Philadelphia. Mamma reads me the stories in my paper. I enjoy them—especially the fairy tales, they are so funny. I have two pets, a black-and-tan dog named Prince, and a pussy named Mally. I have a pony named Daisy. I am only eight years old. I go to school; I can read and write and do some other things. I have a letter of mine appear in print, so I do hope you will publish this. I am expecting to go to Virginia to see my father, one from Virginia; we expect to have a job-time. I wish you, dear Postmistress, a very Merry Christmas and a happy New Year. Good-by.

HARRY W. D.

Thank you very much, and the same to you and the cousins.

FOUR OMAHA, NEBRASKA.

I thought I would write to you as I have never done so before. I think if you're a Young People is a perfectly beautiful magazine, and I do not know what I should do without it every week. I think that "Two Arrows" is very nice, and Howard Fyfe's pictures and stories are very funny also. I am eight years old. The place where I live is a very pretty military post, with about four hundred soldiers.

DADO E.

DAVES POINT, SEBEE, NEW SOUTH WALES.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have been called "Harper's Young People" for six months. I like it very much. I like those stories about Mr. Thompson very much. I have two cousins which I like to lay, two boys and one girl. I have four brothers, two of whom are married; their names are Charles, Arthur, Willie, and Ossie. Arthur has two baby boys. I have one sister, who is married, and lives in Melbourne.

OLIVE MAUD B.

SILTON, SURREY, ENGLAND.

I am a boy ten years old. We have just bought a bound volume of Harper's Young People. I like our pet's Manchester Terrier named Charlie, and papa has just given me a little piggyon; it has no mate, so I am going to make a pet of it. I have not been very well lately, but am getting better now. I go to school when I am well, and study spelling, grammar, geography, history, Latin, and French, and I do short-hand at home. I am very fond of games, and am always ready to read about them. We do not have any coasting here in winter. I have a Waterbury watch.

SABNEY P.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

I look HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in 1880, and had it bound. It has been a source of great delight to all my cousins as well as to myself. I remember that I had had it, but not the volume of Young People for amusement. A friend gave it to me for a birthday present, November 22; so I am very glad to read in stories of my dear old year. I enjoyed "Friends at Last" so much, and also "Brightie's Christmas Club." I intend making some things like those. I am fourteen years old and play with dolls. Do you think me too old for dolls? With great regard, I am

ISABEL R.

Not at all.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

In answer to Mabel S.'s question about the Nicobar Islands, I will say that they are a group of islands in the Indian Ocean northwest of Sumatra, and forming with the Andaman an extension of the great Island chain of which Java and Sumatra are the principal links. They are divided by the Sombora Channel into two groups, of which the principal ones are Great Nicobar and the Little Nicobar. The inhabitants are not numerous, are said to resemble the hill tribes of Formosa. The soil of these islands is fertile, and the cereals and other crops grow abundantly.

Thank you, George.

GYPSY LOIS.

They had thought over many names for it, but they had not decided on any yet. It was a sledg which Robert Smith and some of his fellows had made for winter. It was now autumn. The boys met in Mr. Smith's barn twice a week to consider about it. Just at this time a troop of gypsies came into the neighborhood, and pitched their tents in a field. The caravans went about the streets, and some gypsies went to houses with baskets and bowls to sell. One little gypsy girl went to Mrs. Smith's house with some pretty baskets. She was a nice girl, with dark, brilliant eyes, and a wistful, timid look, which you could not but pity. The merchant who opened the door at her knock, bought a basket Mrs. Smith also came to the door, and pitying her, asked her what she was called, in her own language. "Lois, ma'am; Gypsy Lois," and encouraged by Mrs. Smith's kind look, she continued, "That was my mother's name; she is dead now—and another friend told me," and she showed them some braises on her arms.

Rosie Smith, having come to the door, said, "I suppose I'll have a basket to get flowers and fruit in, mamma."

So mamma bought Rosie one. Mrs. Smith then sent Lois to the kitchen, and told Jane to give her some dinner. When she had finished, Jane took her to Mrs. Smith, who, meanwhile, had been looking up some of Rosie's old clothes, which she gave to the gypsy girl.

"Who takes care of you?" asked Rosie.

"I mostly takes care of myself, but granny looks after me too."

The child then went away. A few days after, a gypsy caravan to Mrs. Smith's house, and asked her to come and see. She who had been knocked down by a FIDELITY HORSE Mrs. Smith went, and found her in great agony. She had been run over by the horse. Every day Rosie and Mrs. Smith went to see her, and took her fruit and flowers. The gypsies had to go away. Mrs. Smith promised to take care of Lois and the other children, and to give them a good education. Soon after the gypsies had left, Rosie went to the hospital, and found that Lois had gone to her mother. They were all sorry, for they had been to love the little gypsy; even Robert was interested in her. She was buried where she had wished, in the green field where they had camped. At the house, the children, as usual, told the story of Lois. They all agreed to name the sledg Lois, which means "better," and whenever the Smiths look at the name it reminds them of the little Gypsy Lois.

ARTHUR A.

SHAWWA, CALLED, CHERBURGH, ENGLAND.

LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

In looking over the letters in the Post-office box the other day, I saw a letter from Ada B. S., and she asked if some one would like to do Kensington painting. I will do so with pleasure if she will send me her directions. I belong to a literary club. Every Friday evening we three other girls and myself meet at my house, and read Miss Abbott's, Mrs. Lillie's, and other good books. While one reads, the other two work at their needle, and sometimes I sing. I had a "crandy-pail." If any one would like to know how to hammer brass, I would like to teach him or her very much.

NANCY.

Rosa A. P.: Piper is a pretty name for a pet bird. I am glad you and Nellie have good times at school. Never whisper during recitations. Write to me when you would not do such a thing.

Laura H. G.: I am glad you had a birthday party. What a merry-making I might have if, on my birthday, I could ask all the Post-office box children to come and see me. As I fear I never can have all at once, and I could not possibly leave anybody out, I shall not be able to have a party.

Janie R. W.: Why is it that many of us are good girls? I am glad you have one. A boy is never lonely if he has a faithful four-footed friend.—Thomas P. J. has two pairs of rabbits.—Marilla W. has a pair of many pets, but of them all her baby brother is the dearest.—A. R. W. has been very ill, but is better now.—Bessie M. I send the list of your missing numbers.—Messrs. Harper & Brothers, and they can probably supply you with them, unless you wish some of the earliest numbers, which are not in stock.—Several Little Correspondents: Covers for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, all ready for the binder, will be sent to you by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, on application, at 25 cents each, or 50 cents by mail.—A. A. B., Katie W., Gertrude W., Maud B., and E. H. Willis, P. P., Nellie B., Alfred J., Floy E. F., Winifred P., C. V. H., Edwin H. S., Walter B. A., Harry D. S., Harry C. C., Harry G. three Harrys in a row, and Howard H. B.: Thanks to all of you for your letters.—Hattie B.: You do not yet write well enough to receive payment for your stories.

Perhaps if you study hard, and take pains in the way of preparation, you may one of these days write as Mrs. Little and other famous authors do. George R.: Address simply, Home for Destitute Children, Brooklyn, New York.

Will the children who send puzzles please remember always to send the answers with the puzzles.

Exchanges are reminded to be brief, and also are requested to state first what they wish to exchange; second, what they wish to receive in return for their articles; and then, at the close, not at the beginning of the exchange, will they kindly write their names with their full post-office address?

TWAS THE NIGHT AFTER CHRISTMAS

A CLEVER PUZZLE.

ONE would hardly believe, on looking at a lady's visiting card of ordinary size, that a hole might be cut in it large enough to receive a full-grown human head. Yet such is the case.

Take a card, or a piece of paper the size of a card, and with a sharp knife cut in it three lines as shown in the first diagram, taking care not to cut too close to the edges of the card.

Then fold the card lengthways, and with strong sharp scissors cut it thus:

Then open the card, which will appear thus:

Now carefully stretch apart the slender circle thus prepared, and if the incisions have been made sufficiently close together, the head may easily be passed through the hole in the card.

WISHING.

ONE day a lonesome hickory-nut,
At the top of a waving tree,
Remark'd, "I'd like to live in a shell,
Like a clam, beneath the sea."

And just at that time a clam observed,
"Way down in the tossing sea,
"I'd love to dwell in a hickory-nut
At the top of a lofty tree."

Thus both of them wished, and wished, and wished,
Till they turned green, yellow, and blue;
And that, in truth, is just about what Mere wishing is likely to do.

A HAPPY NEW-YEAR.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

COMING, coming, coming!

Listen! perhaps you'll hear

Over the snow the bugles blow

To welcome the glad new year.

In the steeple tongues are swinging,

There are merry sleigh-bells ringing.

And the people for joy are singing.

It's coming, coming near.

Flying, sighing, dying,

Going away to-night.

Weary and old, its story told,

The year that was full and bright.

Oh, half we are sorry it's leaving;

Good-by has a sound of grieving;

But its work is done and its weaving;

God speed its parting flight!

Tripping, slipping, skipping,

Like a child in its wooing grace,

With never a tear and never a fear.

And a light in its laughing face;

With hands held out to greet us,

With gay little steps to meet us,

With sweet eyes that entreat us,

The new year comes to its place

Coming, coming, coming!

Promising lovely things—

The gold and gray of the summer day.

The winter with fleecy wings,

Promising swift birds glancing,

And the patter of rain-drops dancing.

And the sunbeams' arrowy lancing.

Dear gifts the new year brings.

Coming, coming, coming!

The world is a vision white;

From the powdered eaves to the scree-brown leaves,

That are hidden out of sight.

In the steeple tongues are swinging.

The bells are merrily ringing.

And "Happy New Year" we're singing.

For the old year goes to-night

TWELFTH-NIGHT
REVELS.

BY AGNES C. SAGE.

A day of feast and frolic, Twelfth-Night, or Little Christmas, as the 6th of January is sometimes called, was formerly considered second only to Christmas Day itself. It brought the merry season to a close in fine and fitting style with a grand display of shining lights, frosted cakes, and gay revels. Young folks looked forward to Epiphany—which is its churchly name—with glad anticipation.

Then it was indeed a jolly, merry time, particularly to children and pastry-cooks, and the confectioners' windows were brilliant with manifold wax lights, and displayed such wonderful cakes, ornamented with the most delightful sugar devices, known as "subtleties."

Stars, castles, kings and queens, cottages, dragons, trees, fish, flowers, cats, dogs, churches, lions, milkmaids, fairy princes, knights, and pages, in snow-white confectionery, or painted with variegated colors, all found a place upon these Twelfth-night cakes, and attracted an admiring crowd around the shops, in and out of which the little street urchins delighted to dodge, and nail the coat tails of the spectators to the bottom of the window-frames, or else pin them together. Sometimes eight or ten persons would find themselves thus connected, causing uproarious merriment and laughter from those fortunate enough to have escaped, for this was a well-known Twelfth-day trick.

But the evening was the gayest time, when in many hospitable houses parties of friends met together to choose a holiday king and queen, and beneath their gentle sway, with game and dance and merry song, help speed the happy hours along. It was a pretty custom, and perhaps in this peep into the past my young readers may find some suggestions that could be happily introduced at their own parties.

At Twelfth-night gatherings the mammoth plum-cake and sweet wine are brought in soon after the arrival of the guests; and oh! what a fluttering there is among the girls, and what a giggling among the boys, as the frosted slices are passed around!—for hidden snugly away in two of them are the bean and pea that shall determine the chosen sovereigns of the feast. Black-eyed Rosie eagerly hopes that she will be the fortunate one, and shy Harry is afraid it may fall to his share; but both hopes and fears are quickly shattered as Gladys holds up the round dry pea, while at the same moment a shout from Rollin declares that what he thought but a shrivelled raisin is really the royal bean.

For as quaint old Herrick, the poet of the festivals, writes:

"Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake full of plums,
Where beans's the king of the sport here,
Beside we must know
The pea also Must revel as queene in the court here."

With mock pomp and ceremony, then, the little King of the Bean and Queen of the Pea are led out and crowned, and they reign supreme, directing all the amusements, until twelve o'clock proclaims the holidays at an end. The remainder of the company draw their "characters," which are written beforehand on cards and placed in a hat or bag. Some are maids of honor, some ministers of state; one may be Mirth, another Grief, and another Folly. Perhaps a tall Sophomore will discover that he has drawn the illustrious character of Sir Gregory Goose; and a little rolly-poly girl almost falls off her chair at finding that she is Lady Longneck Beaupole. This makes a great deal of sport, and according to Twelfth-night law each must try and keep up his or her part until midnight.

In the illustration the artist has shown us Gladys, or some other winsome little maid who has been so lucky as to find the pea in her portion of cake, and now, crowned Queen of the Revels, comes gayly forth to lead her frolicsome train of followers; and

"They come! they come! each blue-eyed sport,
The Twelfth-night Queen and all her court,
Tis Mirth, fresh crowned with mistletoe,
Music with her merry fiddles,
Joy 'on light, fantastic toe,
Wit with all his jests and riddles,
Singing and dancing as they go."

You may imagine what an enchanting time this maddest, merriest night of all the year was to the little folks of long ago, and how heartily they enjoyed their games of blindman's-buff, hunt-the-slipper, hot-cockles, and snapdragon.

In France the Twelfth-night Cake is plain, containing only a bean, the receiver of it being king or queen, as the case may be. In Normandy the good people consider the first slice of the loaf sacred. A child is placed under a table, covered with a cloth, so he can not see, and when the cake is cut, some one takes up the first piece, crying, "Faba Domini, pour qui?"

The child answers, "Pour le bon Dieu," and that slice is bestowed upon some one too poor to buy a cake. In the same manner the remainder is allotted to the company. Should the bean be found in the portion "for the good God," the king is chosen by drawing straws.

Royalty itself did not disclaim Twelfth-night sports, and on this festival, in 1610, Prince Henry, son of James I., then but a lad of fifteen, assisted by only six others, performed a feat of arms, in the palace of Whitehall, against fifty-six earls, barons, knights, and esquires, whom he had challenged to a trial at Barriers, fighting, it is said, "with wondrous skill and courage," from ten at night until three in the morning, to the great joy and pride of his father and all the court.

Young Henry, too, probably often assisted with boyish zeal at some of the curious feasts given about that time on Twelfth-night in the houses of the nobility. One that we find described in an old Cook and Confectioner's Dictionary must have been a perfect masterpiece of some artist in pastry.

On one end of the table was set a castle formed of cardboard and covered with paste, and having gates, drawbridges, and portcullises all complete, while the battlements were adorned with tiny paste cannons covered with gold-leaf, and actually charged with powder.

In the centre of the table stood a stag with an arrow in his side, as though he had just been shot. This was hollow, and filled with claret wine; and at the other end of the board appeared a gallant ship with masts, sails, flags, and streamers, and also manned with loaded guns. All three—castle, stag, and ship—being of pasteboard covered with pastry, while each was surrounded with salt, in which were stuck egg-shells filled with perfumed waters, the meat having been extracted with a large pin.

Two large pies also graced the feast, in one of which was concealed a flock of live birds, and in the other a number of frogs.

When the noble company was seated at table, one of the ladies was induced to draw the arrow from the body of the stag, which being done, the claret wine issued forth, like blood from a wound, to the great surprise of all. Next all the guns on one side of the castle were by a train discharged against the ship, which returned it by firing at the castle, and a miniature battle ensued, causing a great odor of gunpowder, to cover which the ladies and gentlemen threw the egg shells of sweet waters at one another. All this made a pleasant frolic and much laughter, but suddenly a Jack-Horner-like individual was moved to put his finger in the pie, and slyly lifted the crust of one of the pasties. Immediately one jumped the frogs, glad to be free, but making the ladies scream and run, while, when the other pie was opened, instead of the birds beginning to sing, up they flew right at the candles, and put out all the lights, and then what with the leaping of the frogs, the fluttering of the frightened birds, and the general laughing and scampering in the dark, a very diverting hurly-burly is said to have taken place.

We of the nineteenth century do not think so much of odd pastimes, and would hardly attempt anything so elaborate as this Epiphany feast of more than two hundred years ago, but the Twelfth-night parties with their rich plum-cakes, funny characters, King and Queen of Bean and Pea, and all their innocent enjoyment, might well be revived.

Some of our little English cousins may know something of these frolics now, and I hope Little Christmas may yet be kept on our side of the water, and each American girl have the opportunity of reigning a few hours at least as a Twelfth-night Queen of the Revels.

TWO ARROWS:

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE APACHES HAVE COME.

JUST as the sun was rising that morning, an altogether used-up horse came staggering into the awaking camp of the Apache war party. On the horse was a warrior who had been sent out with others on scouting duty the previous day, and he now seemed nearly as fatigued as did the animal he rode. He had strength for a whoop whose meaning startled all who heard it, and in a minute more it was understood by most of them that the horse had been so badly tired out by one arrow, and the brave by another; but they did not know of whom they were speaking when they gruffly remarked:

"Two arrows. Ugh! Nez Percé!"

The baffled scout was unable to testify to the presence of white men, although he could aver that he had retreated from several busy rifles. He had denied it his duty to ride back with his news and for another horse. It would be a good while before he could do much walking, and the horse which had carried him in must be abandoned, whether it should live or die.

There was nothing to dispirit such a company in the prospect of more plunder, many ponies and scalps, and an easy victory over a hunting party trespassing upon their acknowledged range. They did but eat breakfast more rapidly and push forward at once. The idea was yet strong upon them that they were pursued, but not one of their rearward scouts had come in, and a sense of false security had begun to creep over all but the very graying heads among them. Even of these not one dreamed how dangerously near was the steady advance of Captain Grover and his blue-coats.

It is an old proverb of sea-fighting that "a stern chase is a long chase," and it is nearly as true on land; but the cavalry had pushed along with steady persistency in a thoroughly business-like and scientific economy of time and horses. They were therefore in pretty good condition, men and animals. As Captain Grover remarked:

"I know how fast the red-skins can travel. They stole a whole grist of slow stock, and that measures their gait."

However swift might be their best, the Apaches had gone no farther any day than the slowest half-dozen of their plunder. Captain Grover was therefore almost justified in a firm conviction he expressed that morning:

"Now for it, boys. We'll be among 'em before sunset."

On pushed the cavalry with enthusiasm, but at the same hour the Apaches were also pressing forward with increasing eagerness. They were no longer in one body. All their drove of stolen quadrupeds and their own superfluous ponies made up a sort of rear-guard, driven and cared for by about a dozen of the less-distinguished braves, with orders to make as good speed as possible. The remainder of the force, full of whooping and yelling and a great hunger for glory and ponies, rode forward to find the Nez Percé.

They had hardly ridden an hour when the foremost warriors made the air ring with whoops of wrath, and in a moment more the word "pale-fire" was passing from rider to rider. They had found the victim of Sile's marksmanship, and the fact that he had not been scalped put away the idea that he had fallen before a Nez Percé. The trail of the two horses leading away to the left was plainly marked and could be followed, and there was no reason for special caution in so open a country. The trail before them led in the precise direction indicated by the brave shot by Sile, and the presence of both Nez Percés and pale-faces in that valley was of itself a sort of enigma. Word was left for the rear-guard to halt at the spot where the body lay until rejoined by the main force.

The garrison at the notch was ignorant of all this, but while the house-builders toiled at their wall with undiminished energy, Long Bear sent out several of his best braves to scout around as far as might seem safe, and there was no danger of any surprise. There was one effect of all this even now to be seen in the sides of that stone wall. Windows had formed a part of the original plan, of course, but not nearly so many shot-holes.

"You see," said Jonas to Yellow Pine, "if any hostiles should ever make out to git inside the notch, this 'ere 'd be the best kind of fort. Them holes are all big enough to poke a muzzle through."

"We'll have a stockade some day," said Pine. "And we'll put another down at the gap, reg'lar fort fashion, with a gate and loop-holes."

Just then a whoop rang out from the braves at the gap, and was followed by a chorus of them.

"I'd call it!" said Pine. "Knock off work, boys. Time's come."

Not quite; but a brave had ridden swiftly in with notice of the approach of the Apaches, and all the other scouts were fast following his good example. The first whoop had been given by the Big Tongue from behind the largest rocks of the barrier, but he was soon calmly walking up and down outside, as if waiting for the whole Apache nation, and also ready to be admired by somebody. One eye was also beyond the barrier for some reason, but he came in at the call of Two Arrows. There was no danger but what the Big Tongue would come in without any calling.

Na-tee-kah and Ha-ha-pah-no had done very little that morning but recite to their Nez Percé friends and relatives the wonders of their visit in the pale-face camp, and exhibit their rich store of ornaments and other presents. They had also combed and brushed each other's hair in a way that excited no little envy. They were yet busy at it when the voice of the Big Tongue was first heard at the barrier, and every squaw knew what it signified.

"Two Arrows," exclaimed Na-tee-kah, "has rifle now; kill heap."

"Big Tongue great brave," said Ha-ha-pah-no. "Shoot mouth; 'Pache heap die."

The horses, mules, and ponies of both Nez Percés and miners were all driven by the squaws away up the notch under some trees, to be as secure as might be from stray bullets, if any should be fired. The squaws themselves were generally very willing to be as safe as were the animals; but Na-tee-kah's dusky cheeks were almost red with excitement. In spite of all prohibition, she broke away from under the trees, and darted off toward the rocks on the side of the notch opposite the mine. It was only a minute before Ha-ha-pah-no followed her, with no idea of bringing her back, whatever she said to the rest on starting.

"See fight. Squaw shoot too some time. Na-tee-kah heap brave."

Na-tee-kah did not utter a sound until she had gained a spot behind a huge boulder, from which she could peer out and down, and see what was going on at the barrier and beyond it. She felt well paid for her trouble. The braves of the Nez Percés were all there or behind the rocky fragments on either side, and mingled with them here and there were the red shirts and slouched hats of the miners. The Big Tongue was no longer parading over the slope in front of the gap. He had even cut short an uncommonly fine whoop in his retreat to a place as safe as that occupied by Na-tee-kah or Ha-ha-pah-no.

There were excellent reasons for such a retreat, for several scores of Apaches were now riding back and forth, just out of good rifle range, as if they were a little in doubt as to what they had better do next. Not an Apache among them had an idea how many might be the rifles among those rocks, but all were sure that they were there. It was just as Jonas had said, and Yellow Pine. It required an immense amount of courage to ride up to hidden sharp-shooters, and the Apaches were disposed to whoop a good deal before they tried the experiment. Their head chief had commanded that there should be no random firing, and now he was disposed to try what could be done with a "talk." One solitary brave rode forward a distance in advance of his comrades, dismounted, laid down his rifle and lance, took off his pistol-belt ostentatiously, held up his hands wide open to declare himself unarmed, reached out his right hand with the palm up to show that he was peaceful, and then walked slowly forward.

"Wants to get near enough to see what he can see," said Yellow Pine. "Snake trick. I'll go out and meet him, Jedge."

"No, Pine; I don't want you to run any risk."

"Risk? Not a bit of it. I say, Jonas, I'll let him come into good fair range. Keep him covered. If he tries any bad game, I'll just drop flat."

"That's what he'll do next thing," said Jonas, as he rested his rifle over the log in front of him, and it seemed as if every other miner at once followed his example.

"Go ahead then, Pine," said the Judge; "see what he wants."

"For that matter, Jedge," said Pine, "I'd as lief as not try a hand-to-hand fight with any red-skin in that lot."

He left his weapons behind him as ostentatiously as the Apache had done, handing them back over the barrier after stepping out, and walked forward rapidly, so that he did not let his conference turn into too close an "examination."

The keen eyes of the warrior were searching every cranny of the rocks as well as they could, when Yellow Pine drew near and held out his hand.

"How?" said Pine.

"How? Where Nez Percé?"

Pine answered by a sweep of his hand toward the notch, and added, "'Pache chief want pony? want scalp? Go other place. Too much heap shoot; kill 'em all."

SEÑOR GIACOMELLI'S PERFORMING BIRDS.

BY HENRY HATTON, MAGICIAN.

I.

THE first performing birds that I remember to have seen were exhibited about thirty years ago by Signor Blitz, an old-time magician, at the Stuyvesant Institute, a small hall in Broadway nearly opposite Bond Street, best remembered, perhaps, as the birth-place of the Young Men's Christian Association. If money-making be an evidence of success, Signor Blitz was eminently successful, for at his death he left no little property; but as a performer, whether magician, ventriloquist, or bird-trainer, he scarcely deserves mention.

Since those days I have seen many "troupes" of trained birds, but the best, by all odds, was the property of Señor Giacomoelli, who, despite his Spanish-Italian name, and the fact that he affected a most marvellous dialect, was a full-blooded Irishman, whose name was John (Jack) O'Malley. I first met him on the stage of a "museum," and was much impressed by the surprising cleverness of his birds, but it was not until "our acquaintance had ripened into friendship," as the novelists say, that I induced him to teach me the secrets of his business.

And how he did try to humbug me! I had great curiosity to know the methods practiced, and as no amount of coaxing seemed to have any effect, I finally offered to pay liberally for instruction. But O'Malley was a long-headed fellow, and believing that the less known about his business the better it was for him, he tried by every means in his power to put me off. With the most innocent expression on his face he would look me straight in the eyes and assure me. "It's nuthin but patience and perseverance, me dear boy, that does it."

But I was not to be put off so easily, and I kept begging and coaxing and trying to bribe him, until finally he said, "Come to me rooms next Sunday, an' I'll tache ye the whole-a-ert an' mysthry."

In accordance with this invitation I made my way to O'Malley's rooms on the appointed day. The fellow lived in a decent neighborhood, and his tidy and well-furnished room was in direct contrast with the unkempt, slovenly look so often to be seen in the habitations of "show folk." In a large cage were his nine birds, not by any means enjoying a Sunday rest, for as I entered the room their owner, as he informed me, was "just puttin' 'em through their paces."

As I wanted to be sure that he did not impose on me, I had invested fifty cents in a female bird, which I took with me. I was all eagerness, but my Irish friend talked of everything but birds, until at last, unable to restrain myself further, I blurted out that I wanted to begin with the business that brought me there.

"Well, all right, me boy," said O'Malley; "begin we shall."

Taking up a light stick about twenty inches long, he put it through the open door of the cage directly in front of one bird. The little creature at once stepped on it, and remained perfectly quiet while its owner brought it out. The first thing he did was to give it a seed which he took from his waistcoat pocket.

"Now-ah, Bijou," he said, unconsciously assuming his professional dialect, "show-ah ze geetelmaans how nice-ah you can-ah walk-up-ah my 'an'."

He held the little finger of his left hand toward the bird, which immediately stepped on it, and then passed from one finger to another until it reached the forefinger, thus, as it were, going up a flight of stairs.

The effect was very pretty, and I was delighted.

"Now, then, back to your cage," he cried, making a slight movement of his hand, and the bird at once flew where it was directed.

"That," continued O'Malley, "is about the fast thing I tache a burrd to do, an' it's a little trick that allus plazes the public. Simple as it seems, you might howld Bijou on one finger for a whole day, an' sorra a step she'd take. It's all in knowing how."

"And what is the secret of it?" I asked.

"Aisy, me boy, aisy!" exclaimed Señor Giacomelli in his richest brogue, which, however, I will henceforth leave to the reader's imagination. "You'll know it all in good time. But as I see you have brought a bird with you, I'll just show you how I can handle a creature that I've never seen before to-day."

Going to the little wicker cage in which I had my bird, he removed some of the bars and put his hand inside. The little prisoner flew wildly about, very much frightened, but he caught it in a second and brought it out. He put it to his mouth as if to kiss it, but suddenly exclaimed, "Ah! that's too bad; I've murdered it entirely." And holding out his hand, I saw the bird lying there motionless, and to all appearance dead.

I naturally supposed that either the rough handling or the shock had been too much for the captive; but a comical expression on O'Malley's face showed me that he was poking fun at me. "I must see what can be done," he said. "Come, young lady," he continued, "get up and have some seed." Then a momentary pause. "No? Well, I must see what fright will do. Here comes the cat!" he cried. All to no purpose. "Here's a cop!" he shouted, and the words were no sooner out of his mouth than the bird, which till then had remained motionless, gave a little jump and flew off about the room.

"Aha!" laughed O'Malley; "that's a country bird: a city one would not be so afraid of the police."

I was fairly astonished. I had seen him exhibit his birds on the stage, and knew that they did many pretty things, but here was something I could not account for. I always had a faint suspicion that drugs of some kind were used, but now I was convinced that I was entirely wrong, for I watched him narrowly from the moment he approached my bird, and I was satisfied he used nothing of the sort.

"How's that for animal magnetism?" triumphantly asked O'Malley, and I confess that for a moment I did believe that it was the result of hypnotism or some other ism. "Well, I'll not keep you in suspense any longer," he said, to my great satisfaction. "As for my first lesson, I'll begin with your bird, and teach you how you or any one else can do just what I did with this or any other bird, no matter how tame or how wild it may be. It's all in the way you handle it. You must know, then—and mind every word I say—that if a bird is laid on its back, it is perfectly helpless, and will remain in that position for almost any length of time. If, in addition, its head be brought down lower than its body, or, better yet, its head and tail be both pulled down, so that its entire length forms a sort of an arc, so—"describing this figure on paper with a pencil—"the bird seems to lose all consciousness. Whether or not the rush of blood to its head causes this I don't know, but it's so, all the same. Now when I took hold of your bird I grasped it with my fingers crossing its back, so that by simply turning my hand the creature would be thrown on the palm of my hand, and be on its back. As a bird will sometimes struggle, I rendered its wings comparatively useless by wetting them well with my tongue when I pretended to kiss it. As to jumping up when I told it the cop was coming, why, I gave it a gentle lift to help it to recover itself and bring it to. And that's the whole secret of dealing with a strange bird. But it's only a trick that's useful to impose on inquisitive persons, and is as far different from real bird-taming as is A from Izzard."

As I was naturally incredulous, I tried the experiment myself, and though somewhat awkward, succeeded the first time, as any of my young readers will if they follow literally what I have described. What he told me further I shall reserve for my next paper.

THE MAELSTROM.

BY ERNEST INGERSOLL.

WHEN I was a boy, twenty-five or thirty years ago, I used to read in my geography, with a kind of shudder, of an awful whirlpool, called the Maelstrom, off the coast of Norway, which sucked in vessels that came anywhere in its neighborhood, and out of whose mysterious centre nothing could escape alive. What is the reality on which this story was founded? Dr. C. C. Tiffany takes pains to tell us in a recent account of a trip to Tromsø. This: "It is the one humbug of Norway. It is simply a dangerous current at the south end of the Loffoden Islands, between the islets of Moskenes and Varoe. When the wind blows from certain quarters, particularly from northwest, and meets the returning tide in the strait, the whole sea between Moskenes and Varoe is thrown into such agitation that no ship could live in it. In calm weather, however, it is crossed in safety three-quarters of an hour before flood-tide. What gives it the name and appearance of a whirlpool is that the set of the tide is changed at its different stages by the narrow limits within which it acts. Its movement is at first toward southeast; then, after flood-tide, it turns from south toward the southwest, and finally toward the northwest; so that it takes twelve hours to complete the circle of its movement. Rather slow motion for such a fast character as a whirlpool."

THE CHORISTER OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

BY D. T. S.

IT was upon one of the dreariest days of an unusually cold winter in London that the lovely Lady Grace Derrington wrapped herself in costly furs, and leaving the warm fire burning brightly in her cozy sitting-room, went out into the chill November fog.

Walking at a quick pace along Piccadilly to Regent Street, she turned toward the Duke of York's Column, and descending the long flight of steps beyond, skirted St. James's Park, and soon came in sight of one of the most beautiful and impressive groups of buildings in the world, the Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey—that venerable old stone pile where kings and queens have been crowned in all the pomp and majesty of power, where monarchs have been brought to trial and condemned to an ignominious death, and where crowned heads once all-powerful now lie crumbling into dust, even as the lowliest of their subjects.

Passing under a stone arch, the lady crossed Dean's Yard, and continuing through a narrow gateway, found herself in one of the poorest and most miserable of the London districts—Tufton and Runney streets. Here, within a stone's-throw of the lordly cathedral she had just left, were wretched wooden hovels not worthy the name of houses, where human beings, more wretched still, were crowded together in the most abject poverty. Ragged and unwholesome-looking children played in the dirty streets, or fought each other with sturdy fists, and language shocking to the Lady Grace's ears. The fog had thickened, and it was almost dark when she pushed aside a half-open door of a high, rickety, tenement building.

"Well, Mrs. Ray, you see I did not forget you," was her cheery greeting, as a faded, weary woman came toward her, hushing a crying child who clung to her skirt.

"No, my lady, I felt sure you would come, although the fog and the cold is so bad. I'm sure it's very good of your ladyship to take so much trouble for the likes of me."

"Can you let us have a little light, Mrs. Ray. The days are so short now and the fog so thick we shall never be able to see what we are about. Tell me how you have been, and how the baby is."

"Dying, I think, my lady; he is that had I feel sure he will never last the night. Hark ye! there is Willie singing to him; it's all that keeps him quiet, poor lamb."

The lady listened, as from the next cramped partition, called by courtesy a room, came the sweet clear tones of a boy's voice, singing with strange pathos the words of a popular street song, to which his music brought tenderness and beauty. It was a curious scene. The fast-closing darkness was dimly lighted by a tallow dip held by the faded woman, meagrely and poorly dressed, whose careworn countenance was in strong contrast to the bright, listening expression of the beautiful Lady Grace, clad in her warm, rich furs; a few coals gave out a faint light which played upon the face of the most unchildlike child, who was quiet now, gazing with wide-open eyes at the visitor; everything was poor and miserable save the bright presence of the lady, and that pure young voice as it sang to the dying babe.

"Who is Willie? You never told me you had another boy."

"No, my lady, and he is not my boy; he only lives at the top of the house. His father was a bricklayer, who was killed falling from a scaffolding, and his mother died, just worn out, so he's alone."

The sweet voice sang on, as in droning tones the woman told the boy's pitiful story, and a tear dimmed the lady's eye as she listened.

"I will go and see the baby; perhaps we can do something for him yet." Saying which, Lady Grace went into the inner room. The singing ceased, and the sick child gave a feeble wail of pain. Then the boy Willie was sent for milk and bread and sundry other things, whilst the lady herself took the poor little wasted form, and hushed the baby tenderly, as though it had been her own rosy, laughing boy at home. For nearly an hour she remained in this comfortless abode of poverty, cheering the weary mother, and giving food to the little ones; then, with a promise to come again, she took the boy Willie with her through the chill, cold streets, where the lamp-light blinked through the yellow fog, and before reaching Dean's Yard she knew all his simple history—how, alone in the world, he toiled and worked that he might live honestly, and how he sang to the children "to keep the cold out, and make them forget how hungry they were." Again in the darkness tears glistened in Lady Grace's eyes, and bidding the boy follow her, she led the way to the low door at the entrance of the cloisters, and knocking, asked if the Dean was at home.

Lady Grace Derrington was a great favorite with the dear old man who at the time I write of was the honored Dean of Westminster, but who now lies in the still sleep of death beneath the stones of Henry VII.'s chapel in the grand old Abbey he loved so dearly and served so well, leaving to those who mourn his loss that rarest of gifts, the record of a good and noble life.

Whilst the boy Willie forgot the cold of his cheerless home in the reviving warmth of the Dean's kitchen, where he revelled in a supper such as in the course of his short life of grinding poverty he had never dreamed of, the helpful woman whose own lines in life had been cast in only pleasant places was admitted to the Dean's study, where in a few rapid sentences she told him of the little waif she had found singing in the tenement-house, and in shorter time than it takes to write it, the choir-master of the cathedral was sent for, who consented to try the boy's voice the following morning. If he found it to be as good as Lady Grace thought it, the child would be housed, clothed, and cared for, and taught to sing in the Abbey choir.

Mr. Barton, the choir-master, was not very enthusiastic over the boy when he heard that he had been picked up in Tufton Street, that most unsavory locality not being a favorite part with him. His practical experience of choir-boys, moreover, had not taught him to look upon them as little angels in disguise, however lovely their voices might prove to be, and he was still in a state of irritation and annoyance caused by the fact that his most promising singer, the one with whom he had spared no pains, and for whom he had formed the very highest hopes, had coolly run away upon the very morning of the day when a special service was to be held, in which he was to take the principal solo parts. The printed programmes had to be hastily altered, and ordinary chants and anthems sung instead of the selected arrangement so carefully chosen, and every part of the musical service had been disarranged and spoiled by the ungrateful conduct of a boy possessing an innocent baby face and a perfectly angelic voice.

But Lady Grace had her way. The little waif from Tufton Street was comfortably clothed and cared for as a choir-boy of the Abbey, and his lovely voice and quiet, steady conduct won even Mr. Barton to an interest in his future.

And now life began anew for Willie, who in his little surplice walked daily in procession with the white-robed choristers of the grand cathedral; sometimes in the morning, when the sunshine threw long shafts of light along the marbled pavements, and touched with its radiant beams the heads of the marble poets and heroes already crowned with earthly glory; and again when the fading western sun came in mellowed tints through the stained-glass windows, and the solemn tones of the organ peered through the dim and shadowy aisles, as the pure, sweet notes of the boy's voice floated up through the fretted archways, until it died softly away in the distance beyond.

The child loved his work, and did it well; whilst his was a busy little life, with not much time to call his own, yet he never forgot the little ones in the rickety tenement-houses, and more than once, when Lady Grace was on her missions of love to the poor, she found her young protégé singing to some fretful babe, or hushing the moaning of a sick and hungry child with the sweet music he had learned at the Abbey. Many people heard of the boy chorister, and strangers came to listen to the marvellous voice which seemed to grow more beautiful every day.

"THE SINGING CEASED, AND THE CHILD GAVE A FEEBLE WAIL OF PAIN."

Mr. Barton was proud of the rapid progress made by his pupil, whilst Lady Grace was very pleased to think that she it was who had discovered this wonderful singing-bird, whose fame was spreading through the great London town. The boy's devotion to the lovely lady who had brought him all this new and beautiful life was very deep and sincere. He longed with all his grateful little heart to do something for her; and when he heard at Christmas time that her own young son had been taken ill, Willie wrapped himself carefully in the warm comforter which had been given him to protect that valuable singing throat of his, and walked through the cold snowy streets to the handsome house in Belgrave Square where Lady Grace lived; and when the powdered footman answered his timid knock, the child shyly asked him to tell her ladyship that "the chorister at Westminster Abbey—she would know which one—had come to see if he might sing to the baby." And he did sing to the little rich child lying in its white cot in the warm, cheerful nursery, just as he had sung to the dying babe upon a heap of rags in the dreary tenement building, whilst the little one smiled and cooed at him before it fell into a refreshing sleep.

The new year was almost come, and the choir-master made the boys work hard in practicing the hymns and chants and anthems for the New-Year service. Willie was chosen to sing all the solos, for none of the other boys had such a lovely voice as his; and day after day the little fellow would stand in the glorious Abbey, whilst his voice floated pure and true adown the pillared aisles and beneath the Gothic arches, the only sound in all that vast edifice, save the softened organ accompaniment. The child's heart swelled as the music rose higher and higher, seeming to pierce the arched roof and reach up to the God in heaven whose praises he sang.

New-Year's Eve now, and Willie came again to the house in Belgrave Square, this time to leave for Lady Grace a song he himself had made, and which Mr. Barton had written out for him. A roll of carpet was stretched down the steps to the carriage which waited before the door, and Willie knew that his "beautiful lady," as he called her, was going out.

Lady Grace was wrapped in a long white cloak quite covering her rich evening dress, and the boy thought nothing on earth could be so beautiful as she was, the lovely woman who had changed all his life, making it comfortable and happy. What could a little chorister do to prove that he thanked and blessed her for her goodness to him?

The thought had hardly passed through his mind when a horse and carriage dashed into the square from a side street. Lady Grace's brougham was just in front; in a moment the runaway might strike her carriage or frighten her horse, and then—

The boy did not hesitate an instant, but catching the loose, hanging rein, he pulled with all his childish strength. It was a slight check to the frightened animal, stopping it just long enough to allow a passing policeman to come to the boy's assistance, and seize the horse's head; but in the confusion the child himself fell, and was trampled upon by the kicking, struggling brute.

Lady Grace was safe, but the boy was dead. Inside his cap was written, "Willie Stone, chorister of Westminster Abbey"; and so to the choir-master's house in the Abbey Yard they bore the little mangled form. No solos were sung at the New-Year's service; only a chorus of sound arose where one pure young voice should have filled the old cathedral from marble floor to vaulted roof; but who can say that the little chorister did not chant his New-Year anthem with a purer, holier choir—in heaven?

SHE IS COME TO SPEND CHRISTMAS WITH US—AND I'VE GOT THE BUCK.

THE MINISTER'S BARREL

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS

II

THE night that Mr. Dunbar came home bearing with him so much disappointment was an important event in Rex's life. Never had he known so keenly his own helplessness as a boy of thirteen, nor so ardent a desire to be a man. To be a man, and punish evil doers; to be a man, and make the world go right; to be a man, and espouse the cause of all suffering humanity; to be a man, and live in his young breast as he lay and gazed at the moon out of his garret window, where "I ought to be a man to-night," they twinkled serenely upon his sleepless eyes. How his heart ached as he pictured again to himself his father's weariness and disappointment; how he felt his grief, and Mary's look of woe, and how soft he knew what it all meant!—discomfort, hard work, suffering.

Who could have been so mean and cruel as to cheat them out of their long-looked-for supplies? He thought and thought until the stars waxed dim, and uneasy dreams tormented him, and then he awoke, with a start, to find Polly sitting on the bed beside him, saying,

"It's dreadful late, Rex, and papa's got a chill, and Mary wants you to come to breakfast."

"And then go for the doctor, I s'pose."

"Yes, I s'pose so," said Polly, whimpering dismally.

That was the work before him, and he must do it; but he wondered if, after he had been for the doctor, he could not make some effort to discover who had stolen their goods. He would try, anyway. And he did try, though his father was ill for a week, and could give him no help. He went from house to house, far and near, making inquiries, trudging most of the time on foot, and coming home with a heavy sense of failure. But the day before Christmas his face looked brighter, and he said to Mary:

"Can you spare me till real late, Moll? I've got a clew, and I'm going to borrow Mr. Packer's horse."

Mary looked anxiously up from her sewing, saying, doubtfully: "I wouldn't go far if I were you, Rex; it's snowing already, and I don't believe there's any use. Father thinks that by this time everything has been sold, and the barrel burned up."

"Father's tired out with all his trouble and sickness," answered Rex. "I sha'n't give it up yet. But if Em's worse—"

"No, Emily's no worse," said Mary, hurriedly. "That's not why I don't want you to go. But I depend so much on you, Rex, and I'm afraid the storm will increase."

"Oh, it's just a flurry; I don't mind that. Good-by. Tell Polly to have the lantern lighted at the gate, and who knows what I may bring home?"

Poor Mary sighed hopelessly; but just then the feeble little voice to which she always paid so much heed called out: "Come here, Mary, and talk about Emily Grafton. I want to send her a Christmas present."

"What shall it be?" said Mary, smiling as cheerfully as if the wealth of the world were theirs to choose, and kissing the snow-drop face.

"Oh, something wonderful—a poem, I think. Listen; I've been trying to make some rhymes." And then she recited in a chanting, queer little way some words about a friend who a letter did send, and her eyes were like stars through prison bars, and she wished her love could be a dove, and whisper in her ear, "Merry Christmas, my dear."

It was pitiful to see the child's weakness, but Mary forgot all lesser things as she cheered and soothed and whiled away the time which would, despite all they could do, frequently drag heavily.

Meanwhile something was occurring which would have made even the tired sister's eyes unclose could a vision of it have come to her in her dreams.

In the course of his many inquiries and persistent search, Rex had heard of some one who had seen a barrel with his father's name on it, and this person had directed him to a little cluster of frame houses in the same town which boasted of an express office and a railway station. These houses were on the outskirts of the town, near the railway, and were not of an inviting aspect. Indeed, the reputation of those who lived there was far from good; but Rex's impulse was too strong for caution, and his courage was greater than his wisdom. It seemed to him, also, quite impossible for any one to refuse to give up peaceably a thing which did not belong to him, when once this fact was proved. So, riding up in the dim twilight of the short and wintry afternoon on the back of Jack, Mr. Packer's horse, to which was harnessed an old drag wood sled, he dismounted at the gate of one of these tumble-down houses and boldly made his way to the door.

"Arrah, an' what do ye want?" asked the slatternly woman who answered his knock, peering at him in a pig-gish, indifferent way.

"I want to see Pat Rafferty, if you please," answered Rex, politely.

"Misther Rafferty's not to be sane for the plazin of the loikes of ye, I can tell yez," said the woman, slamming the door in his face, and grumbling loudly at the cold air which had come into the house. Judging from the waft of rum and onions which had saluted Rex, the cold air ought to have been welcomed, but as it was not, and as he could hardly venture to re-open the door, he turned to a big lounging boy of his own age, and asked where Pat Rafferty was to be found.

"Mostly over yonder," was the reply, as the boy pointed to a low drinking saloon.

"But are you sure he is not at home now?" said Rex, somewhat baffled by these disagreeable replies.

"I ain't sure of nothin'. What do you want, anyhow?"

"I want to see Rafferty on business."

"Oh," said the boy, waking up and looking quite interested, "I'll do as well; I'm his son."

"And I'm Mr. Dumbar's son. Do you know Mr. Dumbar?"

"No; never heard on him."

"Not the minister over at Greenfield?"

"No."

"Well, I've come to see if your father can give me some information about a barrel which has gone astray."

"Indade," said the boy, contemptuously.

"Yes," said Rex, suddenly warning up and stalking over to a shed which had once been a barn, but which now could hardly be called by so respectable a name, "and if you've no objection I'll just go in here for a moment and see what I can find."

"You won't do nothin' of the sort," said the boy, coming after him; but Rex was too quick, and had flung the door open.

"Objections or no objections, I'm going in," he said, and made his action suit his words.

"Come out of that, you —," howled the big boy; but Rex was in, and pulling down a pile of straw which hid a lot of lumber in a far corner of the old shed. A quick gleam of satisfaction danced across his features as he saw a barrel top with Rex R. Dumbar in black paint on its surface; but his satisfaction was but momentary, for in another instant the big boy was pounding him and belaboring him with his big fists. "Take that for bein' a mane, snakin vagabond!" he cried; "and that! and that! and that!" and all that Rex could do was to dodge the blows. Fortunately for him, he was quick and lithe, and his antagonist was heavy and slow. But there was now nothing before him but to get away as speedily as possible. Literally fighting his way out to Jack, he would have been unable to mount him had not his antagonist stumbled and fallen as they reached the gate.

The cries had now brought to every door and window a crowd of dirty faces, more or less angry. Quickly and dexterously unharnessing Jack, Rex left the old wood sled to its fate, and got on his horse—not a moment too soon, for from the adjacent saloon came a big brawny man, who shook his fist at him and showered abuse upon him. In his excitement Rex turned the wrong way, and in a short time, blinded by snow, he was completely bewildered. Night dropped down suddenly, and here was our young friend, in all the cold and stormy darkness, miles away from home, and in danger of being overtaken by the desperate and wicked people he had so willfully enraged.

Rex's thoughts were not pleasant. He regretted having been so fool-hardy; he knew Mary would be anxious and his father displeased, and he was getting very hungry; but, on the other hand, there was the barrel, and who could tell but that its contents might not yet have been disturbed? And then with a pang he thought that now the thieves would have warning and time to dispose of it. He could have cried with vexation as this thought came uppermost, but just at this moment Jack's hoof struck something. Yes, it was the railway track, and by following it he could soon come to some landmark.

But the snow was getting deeper and deeper, and he had much difficulty in making his way. Presently to his quick ear came the jingle of bells; then he saw a twinkling light drawing nearer and nearer. He must be cautious now; so, dismounting, he drew Jack aside, and stood with shivering eagerness to see who might be approaching. A sound of soft voices, a merry childish laugh, the bark of a little dog—surely these could not be his pursuers!—and he ventured nearer. He could now see a large sleigh with four horses, and a man beside the driver holding a lantern.

"Sleigh ahoy!" shouted Rex, as if it had been a ship.

"Hello there! Who are you?" was the answer.

"A boy in distress," answered Rex, as well as his chattering teeth would allow.

"Stop!" cried a voice muffled in furs, and the sleigh drew up.

Rex went to its side, and told his story in as few words as he could put it.

"What is your name?" asked the same soft, muffled voice.

"Rex Dunbar."

"You don't say so! Reverend Mr. Dunbar's son?"

"Yes," said Rex; "and if you can put me in the way of getting home, my father—"

"Don't say another word. Get right in here; there's plenty of room. Why, child, you're half frozen! Jane, Emily, this is Rex Dunbar. He's been looking for that lost barrel, and found us." And then Miss Grafton told Rex that his father was her youngest brother's chum at college, and that Emily and she were going on a Christmas visit to Mr. Dunbar's house; that the train had broken down on account of the snow, and she had hired a sleigh, and absolutely needed Rex to show them the way.

But Rex had to explain more leisurely, and Jack had to be tied to the sleigh, and the boy was so utterly spent that, had it not been for the anxiety they all knew would possess the family at Greenfield, Miss Grafton would have asked lodgings at the nearest farm-house. As it was, her indignation was so great that she drove into the town, got a search-warrant from the justice of the peace, and after Rex had been given some supper, went at once to the Rafferty's.

Great was the consternation when the constable marched in upon the squalid huts and demanded the minister's barrel, and great was Rex's joy to find that the precious barrel had not been opened.

Miss Grafton, with her active city ways, would have had Pat Rafferty and his son arrested, but Rex begged that his father might decide that matter, and in view of its being Christmas Eve, Miss Grafton waived her wish to punish the evil-doers, and contented herself with having the minister's barrel fastened on the wood sled, and a man hired to drive Jack.

It was nearly midnight when Mary was aroused from a deep sleep by Emily's calling her.

"What is it, dearie?" asked the elder sister, remembering with a pang that Rex had not come home.

"Hark! I hear Christmas bells," said Emily, sitting up among her pillows; "and look, Mary, the stars are all shining."

"You are dreaming, my love," said Mary, pushing aside the curtain to see Polly's lantern giving but a feeble glimmer at the gate.

"But it has stopped snowing, and I do hear bells," persisted Emily. "Yes, they come nearer and nearer."

"Oh, is it a warning?" cried Mary, to herself; "are the Christmas angels coming for my sister Emily?" And then she strove to hush the excited girl.

"Go to sleep, my darling," she whispered, clasping her in her arms.

"But I do hear the bells, Mary; they are coming—oh, so near! Is it not sweet music?"

"It is indeed," said Mary, now hearing for the first what the child's keener ear had detected so much sooner, and on the still cold air the sleigh-bells rang out merrily. With a relieved heart, Mary took Emily to the sitting-room, and stirred up the dying embers on the hearth. She had no sooner done so than a loud cheery call of "Merry Christmas!" from Rex, and a curious mingling of strange voices, with the stopping of the sleigh and the barking of a dog, saluted her. Mr. Dunbar came hurrying from his room in his dressing-gown, and Polly and Tom in their night-gowns stood like little spectres in the doorway, as Rex came in, followed by Miss Grafton and Emily and Jane and Jip.

"Here we all are, father and Mary—here is Miss Grafton, who says we are all friends of hers, because she loved Aunt Polly, and she is come to spend Christmas with us—and I've got the barrel!"

It was all somewhat bewildering, and there was need of rather more explanation, but Rex seemed to think he had said all that was necessary, and Emily Grafton had at once discovered Emily Dunbar in the big arm-chair, and had knelt beside her and kissed her, and put Jip in her lap, before the elders had found words to express themselves; but Miss Grafton was not long in making herself known, and had Polly in her embrace, telling her she looked like her aunt, and asking Mr. Dunbar if he would ever have given his child such a queer name had not his sister Polyanthus been the sweetest girl that ever lived.

It was a merry party indeed when the tall clock struck one, and they all shook hands, crying, "A happy Christmas!" And it was hard to get them all to go to bed, and much ingenuity did Mary show in stowing them all away for what remained of the night.

In the morning the barrel was opened amid much rejoicing, and to its contents Miss Grafton added substantial gifts, and before the day was over she had induced Mr. Dunbar to consent to her placing Rex in a good school, and to letting Emily visit her in the city long enough to receive the best of medical treatment.

"A happy Christmas we have had, indeed!" was Mary's comment, as they all gathered about the glowing fire in the twilight, and she looked with loving admiration upon the glad little faces about her. The two Emilys were in one big chair, telling stories to each other; Polly was putting three or four small dolls to sleep; Tom, in his father's arms, was already dreaming of the wax cherub which floated over the beautiful tree in the corner; and Rex was holding worsted which Miss Grafton was winding.

"Yes," said Mr. Dunbar, in response; "we were like tempest-tossed mariners on a troubled sea when Miss Grafton came to our rescue with her Christmas deeds of loving-kindness."

"Thank you," said Miss Grafton, simply and sincerely; "but you must not forget our little letter-writers, nor Rex's bravery, nor Jane's warm sympathy."

"No, indeed," said Mary. "Nothing of this Christmas shall ever be forgotten."

When the holidays were over, Rex went to school, but he had the satisfaction of knowing that the Rafferty's had as they were, had said "he was no coward, if he tears a minister's son." Their wretched hovel had burned down a few days after his encounter with them, and Mr. Dunbar thought them sufficiently punished. As for the two Emilys, they became inseparable friends, and the last combination letter they wrote reported Emily Dunbar to be as well and strong as Emily Grafton.

A BABY QUEEN.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

ON the 25th of November, 1885, the great royal palace of the Prado, in Madrid, the capital of Spain, was a scene of mourning. Early in the morning of that day Alfonso the Twelfth, King of Spain, died.

Although ten years have passed since the Spaniards acknowledged Alfonso as their ruler, he was still a very young man, being only twenty-eight years old when he died, leaving his throne and crown to his oldest daughter, a sweet child of five years, who frolics in her nursery and plays with dolls, like all other little girls, but who,

QUEEN MERCEDES OF SPAIN.

for all that, is Maria de las Mercedes Isabella Theresa Christina Alphonsina Hyacintha, Princess of Asturias and Queen of Spain.

The baby Queen Mercedes, the name by which she is known, was born on the 12th of September, 1880. Her child life has been very happy. She has a baby sister, the Infanta Maria Theresa, born in 1882, and the Queen-mother, Christina, is the most loving and devoted of parents, caring nothing for the regal pomp and display by which she is surrounded, and never so happy as when fondling and caressing her children.

Alfonso, the kindest and wisest King that Spain has possessed, was also an affectionate parent. The people of the great city of Madrid saw no prettier sight than when, on sunny afternoons, the royal family took a drive along the avenues of the Prado, the youthful King bowing and smiling in answer to the greetings of his people, the Queen, with her sweet, placid face, and the two baby Princesses laughing at the sunshine, too young to feel any cloud which might be gathering in the treacherous atmosphere of Spain, and which did gather at times, throwing a shadow of anxiety over the faces of the young King and Queen.

Spain is not an easy country to govern. The people are restless and hot-tempered; many of them desire a republic. In 1868 they drove Queen Isabella the Second, the grandmother of baby Mercedes, from her throne, and forced her to fly from the country. Then the people tried to form a republic, but there were too many ambitious men among them. There were insurrections and revolutions, and poor Spain was torn in pieces. Her people are not as intelligent as the people of the United States. They do not understand that liberty must be sustained by wise and just law. So, after more than six years of confusion, the nation called Alfonso, the son of Queen Isabella, to sit upon the throne of Spain and become their King.

Surrounded by rivals and a restless, fickle people, the lot of the baby Queen of Spain is not one to be envied. Far better to be any one of the bright-eyed readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, with a kingdom of loving hearts, than to stand in the place of this tiny Queen. But little Mercedes knows nothing, as yet, of the trouble and sorrow which the future may hold for her. Until her education is completed, and she is old enough to understand her position, her mother, as Queen-Regent, will assume all her daughter's royal responsibilities and duties. The Queen Christina was, before her marriage with Alfonso, an Austrian Princess, living in studious retirement in the ancient city of Prague. She is said to be a woman of firmness and wisdom, one who will keep the hearts of the Spanish people faithful to her young daughter, if such a thing is possible.

And while the young Castilian maiden dances through the sunny days of her unconscious childhood, the world looks at her and remembers all the strange events connected with the great throne of Spain, which has now fallen into her baby hands. From this throne, upon which at that time sat Ferdinand and Isabella, Columbus went forth in 1492 to discover an unknown country beyond the western sea; and to the same throne he returned, a year later, with golden trophies, dark-skinned natives clad in fantastic costume, and wonderful tales of the strange land across the ocean, as a reward for which Isabella, stretching out her royal hand to the bold adventurer, bestowed upon him the title of Admiral and Viceroy of the New World.

After Ferdinand and Isabella, by whose marriage the four separate kingdoms of Spain had been united, came their grandson, Charles the Fifth, King of Spain and Emperor of Germany and Austria. He reigned for forty stormy years, and at last, worn out with many wars, he retired to a monastery, resigning his Spanish crown to his son, Philip the Second, the most cruel and merciless of all the Kings of Spain.

The great palace of the Prado, where Alfonso died, was built by Philip the Fifth. It is one of the most magnificent palaces in the world. It contains the elegant private apartments of the royal family, a gorgeous throne-room, and a museum where may be seen the armor worn by Charles the Fifth, his son Philip the Second, and other Spanish monarchs, besides many other treasures of a royal past.

The little Queen is the mistress of other magnificent palaces. The most celebrated among them all is the Escorial, which has been called the eighth wonder of the world. This great palace, which stands upon a hill twenty miles from Madrid, was built by Philip the Second, and in a small chamber of the vast building this wretched King died.

Under the high altar of the chapel of the Escorial is the great royal vault where the dead Kings and Queens of Spain lie buried. Charles the Fifth, Philip the Second, and other royal dead are here. And here, too, only a few weeks ago, was carried the body of Alfonso. It was laid to rest by the side of his first Queen, Mercedes, a fair Spanish maid, who died after a short married life of six months, and in whose memory the baby Queen received her name.

Maria de las Mercedes is a beautiful name for a Queen. Its true significance is Our Lady of Mercies. Let us hope that God will spare both life and crown to the young Queen, and that she will prove a true Lady of Mercy to long-suffering Spain!

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.

By LUCY C. LILLIE.

Author of "Nan," "Rolf House," "etc."

The new serial story, the title of which is given above, will begin in the next number.

In "Jo's Opportunity" Mrs. Lillie deals with entirely new characters. "Jo" is a girl in very poor circumstances, and surrounded by evil influences. The story shows the awakening in her of nobler aspirations, and the development of the good that lay hidden under a rude and defiant manner.

The story is as fascinating as anything Mrs. Lillie has written, the characters being lovable and life-like, the change of scene frequent, and the movement continuous.

The illustrations will be by Mr. W. T. SMEDLEY.

OUR POST OFFICE BOX.

HARPER, IOWA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I wish to give the readers of the Post-office Box a sketch of a nutting party this fall in which I took part. As you all know, at the present time the country is overrun by a certain little animal called the field mouse, belonging to the family of rodents. It is a very small creature, cute and cunning in its ways, but very destructive to all kinds of grain. In the fall of the year, when cruel Jack Frost has stripped the trees of their foliage, and the nuts lie on the ground, this little being prepares himself for winter. First he selects a small clump of hazel, hickory, or under which to build his house and store his winter supply. The house consists of three apartments—one to sleep in, one to place nuts, etc. in, and one in which to put the shells when the nuts are eaten. The first apartment is connected with the outer world by a passage large enough to admit free access in case of emergency; this apartment is connected with the second by a similar path, and the same with the third. In winter, when the ground is covered with snow, and the field mice can not force themselves out, the third room is used to put the rubbish in. The field mouse has a warm, cozy nest, composed of dead grass, chaff, and he can live underground as comfortably as we do on top in our houses. It has certain faults leading from all directions to his house, over which it travels. The ground is generally heaped up around or on top of his house with the dirt which it displaces while building. The way we proceed on our nuts was this: We dug all around the clump of hazel and pulled it away, and the nuts lay before us, ready to be picked up. Some nutting parties gathered as many as twelve bushels in one day in this manner. I thought a pity to rob the poor little animals, but by spreading the damage they do on our crops, I relieved my conscience in that way. My mother thought it a great wrong; so you see—

I confess, Master Harper, that when I read your account of the care and ingenuity displayed by the field mice, I wondered how you boys could have the heart to plunder their painfully gathered stores. I look at it from your mother's, not from the farmer's, point of view. It really seems to me that it would be less cruel to kill the mice at once, if they cause much injury to the crops, than to rob them of their provisions and leave them to starve. Why could you not go out with poles and pails, and collect nuts yourselves, shaking them from the trees where they grow? That would be a better way, and there would be more fun in it, I think.

ESKPORT, MIDDLESEX, ENGLAND.

I am a girl of twelve years old. My mother is the kindest in the world. There is one girl who said she wrote to our dear Princess of Wales, and as I love her very much, I would be very much obliged to the young lady write if she would write to me at Haydon Hall, Veimer. She also says my name is C. Edwards, and I am a girl, and tell me about her letter. My favorite authors are Mark Twain, Charles Dickens, Mrs. Lovett Cameron, and Florence Ward. I will tell you a little adventure we had at the seaside once. It was a fine day, and my father and a grown-up cousin were going for a nice row on the sea, so I asked if I could come too, and father said I might. After we had been in the boat a little while, he asked me if I would like to go back, while he and my cousin should go on without me. However, I wanted to stay; and I did. My brother was out too. Soon we saw a little sail far away, and my father knew it was my brother, and he didn't like him to sail, so we rowed out to him. It was getting cold, the waves were getting big, and the wind was blowing, but still father was afraid my brother would meet with accident; so out we had to go, and at last we reached him. Then the tide had turned, and we could not row in, so we had to sail very slowly, and we got back late.

C. E.

This bright little bit of verse tells a true story, and comes from Walter L. Lawrence, Kansas:

Two little nibblers out at play
 One a child November day
 Teddy, sturdy, stout, and fair,
 With a self-right air;
 Edna, full of gentle grace,
 With a sweet and tender face,
 Auntie of the cold takes note,
 Brings for her darling out a coat,
 Buttons him up tight and snug,
 Turns to Edna, whose slight form
 Shivers in the frosty air;
 "Aren't you very cold, my dear?"
 "Best run home and get your cloak"
 Edna starts with anxious look,
 Looks to leave her playmate dear
 But on her cloak's good cheer,
 Walks a little way, so slow,
 Then turns back, her face aglow,
 Quickly bounds to Teddy's side,
 "Best run home and get your cloak"
 "Teddy will put his arm round me,
 Then I shall be warm," says she.

NORTHVIEW, PENNSYLVANIA.

This city, the capital of Pennsylvania, is a very pretty place in summer, but now, as Nature has adorned her winter garb, there are no pretty flowers nor green leaves visible. We are all looking forward to Santa Claus's visit with pleasure.

LOUISE E.

TOKIO, JAPAN.

I live in Japan. My home is in Koto, but now I am in Tokyo. The other day we went to a chrysanthemum show. The chrysanthemums were all arranged in figures in pretty little Jaranese gardens. These figures were in all sorts of shapes; some were in boats, some men, women, and children, and some animals, and cats without tails. We paid two cents to go into each little garden, and after seeing about ten of them we rode home in junks, boats, or carriages pulled by men. There is much more I could tell you about both old and strange in this country, and if you like this letter, I will write again.

KATHLEEN B.

Do so, dear. We had a chrysanthemum show in New York in the autumn, but it was not so fancifully arranged as the one you saw.

COOYQUIN, TULSA, IRELAND.

I have been receiving this charming paper for some time, but have never yet written a letter to it, so I hope this will be permitted to you and the west of Ireland. I do not suppose many people would choose to live there in its present disturbed state. My father is a landlord. We attended church in a neighboring town about five miles off. A few Sundays ago it was the scene of a Land League meeting; a platform was erected nearly opposite the cathedral, and we could hear the rain beating now and then during service. Church over, we drove home on a car. After some delay, we met two bands on our way, and the way was rather crowded, and we returned home in safety. I have a gray cat, and my youngest brother has a dog, which are our only pets. I often play lawn tennis in summer; being the youngest girl of a large family, there are nearly always some one to play with. I am also fond of skating. It must be joy in America, as sometimes the ice was run over by the crowd, and we seldom have enough of either frost or snow to enable us to sleigh. I hope this letter is not too long, and that there will be room for it in the Post office Box. I saw some letters from English girls, so I thought I would write too. Jimmy Brown's stories are awfully good. Also I like the little pictures at the end of the paper.

CHRISTIE L. S. F.

SOUTHBRIDGE, IRELAND.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have seen HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE at the house of one of my friends, and I like it very much; I like reading the Post-office Box so much that I thought I would like to write a letter to you. I have three sisters and two brothers; their names are Susan, Mary, and William (ten years), Eva (six years), Sam (three years), and baby (10 months). I have for pets a pony, two cats, two dogs, two rabbits, and a goat. Our dog is named "Cue" and is a very nice dog, and is a black and white one; they are very tame, and will come to me as soon as I call them. I suppose you think a goat is a very queer pet to have, but I got mine when it was a tiny kid, and now it is a very large goat; I am very fond of it. I study French a little, but I fear I am very deficient in it. I would be very glad if one of your little French friends would correspond with me. I am very fond of fancy work, and sometimes do it for mother. I am doing some mirror lace at present.

I like to hear of a little girl who employs her fingers so well.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a sick little girl ten years old. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for several years, and I like them very much, and write soon again. I have not been to school, because I am ill, but I have a great many books I want to paint, and I have read the books. I sit up in bed and paint the pictures. All my drawings are painted, and I think they look very nice. I never had a letter in the Post-office Box. I hope you will print the letter, and I would like to have a boy because my name is Clifford; I am named after my father.

Clifford is a very pretty name for a girl; so are Sidney and Stanley, both which names I have known girls to bear. I hope this little girl will soon be well again.

SALAH, NEW JERSEY.

We read Loyd and Barton's letter in the Post-office Box, and as we are twins, we thought we would write too. We are girls, and we shall be eight years old on New Year's Day. We do not look much alike, although we both have blue eyes and light hair. If we were Loyd and Barton, we would cross our hands to cut our hair right off, for fear the boys would call us "cut hair" on New Year's Day. We are learning "Bob's Petition" to recite on Christmas Day. We have a pet rat named "Tommy" and we want to make a stocking for him to have this winter. We are going to make him a stocking to hang up with ours on Christmas Day. We do not want to write on a piece of paper. "Kris, this is our little's stocking," and we shall pin it fast to the toe. We love to read the little letters in the Post-office Box, and this is our very first one to you, and we hope you will print it. Good-by from MADGE and NELLIE.

NEW BRITAIN, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little boy eight years old. I think "Rolf House" and "Two Arrows" are so good. I like to go to the Model School, and am in the highest class in my room. I have one pet, a little kitten named Billy. I have put a red ribbon with a bell on it around his neck, because it everywhere he goes. My sister has a jaggy named Don.

Your little friend,

ARTHUR C.

Does kitty wear a bell to let the nice know he is coming? No, you'd do the frisky little prowder thing, you—a kind boy, and admire your cat extremely.

Little Kate S., nine years old, wrote the story which follows while her mother was ill, and she had to amuse herself in some quiet way.

LILY'S CHRISTMAS TREE.

Lily Brookes came down-stairs on the 21st of December with all her best clothes on. She was going to town with her mother. When they opened the door they found, to their surprise, that it was sprinkling.

"Oh dear," said Lily; "now we can not go!" "Wait and see," replied her mother. "I think it will soon clear off."

Lily waited, and in about half an hour little patches of blue sky began to break through the clouds. Soon the rain stopped. Then Lily's mother said, "Come, we will go now."

They had to ride in the cars to the city. Then they went first to a toy store, where Lily bought a ball for brother Dick, a tin wagon for little Arthur, and a match-stick for papa. As they came out of the store, Lily saw a little girl looking into the window. She had a ragged shawl thrown over her head, her dress was in tatters, and her shoes had holes in them. Lily's mother felt sorry for her, and asked her where she lived. She said she lived way down at the other end of the city, in a very small and dirty flat that had no name. Her father was ill, her mother took in washing, and there were six children. Lily's mother gave her a piece of money, and she went in to buy a couple of different sized bears. Then they did some more errands, and Lily's mother bought a great deal of cloth and some shawl shakies of different shades. Lily couldn't imagine what for. But when Christmas night came, and brought a Christmas tree with it, who should come to the door but the girl Lily saw by the store window. She had come with her brothers and sisters. They took home a great basket of clothes and nice things to eat, and Lily thought it the best Christmas she had ever had.

THE SHADOW OF A VISTA.

"Oh, Edith dear, won't it be splendid fun to drive to London and spend the week with Cousin Laura?" cried little May Newton to her sister.

"I hope you will find it so," replied Edith. "As for me, I shall not be with you."

"You will not go to London?" said her brother Arthur, looking up from his book in great surprise.

"No; I expect to do something better than going to London. What do you say to the Zoological Gardens?" said Edith, with a smile.

"You don't mean to say you are going there?" asked May, with whom are you going?"

Edith replied, "The Vintons are going to-morrow, and I think they will stop for me on the way to the city. You said, 'We must take you with us some day.'" "Oh, if that's all, I think you had better go with us to London," said Arthur. "You know how disappointed Aunt May will be if you do not come."

"Well, I don't see what it matters to you whether I go," said Edith, snappishly.

"But, Edith dear, you know we have to have you with us, and we always have such fun at Cousin Laura's, and she will be so disappointed if you do not come," said little May.

"Oh, won't you come, dear?"

"Cousin Laura will have to excuse me for just this once," said Edith, "for I do so long to go to the Gardens; and I am sure, if you knew, she would wish me to go. Mamma said I might return at home if I wished, so I think I will stay."

"At breakfast the next morning the girls were all eagerly chatting about the anticipated pleasures of the day.

"I hope you are to be one of our party," said Mrs. Newton to Edith, as she entered the room.

"Oh, mamma, I think I will stop at home just this once," said Edith.

Edith grew very impatient as the time went on; she almost thought they were not coming. Presently there was the sound of wheels; the carriage was just appearing near a turn in the road. "Oh, they are coming! they are coming!" she cried, as she clasped her hands with delight. But, alas! the carriage did not stop for poor Edith. She watched it until it was out of sight, and then burst into tears.

"Oh dear! why did I not take Arthur's advice, and go to London? What a miserable day I shall have! I can't bear to think of it. What a nice little Arthur and May are! How they love me! I wish I were with them! Well, I must make the most of my disappointment," said Edith to herself. "What shall I do? I will make that dress for dear little May's doll, and the buttons for it, and I will study my lesson in the Testament."

Edith was wisely so busy with this work that she did not notice the flight of time until she heard the sound of her mother's carriage upon the drive.

"Oh, mamma is coming!" she exclaimed, as she ran swiftly down the garden-path to meet her. The carriage drew up before the door, and Mrs. Newton and the children alighted. Edith bounded forward and threw herself into her mother's arms.

"Oh, mamma! mamma!" she cried, "forgive me for displeasing you. I am sorry I did not take your advice and Arthur's, and go to London with you. I wonder what Cousin Laura will think of me," she added.

"What did you see?" Edith darling?" cried May, running up and throwing her arms around her sister's neck.

"What did you see?" cried Arthur, eagerly.

"I saw," replied Edith, with a contented smile, "that it is better to take things which are within our reach than wish for those which (as Arthur says) are but shadows."

This story is also from the pen of a little girl, and besides being well told, it contains a very good lesson.

WATFORD, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have one brother and one sister. We used to live in England before we came here. It is so very nice over there. I have no pets, but I should like a kitten very much. As it is so near Christmas, there are a great many secrets here. We are going to have a Christmas tree; I think that will be nice.

MABEL A. S.

I hope you had a kitten for one present, and found her curled up just under the Christmas tree.

FREE, NUBOURA.

I live in Peru, a very romantic little town on the bluffs of the Missouri River. The State Normal school is located here. I have a brother and sister attending the Normal. I attend the common school. There are many hills, and the fine sun casting.

HAPPY NEW-YEAR.

Ring out, ye merry New-Year bells,
Upon the frosty winter air,
And as your gladsome music swells,
May joy and peace be everywhere.

C. S. B.

HAVENBRAW, NEW YORK.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly a year, and when I have a year's papers I intend to get them bound. I live in the country, and go to school. I have four brothers and two sisters. We are all going to New York to spend Christmas with grandma. I am twelve years old, and I packed one hundred barrels of apples for market, but this year had not any.

JAMES F. F.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS, I am a little girl eight years old. To-day it snowed for the first time, and the snow was very deep. In the summer-time I am very fond of playing croquet. I am very fond of writing and reading, so I am always glad when HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE comes. I have been here in a large sleigh with horses, so they are very comfortable. I love to read, and which we all give money to buy a Christmas present for our teacher. I make my own Christmas presents myself. I live near Lafayette Park, and I am very fond of reading in the summer.

JOSEPHINE CYNTHIA C.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am eleven years old, and my only pets are a dog and bird. I had a little dog, but mamma said I must give it up. I have a bird named Dolly, and I like to play with dolls.

HELEN W.

Not at all. I like them very much myself.

ROME, ITALY.

DEAREST POST-MISTRESS,—Though I have taken your charming paper for ever so long, I have never er before written, so I hope this will be published. I am a little girl of eleven years, and am now traveling in Europe. I think it is so delightful—all the old ruins and beautiful paintings. We have travelled through Belgium and Holland, Germany and Austria, Switzerland, Italy, and France. I can speak French and German very well, and also some Italian. We are now in Rome, which is perfectly splendid. The Colosseum is very interesting, and St. Peter's is grand. I think "Two Arrows" is a good story.

MARGIE JONES II.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have a cat and a little grey kitten. I have a white one too. I have been sick with the rheumatism. I have three dolls, and a trunkful of clothes for them.

Your little friend,
BESSIE T. BAY.

The Post-mistress wishes the happiest of New Years to every little reader. She sends her very special thanks for letters which cost the writers careful searching for the Swedish Islands to Bertie R., Julie F., Katie S., Louisiana W., Walter J., Ethel S., R. O. Off, E. Allie C., M. G. E. Ball, M., Sallie F., Helen G., Eva D. M., and Thomas P. W. A letter giving the desired information to little Mabel, who inquired about the location of these islands, had arrived and was published before these came.

LAUGHING-GAS FANCIES.

BY R. K. MUNKITTRICK.

WITH this tooth I am about
Crazy all the day;
I must go and have it out,
Or I can not play.

I am not afraid a bit;
All will pleasant pass,
Soon in that red chair I'll sit
Taking laughing-gas.

Through a garden bright and fair
I shall gayly walk,
And among the flowers there
To the birdies talk;

See the pie-plant full of pies;
In them stick my thumbs;
Hear the drooping branch that sighs,
Full of sugar-plums.

I shall down this gardenway
Happy footsteps wend;
And when through the gate I stray,
At the other end,

I shall, in a dreamy way,
Learn the pleasant truth
When I hear the dentist say,
"Johnny, where's your tooth?"

CHARADE.

WHAT is my first?—It is your constant friend,
And many a message back and forth doth send,
Sometimes it swims; sometimes it seeks the ground;
Anon it takes a hook whereon no bait is found.
In daily service it is bright and skilled,
And none is at the needle better drilled.

Of suffering my second ever hints,
Whether 'tis found with peasant or with prince,
Woe to the wretch o'er whom it waves in air!
It symbolizes anguish and despair;
Each creature who its touching tale must learn
Will ever after shrink from its return.

My whole stands guard beside a temple door,
And sweeps and garnishes a crystal floor;
If e'er the temple is attacked by foes,
In great excitement up and down it goes;
To darkness it can add a deeper tinge,
And Beauty's garment decorate with fringe.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"I REALLY don't think you ought to do it, Faith."

Miss Justina Grace spoke from the parlor door. Faith was on the porch, and Jo, barefooted, ragged, sullen, and defiant, was swinging on the garden gate.

Now when Faith thought of Jo later she seemed to see her at different points of her career like so many pictures. This was really the first one, for while Miss Emerson had, as a matter of course, seen the girl's figure in the village, it was only when she was flying down some lane or roadway in pursuit of or from boys who had been tormenting her, or running to be first in the boat which the children of the place sometimes got possession of for an hour or two. Once when Faith was sailing and a fog lifted for a moment, she had seen Jo in the boat vigorously rowing to shore, but her chief impression then was of a pair of strong young arms, brown and firm, a rough curly head, and bare feet pressed against the board in front of her as the oars struck and rose from the water with masterly regularity.

But this impertinent little figure, coolly swinging on the gate, presented to Miss Faith Emerson her first definite picture of Jo Markham—a girl of perhaps fourteen, though not tall for her age (ragged and barefooted, as I have said), lifting from under an old straw hat a pair of gray eyes whose sullen stare made the saucy curve of her mouth seem a positively amusing contradiction. Wind and weather and all the suns of all the summers of her life had tanned Jo's skin to a healthy brown; and her rough locks seemed to have been tanned also, for here and there brown streaks showed in the darker masses. There was nothing pretty, nothing attractive, nothing even picturesque, about Jo, and yet Faith could not agree with her aunt's opinion.

"You can't make anything of her," Aunt Justina went on, in her placid tones. "It was foolish to have sent for the child. That was just like Kitty Barker." For it was Faith's friend, Kitty Barker, who had brought about this difficulty. At the tea table the evening before she had remarked:

"Faith, I do wish you'd look up that unfortunate little Markham girl. Bertie says he knows something might be done with her or for her. Do try it. She has resisted all the regular sort of Sunday-school people and things, you know, but it really would be worth while." And so, suddenly this morning, it had occurred to Miss Emerson to send for her.

"Just like Kitty Barker," proceeded Miss Justina Grace; "always discovering objects of charity for other people to attend to: but this child! oh, Faith, look at her now!"

For Jo, having taken off her tattered hat, was twirling and tossing it in the air, catching it with the greatest dexterity.

"Oh, Aunt Justina," said Faith, softly, and trying not to laugh. "I think I must try it."

And accordingly she went down the garden walk and deliberately drew the gate toward her, with Jo still on it.

"I'm glad you have come, Jo," she said, as quietly as though she had made her arrival known in the most dignified manner. "Will you come in?"

Jo stopped tossing her hat, but the only answer the young lady received was a defiant stare.

"Get down, my dear, and come with me," she continued, pleasantly.

Jo waited a moment, and then slowly descended from her perch and followed Miss Emerson at a slight distance, and with something still sullen in her manner, to the side entrance of the house. The store closets led off a narrow and pleasant corridor near by. Some wicker chairs were against each side of the wall, and as Jo hung back in the doorway Faith turned and asked her to sit down; but, although eying the chairs with evident admiration, she would not do it. The young lady disappeared into the cupboard, and returned with a plate of apples, a good-sized napkin, and two knives, and putting on her most hospitable manner, went up to the little ragged figure, saying:

"Suppose now, Jo, that you and I come out under that big tree there and eat our apples."

For an instant the expression of Jo's face changed to one of complete bewilderment. I have no doubt that sentence "eat our apples" was the cause. I believe Jo had never begged, but occasionally some charitable person had given her something, offering it as though they did it because she looked in such deplorable want, but certainly nothing like this had ever occurred before.

Miss Faith preceded her to that part of the old garden where the trees were leafiest, and the grass, if well shaded, is warm. There were always some old rugs lying about. One of these the young lady spread out, comfortably sitting down, and inviting Jo to do the same.

"Take a knife if you like," said Jo's new friend, in an ordinary sort of way, "or else eat your apple just as you like." She handed Jo a nice one. "I like mine peeled," she continued, beginning the operation, while Jo's teeth slowly fastened over a large bite, her eyes still fixed on Miss Faith. "It's easier to eat them that way."

Jo's teeth closed; the apple was very good, but it was clearly evident that the puzzling position she found herself in was what occupied her attention most.

"So you live with your grandfather, don't you?" said Miss Faith, not looking up. "Don't you, Jo?" for Jo had only nodded in silence.

"Yes'm," the girl said.

"I wish I had known you before," continued Miss Faith. "What do you do all day?"

"Oh, nothin'!"

Miss Faith did look up now, and laughed cheerfully.

"Why, you run about the beach, I suppose," she said, "and you go out in a boat sometimes; and don't you cook your grandfather's meals, and take care of his house?"

Jo nodded.

"Well, I think that is a good deal to do. I wish, though, you wouldn't run about quite so much, Jo, because I'd like you to come to a little school I have."

The defiance came back, hardening Jo's face again.

"Don't want ter," she said, shortly; "ain't goin' to do it. I know that school, I guess. Ain't you the one that has that little brown house upon the hill?"

"Yes," said Miss Faith, still cheerful. "Here, Jo, do you like a red apple best?" and the young lady held out a new temptation.

"No," was Jo's curt answer. "I ain't agoin' to no school." She made a quick movement to rise, and then added, "What did yer want ter see me for, anyhow?"

Miss Faith put the apples down and stood up, Jo following her example sulkily.

"Why, Jo," answered the young lady, "I thought I'd like to have a talk with you, and perhaps there was something you'd like me to do for you. Don't leave your apples. How many can you carry? I'll put them in a little basket for you. Let us go into the house."

As Faith accepted everything so completely as a matter of course, she carried Jo along with her against the girl's will, and a moment later, entering by the side door, the two were crossing a wide, dim, coolly matted hall, with pictures hanging on the walls, and a beautiful oaken staircase winding away to the right.

Up this Faith Emerson in her white gown went easily, Jo's bare feet following with a degree of slowness they had never known before. When, indeed, before had Jo Markham been known to show submission or fear or hesitation?

CHAPTER II.

"THIS is my room, Jo," said Miss Emerson, leading the way into her own beautiful room. Jane, Faith's maid, sewing in the window, started up in surprise; but then she well knew her "young lady's" ways with the poor. She knew enough to go quietly into the dressing-room, where in a moment Miss Emerson joined her, and a low-toned talk ensued. Jane went away, and presently returned with some garments, a trifle large, perhaps, for Jo's lithe though not tall figure, but far more suitable than the rags the child was standing in.

Jo hardly knew how the process of re-dressing her was carried on, but it was when she beheld herself in the long pier-glass so entirely transformed that her expression for the first time showed absolute satisfaction. The latent instinct of the woman's love of "brave attire" was roused.

Miss Faith rocked back and forth slowly in one of her pretty chairs while Jo's survey of herself lasted.

"Now, Jo," she said, "mind, I don't give you those clothes just to make you feel you must come to my little school, but so that you may have nice enough things to wear, and if you come up here to-morrow I'll help you make some other things."

Miss Faith paused a moment, struck by a sudden embarrassment in the girl's face.

"Perhaps," she said, "you would rather wear the old things home, and take those with you?"

"Yes'm," answered the little vagabond, promptly. She hesitated, and then added, "They'd be after me down there, and we'd have a row about it."

"Who?"

"Those yer boys, and that yer Sandy Martin." Jo paused. "He's the worst," she added, vindictively. "He gimme a black eye the other day, and I mean to pay him off; I do."

Jo pronounced Sandy's impending doom with a flash of her eyes and a tone that revealed much to Miss Faith.

Miss Faith apparently took no notice of Jo's rough speech. Her aim was to make the girl at home and free with her, reading in the keen young face before her a power of sullen reserve, a dogged self-will, that, once roused, would be hard to combat. So she only said:

"Well, then, Jo, you can go into that other room there and put your own things on, and this afternoon I'll bring down these to you."

A little later, from the dining-room window Miss Emerson watched the little figure flying down North Street, in the direction of the lower end of the town, and related some of her experience with Jo to her aunt.

Miss Grace was accustomed to her niece's independence of action and peculiar way of treating her pensioners, but Jo Markham was almost beyond her power of endurance. "Never mind, auntie," the girl said, laughing; "we'll see what a little humanizing can do."

Faith's carriage and ponies were well known all over the lower end of Ashfield, where she was acknowledged as a leader in many ways; for was she not young, independent of fortune, and blessed with as lovely a disposition as ever girl possessed? She and her aunt lived by themselves in the large old-fashioned family house on North Street, but there were constant invasions of young cousins or friends of all ages, one of the late Mr. Emerson's golden rules being that of generous hospitality.

No one wondered when Faith stopped at one of the meanest houses in Sailors' Row and knocked at the door. The young lady's figure was too well known in such places to occasion comment. A gruff voice said, "Come in!" and Jo's grandfather, a disreputable-looking old man, met her with what he intended to be a great deal of civility.

Jo hung back in a shamefaced way, while her grandfather thanked the "dear good young lady" over and over again, and blessed her in a fulsome manner for having taken notice of his granddaughter.

"She shall go to your little school, ma'am," he said; "I'll see to it she does."

Faith crossed the room to Jo, and in a low voice asked her to be at North Street early the next morning.

As she was driving down the wide village street rather slowly, a tall, bright-faced lad of about seventeen stopped her with, "Good-afternoon, Faith."

It was young Farnham, the "Bertie" referred to by Miss Barker.

"So you've done it," the boy said, with a pleased look—"actually taken hold of poor Jo Markham! Well, I felt pretty sure you'd do something."

Faith's eager assent was very pleasant to the lad. He thought her altogether the most wonderful person on earth, and was glad to be her right hand in any charitable project, however venturesome or hopeless.

He took the place she offered him beside her, while Faith related her experiences of the day.

"I've thought often and often I'd mention the girl to you," Bertie answered; "but I don't know how it slipped my mind. She is with such a rough set; but she is sure to be on the right side in any of the quarrels down in Sailors' Row. The other day she rushed into the middle of a fight, rescued a boy and a dog, and I wish you had seen the way she swept things to right and left of her. But there's a good sort of grit in her," the boy continued, "and you'll find it out."

TOMMY THE COW-BOY.

BY R. E. MUNKITTRICK.

"WHAT would you like to be, Tommy, when you grow up?" asked Mr. Miggs, turning to his son.

Tommy opened one eye, looked smilingly up into his father's face, and replied, "A cow-boy."

"You shall be a cow-boy," said Mr. Miggs, rubbing his hands; "but you are not large enough and old enough to be one yet. It would be too sudden a change to lift you out of the nurse's lap on to the back of a mustang. I am going to send you out to Benlow's dairy-farm, where we spent a month last summer."

"When can I go?" asked Tommy, eagerly.

"Just as soon as we can get you ready."

"I haven't a bowie-knife," pleaded Tommy.

"Never mind that," replied Mr. Miggs; "wait until you have reached that stage of your education that justifies the carrying of a knife. Besides, there are no dangerous characters about Benlow's dairy-farm; but if you want a knife just for the sake of appearances, Mr. Benlow will be happy to lend you his sickle to carry around, as he has no use for it when the ground is covered with snow."

That night Tommy Miggs dreamed himself a cattle king, walking haughtily around in a red shirt, top boots, sombrero, long hair, and a portable nickel-plated armory madly shining under his coat tail. He dreamed of flying across the prairie like the wind on a mad, impassioned steed, and being looked upon as dangerous, and avoided by the stranger.

On the following day he was proud-spirited, and would have little or nothing to say to his companions, and regarded him as one born under a lucky star. A day or so later he started for the dairy-farm with a light heart. It was not a great distance from the city, and Mr. Benlow was on the lookout for him, as he had received a letter from Mr. Miggs, instructing him to create in Tommy's breast such a hatred of cows that he would never after care for roast beef.

So when Tommy Miggs arrived, Mr. Benlow was at the station with a sleigh to meet him and drive him out to the farm, which was several miles distant. After they had gone a little way Tommy said, "I've come out here to learn to be a cow-boy."

"We'll make a cow-boy of you before long," replied Mr. Benlow. "Do you know anything about cows?"

"Nothing," responded Tommy, humbly.

"Well, we'll open your eyes on cows," said Mr. Benlow.

In a short time the sleigh drew up before the Benlow mansion, an old-fashioned farm-house, and Tommy was ushered into the parlor, dining-room, and kitchen at once, for these three rooms were in one at Mr. Benlow's.

That night Tommy Miggs's supper consisted of salt pork, a glass of milk, some potatoes, and a piece of pie. Although he was not exactly satisfied with it, he had the good sense to appreciate the fact that it would harden him for the rigors of cow-boy life if he could only outlive it.

At eight o'clock he went to bed in a large unplastered

"Just give each of the cows some hay," said Mr. Benlow.

Tommy did as he was told, being under the impression that he would next be asked to go out and lasso a bull. But he was made sick at heart when he learned that lassoes were not used, for the simple reason that every animal on the place would come when called, like a dog.

As soon as the milk was canned and sent to the train, the Benlows sat down to breakfast, which consisted of buckwheat cakes and coffee that seemed no stronger than ordinary hot water. The Graham rolls and the mutton chops of his breakfast at home would have been much more palatable, but he didn't grumble. While he was eating on in silence, Mr. Benlow said, "How is Carlo to-day?"

"Very sick," replied Mrs. Benlow; "and I don't see how we are going to work the tread-mill for the churning."

"Why," said Mr. Benlow, "we'll let Tommy run eight or ten miles on it. It will do him good and improve his wind."

So after breakfast Tommy walked on the tread-mill until he thought he would drop.

"We'll make a cow-boy of you before long," said Mr. Benlow, as he entered with a smile to see how the butter was progressing; "so cheer up, and don't feel homesick, for I have something for you to do that you may enjoy."

"What is it?" asked Tommy.

"It is to break a pair of yearlings to the yoke. We will yoke them and hitch them to a sled, and you can drive as fast as you like."

"That will be fine," said Tommy.

So after dinner the steers were brought forth, and yoked and hitched to the sled, upon which Tommy stood as a circus-rider stands on a horse, and started them.

"We'll make a cow-boy of you yet," rang out on his ears as the yearlings started off at full speed. First they darted in one direction, then in another. First Tommy was in the snow, and then back on the sled, for the yearlings jerked it in every direction, and pranced on their hind-legs, and whisked his hat off with their tails, and tried to jump fences and drag the sled after them. Tommy thought there was more snow inside of his clothing than there was on the ground, and when he was completely upset—in more ways than one—with the yearlings, he sat down in the snow and cried, while the yearlings seemed to melt out of sight over the rim of the horizon.

The Benlow boys, who followed, caught the runaways, and drove them home.

At four the next morning Tommy Miggs was altogether too sore to arise at milking-time. He was also too sore to go down to his breakfast. That night, to make a long story short, he was back home, and has not been away since. It makes him very angry when called Texas Bill, because he has given up his dreams of cow-boy life. Tommy is now studying book-keeping, with a view to entering his father's store. He wouldn't be a cow-boy if he could; and now the wax doll goes unscaped, the toy babies un-murdered, and the cats and dogs in his vicinity unlassoed.

TOMMY TRIES TO "BREAK IN" A PAIR OF YEARLINGS.

attic room, with no carpet on the floor, and lumps like cobble-stones in the mattress, and the windows rattling a perfect tattoo in the fierce winter wind that shrieked without. For a moment he thought of his little sister at home, asleep under a handsome crazy quilt and a roof that didn't leak, with her doll on the pillow beside her, and the nice nursery fire; but he banished this thought instantly, and fell asleep with a thought of gratitude for his rare good fortune.

He was awakened at four in the morning by Mr. Benlow's big boots, as that gentleman came in with a candle, and told him it was time to get up to do the milking and get the cans ready for the train. "We'll make a cow-boy of you soon," remarked the farmer, cheerfully, as Tommy rubbed his eyes.

Tommy arose rather reluctantly, for the bed was as warm as the room was cold, dressed for the day, and used the paper curtain for a towel. He had to blow on his fingers to keep them warm, and when he got out to the barn he was shivering.

TOM FAIRWEATHER AT PULO PENANG AND SINGAPORE.

BY LIEUTENANT E. W. STURDY, U. S. N.

ON the way from Bombay to the Straits of Malacca, Captain Fairweather stopped at Point de Galle, in the island of Ceylon, just long enough to dispatch his mail.

The ship was not at anchor more than two hours, but even that time was sufficient for the swarm of dealers in precious stones to surround her and display their wares. A few were allowed on board, and the quarter-deck soon looked like a bazaar.

There is always a great risk in dealing with these men, since they mix bits of colored glass with the real jewels they possess, and then ask fabulous sums for the "lots" they offer for inspection.

Tom, cautioned by his father, did not trust himself to make any purchases, but he learned afterward that others had been wofully swindled. These Ceylon dealers at one time thrived in their rascality, but nowadays they have such an unenviable reputation that strangers are slow to invest in rubies, amethysts, and sapphires which as likely as not were made in the glass factories of England.

The Neptune sailed across the Bay of Bengal into the Straits of Malacca. The first stopping-place was the little island of Penang, belonging to the English government.

Tom made this very natural remark: "It seems to me that a great many places belong to England."

"Oh, you haven't seen half of England's possessions yet," said his father. "Just here they have this island of Penang, Malacca, and the island of Singapore, and although these do not comprise any great area of land, they are very commanding positions, and as such are of course valuable."

Near the anchorage were to be seen fishing nets of the natives stretching from the shore far out into the water. With these are captured large quantities of fish, upon which the natives depend in a measure for their food. A novel and ingenious fish-trap is made by supporting a large net upon poles. Upon this is sprinkled a tempting bait, with the result that the fish fairly swarm there to feed. The net is at first under water, being placed in position when the tide is high. As the tide falls, the busily feeding fish are left on top, unable to escape. In this way famous catches are made.

Penang and Singapore are both curious places. It would seem that every nation on earth was represented there. This is especially noticeable at Singapore, which is a stopping-place for vessels from all lands.

The places resemble each other in so far as manners and customs are concerned. Besides the Malays and Christian foreigners, there are a great many Chinese engaged in thriving business. There are Christian churches, Chinese Joss-houses, Mohammedan mosques, and Hindoo temples; and in Singapore there are many fine public buildings.

In Penang, Tom Fairweather made his usual trips of exploration. He visited a wonderful mountain water-fall, one of the sights of the place, was entertained in bungalows, and was fortunate enough to see a very pretty procession on the occasion of a Chinese fête. Borne on litters, profusely decorated with figures and flowers, were gayly dressed little Chinese, some of the smaller ones being perched high on fanciful chairs of state. There were so many Chinamen that it was hard to believe you were not in their own country.

But there occurred something one day which proved to Master Tom that he was indeed in the land of Malays. He was sitting in a room overlooking the street. Quite a party were assembled, and the conversation had been of the time when the rivers and jungles of the Peninsula were infested with pirates to a very alarming extent. Then the treacherous nature of the Malay was discussed, Tom was looking from the window, when suddenly he saw a rush in the street; the people were flying to the right and left, and there was a wild cry of "Amok! amok!" The people shrieked and trampled over each other in their efforts to escape. The Malays grasped their weapon, called "kris," and made ready to defend themselves.

Tom was all excitement, even in his safe position above the ground. The party all crowded about the windows. Tearing along in a mad frenzy came a Malay who was the cause of this terror and flight. Striking about him with his "kris," he laid low every unfortunate man, woman, and child that he could reach. He seemed blind to everything but the insane desire to kill as many as he could before he himself should be brought down by his pursuers. After him the Malay men flew in an almost equal excitement. The runner as he passed was bleeding from the many cuts he had already received, but he still struck madly about him, and rushed on through the street. Pistol-shots were heard, and although the man was evidently struck, his madman's strength supported him. As the noise grew faint and the crowd disappeared, a gentleman quietly said, "They will kill him soon."

Captain Fairweather asked if that was the Malay "amok" of which he had read.

"Yes, that is a genuine case. It is a strange thing in every way. When these Malays are calm they are remarkably gentle, but under excitement they are reckless and blood-thirsty. This custom of 'amok' has grown to be a national one. The Malays are of a very nervous temperament, which sometimes ends in an insanity the nature of which you have just seen illustrated. There are occasions, however, when a Malay will 'run amok' to gratify revenge. He knows he will be killed himself, but he is bent upon bringing about as much destruction as possible before he is shot or stricken down. That 'kris' is a very formidable weapon, with its wavy, flame-shaped blade and its double edge. But you should go into the interior to see the natives. There they live on the river-banks, and dispute the jungles with the wild beasts. They build their houses, you know, on posts, to prevent tigers and other wild animals from attacking them at night; and it would be an interesting sight for you to observe how skillful they are in using bamboo and rattan. Captain, you had better stay here a month, and we will promise on our part to entertain you well."

Tom, quietly listening, devoutly wished that an accept-ance would be forth-coming, for he found this part of the world very much in accord with his boyish love of adventure.

A few evenings after this he approached his father in a laughing mood, and said, "Captain, are you aware that over on the cliffs the natives gather those peculiar bird's-nests which the Chinese like so much for soup?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply; "I am aware that such is the case. I suppose you would like to go and get some."

"That is just what I do wish, sir. The doctor says that he is going over with some natives to-morrow morning, and that he will take me if I can get your permission."

"Well now, Tom, that is a dangerous business. I would like to carry you home alive, but if you go climbing down those cliffs you will surely break your neck. Does the doctor intend to do anything more than look on?"

"Why, no, sir; I think not. At any rate, I'll promise you I will not."

"In that case you may go; but, remember, you are not to be too venturesome."

So the next morning Tom was off on a bird's-nest hunt.

Every one knows of bird's nest soup; and here in Malay-land is where many are gathered for the Chinese market. The nests are made by swallows in the dark and shady crevices of cliffs. The birds gather from the coral rocks in the sea a glutinous weed, which they swallow and afterward disgorge for their building purposes. The nests have the appearance of long strings of fine vermicelli, coiled one part over the other, without much regularity, and glued together with the same material. In shape they resemble the bowl of a large gravy spoon split in half.

When they arrived at the edge of the cliffs, which were hundreds of feet above the sea, the Malays drove iron spikes very carefully into the ground, and secured to them some very roughly made ropes. Then they slung a bag and torch across their backs, and were ready for work. First they repeated a Mohammedan prayer; which finished, they lowered themselves down the cliff by means of the rope, and began searching the caves and crannies.

Tom and Dr. Goodfellow contented themselves in looking over the cliff to see the mode of operating. In some places the men had to vibrate in the air like a pendulum to gather sufficient momentum to swing in under some overhanging portion of the cliff. The wretched ropes by which they were suspended cut against the sharp edge of the cliff, and their breaking seemed but a question of time.

They gathered a few nests, and at last swung into a little cave that had evidently been unexplored before, as the swallows and bats flew out by thousands, and the noise they made was almost deafening. The Malays secured all the nests they could find, and climbed back, aided by those tending the ropes on the cliff.

A great many lives are lost in this hazardous work. It is said that one out of every five men employed in it eventually meets with a violent death. For this reason the nests command a high price. The best ones are those which have not yet been used by the birds. Such nests are nothing but pure gelatine, and are of course more especially prized.

Walking back, Tom observed that the Malays kept a sharp eye about them in the hollows, or where the vegetation was very rank, and occasionally muttered the ominous word "Oular!" (snake) as a warning. The grass was as high as Tom's waist, however, and he decided, as he could see nothing, to trust to luck, which befriended him here, for he encountered no snakes. He saw on this trip that curious growth called the sensitive plant, the leaves of which wither the instant they are touched.

He was very much infatuated with Malay land, a feeling that was only heightened by going to Singapore. Here, however, he came to grief. In the gardens there was a cage of monkeys, and one huge fellow was noted for his propensity to grab at anything that came within reach of his arm. Tom had been cautioned not to go too near the cage; and he really thought that he was at a safe distance. The old monkey walked slowly up, with a sleepy look, and in a flash he had Tom's watch and chain. A little of the chain remained where it had broken, it is true, but it was a very little.

Then Master Tom saw his watch opened and the works fly in all directions, the case bitten and twisted, and the links of the chain snapped and scattered. It was all done so quickly that at first he felt only surprise; but when a man standing near used the Singapore slang for travellers, and remarked, "I've seen lots of 'globe-trotters' fooled by that monkey," our young friend was a mortified boy indeed.

SEÑOR GIACOMELLI'S PERFORMING BIRDS.

BY HENRY HATTON, MAGICIAN.

II.

"AND now for the real article," continued O'Malley. "If the first lesson was easy, this is much easier, and I might tell you the whole thing in half a dozen words, for it's the old story of Columbus and the egg over again—nothing when you know it. But as you want details, I'll begin at the beginning.

"First, let me tell you that all that nonsense about oil of bergamot or drugs of any kind that you read about in books is gammon; there's nothing in it. Another thing I'll tell you now, for fear I should forget it, and that is that there are some birds that the best man in the world could never tame; and if you come across one of that kind—frightened at its own shadow—lose no time in getting rid of it, for you'll have your pains for your trouble.

"And now really to begin. The first thing to do with a bird that you want to tame and train is to clip its wings so that you'll have little trouble in catching it should it attempt to fly. To do this so as not to disfigure the appearance of the bird, proceed as follows: Take hold of the bird, and spreading out one wing, cut off about half an inch of the first feather; leave the next two uncut; then clip two, and so continue, leaving one uncut between each two that you trim. The other wing must be treated in the same way. Next put your bird in a room by itself, even hanging a green curtain on one side of the cage, so as to shut out the sight of the room.

"Remove all seed and everything to eat from the cage, and keep food of every kind from it for twenty-four hours, but see that it is well supplied with water. At the end of this time approach the cage, remove the curtain, and call the bird pleasantly by name. Pour some seed into your hand, so that the hungry creature can see it, and then open the cage door, and place your hand there. If you are careful at first to make no sudden or abrupt movement, the little thing will perch on your finger and begin to eat from your hand. Don't disturb it, but let it feed for some minutes. Then put it back in its cage, and talk to it, so that it will get accustomed to your voice. After a while give it more seed from your hand, this time adding a little crushed hemp seed, or, better still, some hemp seed that you've cracked in your mouth. Now don't ask me why this is better, for I can't tell you, but it's true.

"By this time your bird is tame; but continue this treatment for two or three days, taking care that as much as possible it sees no one but you, but, above all, that it gets its food from you only. It will soon know you, and look on you as its best friend, and the moment you open the door of its cage it will fly to your hand, expecting something to eat. Don't disappoint it, but give it a single hemp seed cracked as before. As it has no fear of you now, you can begin to teach it some tricks, and you'll be surprised to find how quick the little things are to learn. It's wonderful how much they know.

"To give you an instance: A friend of mine, a magician, does the trick known as the 'flying cage,' in which a bird-cage containing a live bird suddenly vanishes from before the eyes of the audience. The cage is made of wires linged on thread, and one corner of it is fastened to a cord which passes up the performer's sleeve, across his back, and down the other sleeve, where it is fastened at the wrist. The cord is short, and when the 'magish' appears his elbows are close to his ribs, and his hands against his chest, where he holds the cage. By suddenly extending his arms and letting go the cage it folds up and flies up his sleeve. When folded there is still space enough for the bird, and though it is claimed the creature's never hurt, I have seen more than one killed.

"Well, this friend of mine was lucky, for he had the one bird all the time, and it grew so cunning that when it heard the 'magish' give the signal, 'One, two, three—go!' it would pop its little head under its wing, and squeeze itself into as small compass as possible. And what's the most curious thing of all, no one had ever told it to. But I'm digressing, as the lecturers say.

"The best trick to begin with, because the easiest, is to make a bird perch on the stick which you thrust into its cage. To do this you merely have to press the stick gently against its breast, when it will step on it to get out of its way. In the same way, when you want it to walk up your fingers you press against its breast with the finger next to that on which it is perched, continuing to do this until it has walked up all. After a while it will go up without the pressing, of its own accord.

"A pretty effect is to hold a bouquet in your left hand while the bird sits perched on the forefinger of your right. Then, as you order it, it will fly to the bouquet. This is done by giving it a little flip under the tail with your left thumb. At first the bouquet must be held quite close, only a few inches off, but as you continue to practice the distance is increased. From time to time the bird must be rewarded with a cracked hemp seed, and this must be observed in teaching any and every trick.

"A favorite trick with bird exhibitors is to harness one bird to a tiny wagon, while another is seated in it. This is of the class of tricks that old Blitz did, and requires neither skill nor patience, for the creatures are fastened in with elastic, and couldn't get out if they tried. In rehearsing, the one that 'plays horse' is beaten with a little twig as soon as it is fastened in, and as a result it begins to run when placed in harness before an audience.

"Again, a bird is placed in a little swing, where it stays contentedly, for the reason that it too is fastened in by an elastic band.

"One of the prettiest bits of bird work is that in which two toy ladders are placed end to end, the reverse ends resting on the ground, so that they form an inverted V. Three or four birds are introduced, and told to go up one ladder and down another, the one that first reaches the other side being promised a nice supper. All obey orders with one exception, and that runs under the ladders, and of course wins the race.

"The training is very simple, and a few hours are all that's needed. Of course one bird is trained at a time. It is first placed at a little distance from the foot of the ladder, and then urged along by gentle touches, the performer's hands guiding it on either side, so that it can't go to the right or the left. Should it fly away, it is caught and brought back to its first position, and when this is repeated two or three times it will understand the way in which it is to go. Its passage up and down the ladder is taught in the same way, that is, by guiding it in the direction you want it to go, and bringing it back every time it flies away. As its wings are trimmed, it can't fly far, and is easily caught.

"One word about catching a bird. In picking up a bird, always place your hand in front of it, for if you reach after it, it will give a little hop, and then, like Paddy's flea, when you put your hand on him, he isn't there."

I have now told my readers all that O'Malley told me about bird-taming, and as I have had no little experience in it myself, I can indorse every word he said. The whole business may be briefly summed up as follows: 1. A bird is tamed by starving it; 2. It is taught any trick by constant rehearsal and invariable patience; and any one who will follow out these simple directions will in a short time be rewarded by seeing their little pets do the apparently most difficult tricks.

A MODEL GYMNASIUM, AND WHAT CAN BE DONE WITHOUT IT.

BY ROBERT BRIDGES.

NOT long ago a sturdy Scotchman, with clear blue eyes, bushy blonde whiskers, and splendid complexion, said to me, "I have never had a headache in my life."

He looks to be about thirty-five years of age, but is really nearly fifty. I thought that a remarkable statement for any full-grown man to make, and so I asked him to tell me how the boys who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE might live such comfortable lives as that.

The man is Professor George Goldie, Physical Director of the New York Athletic Club Gymnasium, and he was sitting in his snug office in that magnificent building, which cost $250,000. He laughed good-humoredly, and kindly volunteered to answer all my questions.

W. T. SNEDLEY
1885

THE NEW YORK ATHLETIC CLUB.—DRAWN BY W. T. SNEDLEY.

"I suppose," said Professor Goldie, "that plenty of Scotch oatmeal and few sweetmeats fed to me when a child helped to make me so healthy. Then, too, we don't drink ice-water one minute and hot tea the next in the old country. But more than that, I have taken plenty of exercise. Before I tell you how any boy can follow my example at his home, let me show you the most complete gymnasium in this country."

We stepped out into a very large room with a very high ceiling, finished throughout in hard wood. Near and around the centre were rings, trapezes, horizontal bars, and ladders, such as you see in the illustration, and which every good gymnasium has. There were eight rowing-machines arranged in order for training a crew, parallel bars for short men and tall, a stationary bicycle, and long and thick mattresses for tumblers.

Around three sides of this large hall were arranged scores of pulley-weights, which, as some of you know, are simply pulleys attached to a bracket about five feet from the floor, over which slide ropes fastened to weights which move up and down freely between two parallel steel rods. It is a very simple machine, and yet it may be adapted to training every muscle in the body. I found out from Mr. Goldie as we walked from one to another of these weights, which seemed almost alike, that a very little change in the arrangement of the rope or handle altered the whole purpose of the apparatus.

On the end of one rope was a peculiar woven skull-cap. Mr. Goldie put it on, and standing with his face toward the centre of the room, nodded his head regularly; then facing around at right angles to that position, he swung his head from side to side.

"There you see," he said, "how every muscle of the neck is brought into play."

A little further along was a slipper attached to a similar rope by its toe, and next to it one attached by the heel. By placing your foot in either of these and swinging the leg back and forward, pendulum fashion, the muscles of the thigh are developed. It would require many pages and diagrams for me to fully explain all these ingenious arrangements. There is even one specially adapted for strengthening the fingers and giving the user a "good grip."

As we had about finished the circuit of the room a young man stepped up and said: "You have machines here, Mr. Goldie, for every muscle; I wonder if there is one by which a man could develop a single toe?"

He seemed to think that at last he had "stumped" the professor. But the latter twinkled his blue eyes, and said, "Come up in the gallery, and I'll show you a machine for that also."

The young man took the professor's word for it; but we went upstairs, and saw how a weight balanced on a pivot could be attached to the foot by a strap passed over the big toe, and could be worked like the treadle of a sewing-machine.

This narrow gallery, which you see in our illustration, extends all around the building, and contains a splendid track for running, which has all the springy qualities of turf. It is made of thick felt covered with rubber cloth, and cost $800. Twenty-one times around this noiseless circle make one mile.

I would like to tell you of the many other wonders of this elegant club-house, for the gymnasium is only a small part of it. There is a great swimming bath, where the water is always kept at 70°; Turkish and Russian baths, with the temperature up to 180°; marble benches, where the bathers rest and roast while the attendants knead their flesh; a needle bath, where hundreds of little jets of water touch every part of your body; a boxing-room, in which all projecting corners of wood are carefully padded; a beautiful billiard hall and bowling-alleys; a reading-room and luxurious reception-room; and a dining-hall for the convenience of members and their invited friends.

Besides all this, as you will see by the illustration, the club, which numbers more than 1000 members, owns fine athletic grounds for out-door sports, and a boat-house on the Harlem River.

We have kept Mr. Goldie waiting all this time to tell you what you may do at home without the expensive apparatus of a fine gymnasium. He has a boy of his own of whom he is very proud, and you can be sure that he would not willingly give any boy hurtful advice.

"The best exercise," he said, "for a boy under twelve years of age is plenty of play out-of-doors. I would not give him any gymnastic training until he has passed that age, unless I noticed some slight physical defect which might be corrected by regular work. But after he is twelve he should begin light gymnastics."

And here are some of the things which Mr. Goldie says you should do:

Stand perfectly straight, with your head erect and heels together; bend your body forward until your trunk and legs make a right angle at the hips; then bend backward as far as you can go; swing your body similarly from side to side, approaching as near as you can to a right angle. This is splendid exercise for all the muscles of your waist.

Put two chairs facing each other, about eighteen inches apart; place the palms of your hands near the edge of the seat on each, and keeping your arms straight, extend your feet as far as possible, toes down; then raise and lower your body by bending your elbows.

There is nothing better to develop the calf of the leg than raising yourself on your toes as the point of support.

Another good leg exercise is to sit on your heels (if you can) with your knees spread as far apart as possible, your hands resting on your hips; then suddenly rise to an erect position, and just as quickly sit down again. Repeat this about twenty times rapidly.

Learn to walk on your hands. It is not easy, but a bright boy can soon acquire the trick. Get down on your palms, with your fingers about ten inches or more from the wall; swing your legs up, bending them at the knees, so that the soles of your feet touch the wall. Thus you can balance yourself on your hands, and it will not be long before you can take a step or two away from the wall.

I am afraid that most boys will think these simple things stupid, and I believe they are right, unless three or four of them can practice together. After all, the best thing about exercise is the opportunity which it gives for companionship, friendly rivalry, and fun.

Very well, then, let us have a gymnasium in our barn, attic, or play-room. You will have to call on your father or big brother for a little money and active help in putting up the apparatus. But it is very simple and inexpensive. You will need some good Manila rope, half an inch in diameter, several rake or pitchfork handles, and stout screw hooks and rings. (I believe they are called ring-bolts.)

You can have a trapeze, horizontal bar, climbing rope, striking bar, and rings without a great outlay of money or trouble.

For the trapeze, two ring-bolts, costing about fifteen cents each, must be firmly screwed in a girder of the ceiling, about four feet apart. One of the fork handles must be cut the same length. Two pieces of rope are securely fastened to the rings above, either by an "eye-splice" or by wrapping the looped rope tightly with twine. The fork handle, now the trapeze bar, is similarly fastened to the other ends of the ropes, and is secured in its place by staples or loops of wire placed over the rope and through the bar, being clinched around the rope on the opposite side. The bar should hang within easy reach of the boy performers.

Another fork handle is used for the horizontal bar. The sides of a door-frame will furnish the posts for its support. Two hard-wood brackets or cleats should be slotted to fit the squared ends to the fork handle, and screwed on opposite jambs of the door. The bar can be lifted out of these at pleasure, and will not be in the way when not in use.

A good striking bag can be made of heavy Canton flannel, with the rough side out. It should be ten or twelve inches in diameter and fifteen in length. Fill it with bran, saw-dust, or chaff. You can suspend it by a rope, hook, and ring to the top of the same door in which you have your horizontal bar.

A climbing rope is simply a piece of stout rope, an inch and a half in diameter, suspended from a strong hook in the ceiling. Every boy should learn how to ascend and descend such a rope hand over hand. It is an accomplishment that might enable him to escape safely from a burning building or a sinking ship.

With such simple devices as these all the muscles of the body can be trained. You can circle the horizontal bar in many different ways—grasping it with both hands, and holding the arms rigid; hooking it with one knee, then with both knees; making two "pitcher-handles" of your arms, and inclosing the bar within them. You may also "skin the cat" and hang by your toes, if the bar is high enough.

On the trapeze you can do many similar things, which are made more difficult by the swinging motion.

You can swing on the rings, holding by your hands, your knees, or your feet. You can turn a somersault while you are flying through the air, grasping them tightly. You may try to make a perfect cross of your arms and body, your only support being the rings which you hold in your hands. You may try this, I say; I will not promise that you can accomplish it.

For splendid, exhilarating sport, to make the blood jump through your arteries and bring color to your cheeks and sparkle to your eyes, try five minutes' fighting with the saw-dust bag, striking it with the right and left hands alternately. It never loses its temper, as one party or the other generally does in a boxing match, and I am sure that it will tire you out every time.

I do not doubt that any boy who has such a home gymnasium as I have described will invent more tricks and exercises in twenty-four hours than I could describe in twenty-four pages. If he does not, his chum will.

TWO ARROWS:

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM G. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX.

STIRRING TIMES.

THE idea of a great fight about to come off had quite turned the heads of Sile and Two Arrows, and the latter was aching all over with anxiety to try his new rifle. They had found good places to shoot from. Even the Judge did not hesitate a moment about bidding Sile to do his duty, although he had a pretty strong conviction that there would not be much to do right away. Na-tee-kah had singled out that pair as the particular braves in whose conduct she was interested, but had no doubt that her brother would win more glory than the Red-head, now that he had so good a rifle.

The circumstances had even more completely turned the hot heads of the young Apache braves left in charge of their too numerous drove of horses. Every soul of them was crazy to be at the front and take part in whatever might turn up. They all seemed to drift naturally a little in that direction, and kept no kind of lookout, leaving their precious charge to take care of itself. The horses, therefore, at once began to take advantage of the grass.

This state of things continued, and grew worse and worse every minute, until a good long hour after the main body had moved away along Sile's trail toward the notch. Then, altogether unexpectedly, but as by one impulse, all the Apache horse guard gave a sudden start and turned their heads in one direction.

Over the crest of the nearest knoll, stirring and clear and sweet, came the sound of a cavalry bugle. It was the signal to "charge," and was followed by the swift rush of Captain Grover and his men. In an instant they were between the feeding quadrupeds and their astonished keepers, and it was all in vain for the young hot-heads in their amazement to attempt to rally. One only wheeled his pony at once and rode away at the top of his speed. The nine or ten who dashed in the other direction suddenly all drew rein as they discovered the odds against them. A line of iron veterans, thirty strong, was thundering forward, and not an Apache was fool enough to fire a shot and be cut down for it.

There was just enough of bewildered, leaderless indecision to settle the matter. The sabres swept flashingly around the squad of red-skins, and all they had to do was to surrender. It is a mere novelist's blunder to suppose and to write that red men have not sense enough to give it up when there is no use in fighting any more. They can do it as readily as any white man in the world, and the reason why they do not do it more frequently is because they generally keep a good chance to run away, and make a treaty afterward as to what presents they are to have for making peace. There was no time given the young braves to strike a bargain. They were all disarmed, and then, dreadfully to their disgust, they were all dismounted and tied up.

"The plunder 'll do well enough where it is," said Captain Grover, as he detailed Garry and a guard of four men to watch the prisoners. "If any of those chaps gets loose you'll have to shoot him. Men, by fours, left! Forward!"

The pony rider who escaped was sure to carry the news of the disaster and of the arrival of the blue-coats, but several things could happen before the Apache chief received it. He had no spy-glass, and he was eagerly waiting such information as might be obtained by the brave standing face to face with Yellow Pine.

That very cunning Apache found himself talking under difficulties. He could see distinctly that there were more than a few rifles at the barrier, but he could get no farther. The tall pale-face in front of him kept back any other information than that all the Apaches in this world or any other would be killed in case of an attack then and there. He even referred to Sile's exploit as an example, and to the lesson given by Two Arrows to the scout, and all the wild blood in the Apache brave was set boiling by that somewhat imprudent reference.

He was a large, powerfully built warrior, and he had been as truthful as could be expected when he signified that he was unarmed. He kept up the idea of a "flag of truce" talk, until sure he could gain no more by it, and then he uttered a shrill whoop, and stooped quick as a flash for a long knife hidden in his leggings. He meant to carry back the scalp of Yellow Pine as a trophy of that conversation, but had not asked anybody how well Pine could box. The latter had no time to draw any weapon except his fist, but that was a hard one, and it struck the Apache on the side of his head as he was rising, knife in hand. Over and over he rolled, while Pine threw himself flat upon the earth, at the same moment digging both hands into the pockets of his pantaloons. His enemy recovered himself instantly, and sprang to his feet with another whoop, lifting his long, glittering knife for a rush upon the prostrate pale-face.

It might have been a perilous rush, for Pine's hands came right out of his pockets, and each held a short-barrelled "Derringer" pistol, ready cocked. They are terrible weapons, but the miner had no occasion to use either of them. The line of the barrier and of the adjacent rocks seemed to dance with blue flashes and with puffs of white smoke. Within three seconds not less than a score of rattling reports awoke the echoes of the notch, and every blue tube they came from had been aimed by a good marksman. After all was over, the prevalent opinion was that not one of them had missed. At all events, Yellow Pine was safe to jump up and run for the barrier, followed by hasty shots from startled and galloping horsemen, all as useless as so many pebbles. His arrival was greeted by all the shouting and whooping which could possibly be performed by the red and white garrison of the notch, aided by One-eye with a vigor that shook him all over. Even then, however, the voice of the Big Tongue could be distinguished from the rest.

If the volume of sound did nothing else, it deeply impressed the mind of the Apache chief with an idea of the strength of the force opposed to him. So had the promptness and number and accuracy of the rifle-shots which had prevented him from getting any report from his too treacherous "flag of truce" brave. As for him, Na-tee-kah had been watching Two Arrows, and had seen the Apache fall just as his rifle went off. That was enough, and she was again proud of her brother. It was in vain for Ha-ha-pah-no to say, eral. The Apache chief was necessarily a good captain, fully able to understand how bad it would be for him to be placed between two fires. The ground in front of the notch was therefore no place for him to fight in, and he did not know what precious minutes he had already been wasting. He threw away ten more in a sort of consultation with his wisest warriors, and at the same time his whole force rode up the valley a short distance. That move gave them the cover of some trees and took them out of range of bullets from the barrier, and at that very moment Judge Parks was startled by a yell from Sile.

"Ugh! Heap shoot. All kill him. Go dead a heap."

"What are you doing up there?" he shouted, for Sile had clambered away up among the rocks of the ledge and stood upon a sort of pinnacle, spy-glass in hand.

"Cavalry, father! They are coming. Cavalry—"

"Come down!"

"Right in this direction. Riding hard. Hurrah!"

The new rifle of Two Arrows could not have won him the glory of that discovery and announcement. Once more the peculiar advantages of pale-faces over red men were forced upon him, but somehow it did but stir up his ambition, and with it a quick, daring impulse. He sprang away up the valley for a horse. He rushed in among the gathered animals of the corral, and boldly picked out his father's best and swiftest mustang, a beast that could run like the wind. He asked for no saddle, and the bridle went on as if by magic.

Sile came down from his perch at a rate that risked his neck, and made a report which drew from Yellow Pine,

"I'd call it— Jedge, if we could only let them fellers know we're here, it would be worth a heap."

Before all who echoed that wish had finished speaking, Two Arrows came dashing toward the barrier, all ready for the errand.

"Give the youngest three cheers!" shouted Yellow Pine. "Hurrah for him!"

THE LITTLE NURSE.

With a snowy muslin cap
Drawn above her chestnut curls.
Ethel sits beside the fire,
Dearest of dear little girls.

In her hand a toasting fork,
Not a moment will she turn,
Watching with intent, bright eyes,
Lest the precious toast should burn.

For the mother whom she loves
Has been ailing all the day,
And to nurse her, Ethel boxes
Cheerfully her merry play.

Useless now to speak her name,
Not a moment will she turn,
For she watches with bright eyes,
Lest the precious toast should burn.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

A BRAVE LITTLE GIRL.

ONLY ten years old, not very large of her age, and living in the coal region near Yatesville, Pennsylvania, little Maggie Brehony has earned the right to have her name placed on the Harper's Young People Roll of Honor. Not long ago, one December night, the whole family were snugly tucked up in bed, when Maggie's father thought he heard a strange rumbling sound in the earth, and fancied he felt a quaking. It did not take him long to call his wife and awaken the children, and, esteeming up whatever they could in their haste, they all fled from their house, and found shelter for the night in that of a neighbor. You may imagine that there was no sleep for Mr. Brehony, especially as soon after their escape there had been a rush of earth, an embankment had given way, and there was a great yawning chasm in the road.

Very early in the morning he stepped out to discover the state of affairs, and was immensely relieved that his home was still standing; so with Mrs. Brehony and the children, just at day-break, he returned, and Maggie was sent for some water.

Off she ran, the quick-footed Maggie, a bright-eyed, quick-witted girl, who had prompt thoughts, as well as nimble steps, a girl with pluck and a sense of mind. She saw that where yesteryear was the black track of the Lehigh Valley Road, to-day there was a great ugly hole that had swallowed up the rails and left a wide gaping mouth which would presently swallow up the train and the passengers. While she was thinking how to warn the first train which should come along, there was a sharp whistle and a rattle, growing into a roar, and nearer and nearer, flying straight to that dreadful hole, came a coal train with its crew. Brave Maggie did not stop to think now—she acted. Waving her frail willily, the child rushed directly in front of the engine, and caught the engineer's astonished eye just in time. He stopped, and the train was saved.

I am very glad that the great railroad company mean to give little Maggie Brehony a reward. One reward she shall have. All the boys and girls, the wide world round, who read this paper will keep her name in memory, because she was brave and noble, and did the best she could with promptness and energy.

MICHIGAN, DAKOTA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for five years, and feel as though we could not get along without it. This year some little girls in New Jersey send it to us. We are twelve, eleven years old, and have a sister who is eight, named Bessie, and a little brother, Morris, who is two. We are in the Fourth Reader grade, and like our teacher and school very much. Friday afternoon was the best, and all the children of the two little rooms came upstairs into ours, and we had our exercises together. We have a literary society, of which Mary is president. We also have a secretary and an assistant secretary. We had a play, and a reading. After these exercises were over we had a grab bag, out of which each scholar had a present. We had different colors for girls' caps, and the girls had caps on their boys' posettes on their shoulders; the president of each school had different kinds of caps from the rest.

We used to live in Oregon, but came to Dakota last summer. We do not like the summers here, we have such dreadful storms. The winters are pleasant, but very cold. We raise the mountain sheep, and the prairies are so bare. Do you like prairie chickens? We do. There used to be no water for fire purposes here, but now we have an artesian well; most of the southern Dakota towns have them. We hope our letter is not too long.

OHIO, SCOT COUNTY, MISSOURI.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have already learned to love the Post-office Box. I love it of better pleasure of reading four numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it very much. It is sent to me by Miss Mabel G., of Brooklyn. I am a little girl twelve years old. I live in the country, where I see all kinds of pretty birds. I love to hear them sing. I would like to correspond with some little girl in Europe about my letter, and to have a view to improvement. EVA McLEAN.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

I am twelve years old, and I go to school. I take my HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to school, and the teacher reads it to the scholars, who enjoy it very much. We had a grand time last week. We voted in school to see which little girl or boy had written the best letter in the New York Post-office. I received the most votes was Agnes L. S. I would like to have little Agnes write to me about the lead mines. As I have no more to say, I will by my pen, adieu, with love to you and all the little readers. JAMES H.

It was a good idea to vote for the best letter-writer. I wish the children would do so every week.

NEBRASKA, NEW YORK.

I have taken your delightful paper for over three years, and I think it is splendid. My favorite stories were "Nan" and "Rolf House." I have a dog named Sam, and I have lived here, have been in New York, and I have seen the place where this delightful paper is published. I am coming down next month, and I would like to come and see you. LUCIA L.

You will be very welcome

YATESVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA.

My uncle, living in Tennessee, is taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for us, and we think it is the best paper for young people in the world. My Mother, who is very particular about our reading, was never willing that we should read any periodical until we got this one. We are greatly interested in "Two Arrows" and the Post-office Box. I have two sisters and two brothers. My youngest brother is only three years old, but what he lacks in age he makes up in name. His name is Theophilus Hunter Holmes MCP. He is named for his grandfather, General Holmes. I wish you would put your picture at the top of the Post-office Box page some time.

FANNY B. MCP.

WEST CHAETER.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Will you be kind enough to publish in the YOUNG PEOPLE the answer to "Sly Wares," which came in the article on grubs? We have made up all the words but this one, even "Roast mules" and "White rose," which were quite difficult. We have the "Marmalade" paper, which visits us each week, and wish its dear Postmistress a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

M. J. A.

"Sly Wares" was a misprint. It should have been "Sly Ware." As you have been so successful with the other anagrams, I have no doubt you will make it out in its corrected form. I will give you the answer in the next number.

I have been at school three years, and am in the Fourth Grade. I take, besides HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, Golden Days, Youth's Companion, and the Little Herpes (a missionary paper). I like "Two Arrows" very much. I am eleven years old, and I have been to many different parts of the world. Would you be kind enough to send me some postmarks, as I am getting up a collection. If I would send a stamp for postage? I hope this will not be too long. CLIFTON D. G.

The Postmistress can not send postmarks or stamps to any one. Several of her little friends have written to Clifton, asking her to send them stamps, cuttings, or cards, if you will send an exchange, telling what you will give in return for the articles you desire, some little reader will be sure to answer your note, and send just what you want.

TOPPER, KANSAS.

I am a little boy ten years old. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was first published, and like it very much. I thought this Christmas I would give it to my sister for a Christmas present, and I will take Mr. Nicholas Mamma says we can not let HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE go out of the family. I have two volumes bound, and have given two to some poor children. I never got tired of reading the letters. I have a little brother, two months old yesterday, and he is very cunning. I am collecting tobacco tugs, and have a good many already. I go to school, and am in the Third Reader, and we also have a dear old dog named Sancho. Sancho goes with us when we take a ride. We love him very much here that when it does come we enjoy it very much. FLOYD MED.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

A year ago I went to Europe with my father. We went on the new ship America, it being her second trip. We had no storms, and arrived at Liverpool on time. When we got there it was quite rainy, but we soon went to a hotel. We started for London the next day, and reached it at five o'clock in the morning. That day we went to the Tower of London, and saw the cannons, swords, and other things that were used in battle. We then went upstairs, and saw most of the Queen's jewelry. After staying in London a week, we returned to Liverpool, and set sail for America. We might have staid longer, but papa wanted to come back on the same steamer. On our way back we saw some seals, and some porpoises, so that there were some on each side of the ship. The next night it began to get rough, and we had a storm. I was seasick, and staid in my cabin all day. We finally got to New York, when we were nearing New York the storm left us entirely. J. D. (aged nine years).

I can not think of anything pleasanter in the life of a boy than a trip with his father, and you will remember years with us, as long as you live. You have described it very well.

Bishop Morris of Oregon has very kindly compiled the following account of the origin of "Hail, Columbia," from Little's Living Age, for the readers of the Post-office Box:

"ORIGIN OF 'HAIL, COLUMBIA.'"

"This, the most popular of all the national songs of America, was written by the late Judge John T. Johnson, of New York, and is published below. Joseph Hopkinson, son of Francis Hopkinson, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., September 22, 1770. He studied law at the University of Pennsylvania; studied law with Judge Wilson and Mr. Rawle, and practiced with brilliant success in his native city. He was elected to Congress from Philadelphia (1815 and 1817). In 1825 he was appointed Judge of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, this being the same office which his father held by appointment of Washington. Judge Joseph Hopkins remains in the office which he held until he took place June 15, 1842. It was the delight of the circle of society in which he moved. His accomplished mind, says Mr. Walcott, was not only an even-tempered, and opinions of the day, was peculiarly qualified to delight, besides instructing, in convivial intercourse, by a strong and refined wit, a liberal and generous spirit, and a peculiar poignancy of remark and readiness of anecdote."

The following is Judge Hopkinson's own account of the origin of "Hail, Columbia," written August 24, 1840, for the Hyoming Band, at Wilkesbarre, at their desire: "This song was written in the summer of 1840, when the subject of a national anthem to be inevitable, Congress being then in session in Philadelphia, deliberating upon that important subject, and acts of hostility having actually occurred. The contest between England and France was raging, and the people of the United States were divided into parties for or against the war. Some thinking that policy and duty required us to take part with republican France, as she was called; others were for our connecting ourselves with England, under the pretext that that was the best way to obtain power of good principles and safe government. The violation of our rights by both belligerents was coming us from the just and the good. President Washington, who was to do equal justice to both; to take part with neither, but to keep a strict and honest neutrality between them. The respect of Europe was to be maintained, and accordingly offensive to the portion of the people which espoused her cause, and the violence of the spirit of party was never rising higher. The question so high, as it did at that time, that I thought. The theatre was then open in our city. A young man belonging to it, whose talent was as a singer was about to take his benefit. He had known him when he was at school. On this acquaintance he called on me on Saturday afternoon, his benefit being announced for the following day. He said he had got a patriotic song adapted to the tune of the "President's March" (then the popular air), he did not doubt of a full house; that the poets of the theatrical corps had been coming to consult him, but that he had no words could be composed to suit the music of the march. I told him I would try for him. He came the next afternoon, and, as usual, such as it is, was ready for him. It was announced on Monday morning, and the theatre was crowded to excess, and so continued night after night for the treatment of the song. The song was repeated many times each night, the audience joining in the chorus. It was also sung at night in the streets by large assemblies of citizens, including members of Congress, and an enthusiasm was general, and the song was heard, I may say, in every part of the United States."

"The object of the author was to set forth an American spirit which should be independent of and above the interests, passions, and policy of both belligerents, and look and feel exclusively for our own rights. The song was found to be made either to France or England, or the quarrel between them, or to which was most in fault in their treatment of our rights. The song was found favor with both parties—at least neither would disavow the sentiments it incanted. It was truly American, and nothing else, and the patriotic feelings of every American heart were appealed to. It is the history of this song, which has endured infinitely beyond any expectation of the author, and beyond any merit it can boast of except in the feeling that it is exclusively patriotic in its sentiments and spirit."

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—I see that all the boys and girls write to you, but I thought I would send you a few. For pets I have two white rats with pink eyes; their names are George and Willie. I have one brother, his name is George. I go to school, and study reading, writing, sitting, and an arithmetic. Sometimes I get puzzled in Short Division. We are going to be examined next January. February 1st, I will be in the Grammar School. Don't you think that will be splendid? I am in the Eighth Grade now.

WILLIE W.

I am glad you are succeeding so well in school.

HASTINGS, MINNESOTA.

I am a boy thirteen years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, spelling, Harper's, and geography. I live on the river, and I have a steamboat goes by our house. On the hills across the river are many valleys. My father is a machinist. I am going to learn the trade myself. My name is M. S.

If by "Harper's" you mean that you use HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as a reader, I think you are a fortunate boy.

NEW YORK CITY.

One day last spring some of my friends, my brother, and myself went to Fortham. We went in the morning, and brought our lunch, and when we got there we picked a large bunch of daisies for ourselves, and then one for the church. Then we played around awhile, and after which it was time for our lunch. After we had finished, we hid our things under some bushes, and went down to the Bronx River. We rambled through the woods, and gathered some wild flowers, and in some places the grass was so slippery that we would fall down if we weren't careful. There was a hill near the place, and after we had reached it we climbed up that, and got some wild ferns and columbine. Then we rested, and gathered up some more flowers, and after we had picked two rabbits one is pure white and the other is white with black spots, two canary-birds, and a Newfoundland dog. In summer we go bathing in the river, and in the fall, and last summer I learned how to swim.

LYNN, MASSACHUSETTS.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and would not exchange it for any other paper there is. My teacher at school used to take it for us, so that I got interested in it at first. I lend it to my little friends Evie F. and May B. and they wish me to say that they like it very much. I am collecting stamps and post-marks, but I have not many. I am twelve years old, and I like some English girls about that age to write to me. JENNY B. BIRD, 13 Edward's Court.

COBBE RIVER, KENTUCKY.

I have no brothers or sisters, and sometimes am rather lonesome. My father is a doctor, and mamma and I are often left alone all night, but we are not afraid. I am going to tell you about my pets. I have a cat, a dog, a bird, and a little black dog eight years old, who has lost almost all his teeth; two cats, Bull, a very good-natured cat, and a dog, who is now reposing beside me on a divan, and Mistress Tabby, a tortoise, who is the pet of the family. Tabby is eight years old, and sometimes as playful as a kitten, but at others as seditious as an old judge, and gets very angry if I tickle her. She is also very fond of sitting in our laps, and will sit in them all day long, and she is not so very valuable; she catches a great number of rats and mice, and has caught three weasels; she also catches birds, squirrels, and rabbits, which is very very valuable. I am fond of riding, and ride her very often. Beauty has a two-year-old colt named Guy Manning; he belongs to me too; he is a splendid riding horse, and has a living lion and a fox, who is now a cow named Carrie, and a mocking-bird whom we call Birdie; he is a very good singer. As I said before, I am very fond of riding, also of hunting, fishing, walking, loafing, and croqueting, and have been reading Goodrich's French History, and like it very much; sometimes I read from twelve to fifteen chapters a day, but sometimes I read only four or five. LENA B.

MAMMA'S LITTLE TREASURE

Mamma's little treasure,
She tumbles down the stair,
And then she laughs and cries,
And says she doesn't care.

And then her dear mamma
Comes running from her room,
And then her little treasure
She picks up very soon.

And then such hugs and kisses
You never, never saw,
And then such cakes and candies
As you needs to eat.

And then her dear papa
Comes running in from work,
And then such big, big kisses,
And then such whisker jerks!

And then at last the night comes,
And she's tucked up in bed,
And then some pleasant dreams
Can enter the curly head.

When nurse comes in the morning,
And mamma's treasure's dressed,
Why, then, she's sure to snappy
You can imagine all the rest.

Engene T. Van De Mark, Box 193, Clinton, Michigan, would like to learn from a boy who sent him 305 tin tags, as he wishes very much to return something of equal value, but has lost his correspondent's address. A letter forwarded to what he supposed was the right address has been returned to Engene from the Dead-Letter office. It may be well to remind ex-changers that they can not be too careful about always giving their full post-office address. In sending an exchange for insertion in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, please remember to sign your name and give your residence at the end and not at the beginning of your note. Write on one side of the paper, with black ink. Please send the exchange on a separate sheet from the one on which you write your letter. You would be surprised if you knew how many exchanges are left out because the writers forgot to include addresses or write in pencil. THE GAME OF ADJECTIVES.

BY G. B. BARTLETT.

ONE person is sent out of the room, while the remainder of the players select some adjective. Upon his return he asks in turn of each player some question, in reply to which the person addressed must designate the adjective chosen, without mentioning it. This reply must answer the question definitely, and at the same time fully express the nature of the adjective. The adjective chosen must, of course, be of a strongly descriptive character, and the game gives an opportunity for much ingenuity and skill in the answers, which are very amusing, especially when the question happens to be in direct opposition to the usual tone of the adjective. The person who gives the answer by which this adjective is detected is obliged to go out of the room in his turn, while the other players select another for him to guess. When ready, they call him in, and he begins by asking first the player who sat next the last guesser, and thus each one replies in turn, and all have an equal chance.

A GEOGRAPHICAL GUESS-WHAT.

(Fill the blanks in these lines with the names of towns or rivers in France.)

A GIRL in France by the name of —
 Had a gown of stiff —
 Cloth upon cloth without avails;
 Cloth enough for a schooner's sails
 Went into this gown that was made of —.
 'Twas immensely wrong, no possible use;
 Clearly this gown was — and —.

She took it in and she ravelled it out,
 And bunched up the drapery round about;
 She snipped off the bottom flounce in a trice,
 Then, Presto, change! the gown was —.
 Then hope beat high 'neath her brodered vest;
 A definite purpose entered her —.
 She mounted a steed of red, red —,
 A steed so swift it had almost flown,
 And away she sped to — — —.
 Whence she could see —, not in a den,
 And she climbed the mountains of bright — — —
 Just to hear from afar those — roar.

'Twas evident now, 'twas perfectly plain,
 Our heroine was not entirely —,
 So they whirled her off without a trial
 Short-cut through the town of —.
 For reasons we can not chronicle,
 Though probably philological,
 She went to —. Alack so fast!
 A sacrifice to rhyme at last.

ICE-YACHTING ON THE SHREWSBURY—THE "SCUD."—SEE PAGE 152.

ICE-YACHTS ON THE SHREWSBURY.

BY CHARLES LEDYARD NORTON.

ALL the way across the Central and Eastern States Laurie had wondered whether he should find the Shrewsbury River frozen over or clear of ice, and he hardly knew which to hope for. He was a Western ranchman's boy, but the blood of four or five generations of salt-water sailors was in his veins, and had not been changed by a ten years' sojourn on the prairies; and here he was at last on his way to visit Cousin Dick, who lived within sound of the Atlantic breakers.

Until the train thundered over the long bridge just above the busy town of Red Bank he did not know whether he should see the land-locked Shrewsbury with its waves dancing under the wintry sun or hardened into a sheet of ice. There it was at last, white-gray under the blue sky, and there, scudding before the steady north-west wind, were a dozen ice-boats. Laurie's blood tingled, and he looked with all his eyes while the vision lasted; but it was quickly shut off by unlovely sand dunes, and the train began to slow for Red Bank.

At the station the two sixteen-year-old boys shook hands rather stiffly, looking one another over from head to foot with a queer sort of half-hostile feeling which neither quite understood. In early childhood the two had been capital friends, but they had not met in ten years, and of course had to begin all over again.

As soon as they were fairly started on the subject of ice-yachting, the boys had enough to talk about, for Laurie was very eager to learn. At length they reached a point where the road ran close to the edge of the bluff, and Dick let the horses walk slowly while he discoursed of the glories of the Scud, the new lateen-rigged yacht which was shortly to go to Poughkeepsie and race for the challenge pennant.

Fortune favored them. Just as they were opposite a gap in the belt of trees that fringed the bluff, Dick pulled up his horses with "There she is now!" and for a thrilling moment the eyes of the Western "cow-boy" and the Jersey "beach-comber" drank in the picture, one with the delight of full appreciation, and the other with the wonder of a new experience.

Here she was, in very truth, coming down toward the beach, with her big triangle of white canvas flat as a board, and glowing in the level afternoon sun. She came on at a terrific rate, and just as she neared the beach a puff of wind fiercer than usual laid her over to leeward, with her windward runner high in air. This "spilled" the wind from her sail, and in some slight degree checked her speed, as the helmsman with the slightest possible movement of the tiller threw her up into the wind. The runner came down gently upon the ice, and the canvas shivered for an instant as the wind caught the sail edgewise.

Then the superb creature, instinct with life and motion, presented the broadside of her sail to the eager boys, swept round in a magnificent curve until the wind caught her sail on the other tack, and then away she flew right into the wind's eye, and was gone in a twinkling.

"Dick," said the "cow-boy," in tones which fairly quivered with excitement, "do you mean to tell me that you've got one like that, and that I can sail in her?"

"Yes, certainly. She isn't anywhere near as big as the Scud, of course, but"—with a skipper's faith in his own craft—"I'm not sure but she's pretty near as fast."

Fortunately there was no snow to speak of for a fortnight, and the weather remained for the most part steadily cold. The boys had better opportunities for sailing than usually falls to the lot of ice-yachtsmen.

Red Bank, New Jersey, and Poughkeepsie, on the Hudson River, are the world's headquarters for ice-boats. The Shrewsbury, on which Red Bank stands, is a landlocked harbor, where the tide makes in from the Atlantic, and over whose surface the ocean winds blow freely. Poughkeepsie is on the Hudson River, and thus far her clubs have retained the challenge pennant. Last winter the Shrewsbury men sent the Scud, whose spirited portrait is shown on page 181, to bring home the coveted emblem; but although she failed to do it, she made such a favorable impression that the lateen rig is being adopted by many of the best sailers in all the clubs.

This sail is really the newest "wrinkle" of any importance that has been devised of late, and, with its double or "shear" mast, presents a very rakish and saucy appearance. The picturesque view given by the artist does not explain certain details of construction, which must needs be understood by one who proposes to rig a boat on this plan.

As shown in the two illustrations, the lateen-sail is triangular. In the drawing of the Scud the sheer poles between which the sail is suspended are plainly shown. In the sail plan of the Whiffle only one of them appears, the other being hidden by the sail. In this case, too, the poles rest upon a cross-beam of their own, while in the Scud they rest directly upon the runner plank. In both cases strong stays of steel wire rope run from mast-head to the bowsprit, and aft to runner plank or braces.

The object of the double mast is to make the sail sit better, and to prevent it from making a bag of itself by pressing against the mast, as would necessarily be the case with a single spar. A far more effective hoisting gear can be used with sheer poles, since the point of suspension is immediately over the spars, and by this means the canvas can be strained flat as a drum-head. The boom is shackled to the bowsprit a few feet from its fore end, so that the whole spar swings easily at this point between the "shear poles." Now it is clear, since the sheer poles are only six feet apart at the foot, the boom can not swing far out to either side, but this is one of the peculiarities of ice-yacht sailing—the sails are always "trimmed flat."

This greatly surprised Laurie, who had learned all he could from the books about sailing, and knew that when a boat was running before the wind her boom ought to be away out over her side. Dick soon showed him, however, that sailing an ice-boat was very different from sailing anything else. And five times the boys had darting about the Shrewsbury, audaciously challenging larger craft and getting ignominiously beaten, but always finding some excuse which led them to try it again. Dick's Whiffle, indeed, was as "smart" as any craft of her size need be, and though she spread only about 200 square feet of canvas to the Scud's 600 and more, she could easily get away from the larger boat in light winds.

The sheer poles are given a sharp rake forward, because carrying them up perpendicularly would necessitate spars of far greater length and weight. It will be seen that the new pattern carries what is termed the "centre of effort" of the sail well forward and at the same time well aloft. The mast stays are all provided with "buckles," as they are called; that is, an arrangement of screws which permits the stays to be tightened or slackened as may seem necessary. The queer little fin-like projection just in front of the rudder (shown more clearly in the plan of the Whiffle) is a "jumper," that may serve to set the boat on her feet again if she breaks through the ice or fails to clear a crack.

* Adopted from plans of Mr. Archibald Rogers's Elizoid, Hudson River Ice-yacht Club.

The sport is exciting, and while not wholly free from danger, has been the source of very few, if any, serious accidents. The tremendous speed—often as high as a mile in a minute—is a sufficient guarantee that the skipper had best take care how he steers, as a very slight mistake will spoil his fun by wrecking his dainty craft and laying her up indefinitely—perhaps till the short "season" is over—for repairs.

TWO ARROWS:*

A STORY OF RED AND WHITE.

BY WILLIAM O. STODDARD,

AUTHOR OF "THE TALKING LEAVES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

A DARING RIDE.

FOR the moment there was not one Apache horseman lingering within reach of the sharp-shooters at the gap, and it was possible to get away from it unseen. All peril would come afterward, but there was a vast amount of it, and the proposed errand of Two Arrows called for unlimited courage. His light weight upon a fresh racer gave him some advantage over heavy warriors upon horses already hard ridden, but this fact did not cover the whole question by any means, for a bullet will travel faster than the swiftest mustang. Sile did his best to communicate every fact that his spy-glass had given him; Long Bear said "Ugh!" with a deep and expressive intonation; the logs were removed from the entrance; and then Na-tekah's heart beat terribly, for she saw her hero brother dash forth all alone, she could not guess why nor whither. Then there was another sudden commotion, for Yellow Pine shouted, and Long Bear echoed it in his own tongue: "Mount, men! Mount and be ready, every mother's son of ye! I'm jest going to back that there young catamount if it costs me my hair!"

There was the swiftest kind of saddling and mounting, and not a Nez Percé boy old enough to draw a bow was willing to be left behind. When, therefore, the whole force rode out upon the slope in front of the notch, it looked a good deal stronger than it really was. All that work required many minutes, and during all of these the daring young messenger had been doing capitally.

Leaving the gap, he wheeled his fleet mustang to the right and dashed away until he deemed himself within reach of a small grove of trees, around which he could sweep back into the right course to reach the cavalry. It was an acute enough calculation, but out of that very bit of bushy timber came first a brace of rifle-bullets and then a pair of mounted Apaches, as soon as these believed that they had let him go far enough; that is, they rode out to cut off his return, and they both failed to do him or his horse any harm. It was a race now, with the chances against the pursuers, and Two Arrows sent back a derisive whoop as he struck out straight for what he believed to be his mark. He understood on an instant that he had escaped the main body of his enemies, but there was no telling when he might meet one of their smaller squads.

He felt in every fibre of his body that he was now armed as a warrior, and was doing the work of a warrior and of an uncommonly daring brave. His heart beat with fierce delight and hope, and his very mustang seemed to feel the excitement, and went forward with long, eager bounds. The wind was in his face, and now it brought him something. It was a faint sound, and far away, but it was the bugle-note which bade Captain Grover's men to change their trot to a gallop.

The little force of cavalry had taken upon them no small risk in dashing forward, now that they had a better knowledge of the strength of their opponents. It was almost rashness, but it was such a facing of odds as our gallant soldiers are always daring. There was nothing exceptional about it, terrible as have been the disasters now and then resulting from such rashness. Captain Grover determined to gain whatever might be gained by promptly following up his first success, and so he had well used all the minutes the Apache chief was wasting. At about the time when the latter had decided that there must be an effort made to recover the lost plunder, unless the cavalry should prove too numerous, Captain Grover had ridden far enough to make good the military plan of a young Nez Percé chief. His own spy-glass was at work from every rising ground he came to, and now it brought an exclamation from him:

"What's up now? One chased by two? Forward! Gallop!"

Two Apache braves, already very sure they could not catch the rider they were chasing, wheeled quickly and rode in the opposite direction, and in a few moments more Two Arrows was rapidly explaining the situation to Captain Grover. It was a very plain one, and not a second was wasted in considering it. Again the word was "Forward," and the remaining distance to be travelled was not great. The decision of the Apaches to advance was likely to make it shorter, but that was an unpleasant time for the chief in command of those unlucky red men. Just as two of his braves came in to inform him that a messenger from the men among the rocks had reached the cavalry, another announced that all the pale-faces and Nez Percés had come out from the rocks to fight, and were "heap strong." Now was that the whole of it, for one of his scouts from the rear dashed up with the news that yet another party of Nez Percés was coming, he did not know how many. These were the fellows sent through the pass for the "cached" property; but what Apache could say how many more might follow, or how many more blue-coated veterans might be at hand?

It looked for all the world as if that enterprising band of Apache "business" men were surrounded and trapped. They had already lost all the proceeds of their season's hard work, and the rest of their stock in trade of all sorts was pretty sure to follow. More consultation was absolutely necessary, and before it was over Sile could announce from his perch upon the rock: "Coming! I can see Two Arrows."

Then there was a cheering, and Na-tekah felt all but proud of the noise made by the Big Tongue—there was so very much of it.

"Forward, men!" shouted Judge Parks. "We must be on hand. Come down, Sile. Keep near me."

Sile was down and mounted in a moment, but there was to be no great battle that day. The Apache "council of war" lasted until it could hear the cavalry bugle and the distant whoop of the Big Tongue. It could not hear the howl of One-eye, for that brave animal was sitting in the very entrance of the barrier guarding the notch, all alone except for the squaws. It was better to go upon any reservation, and to promise any amount and degree of good behavior, than to spend the remainder of that fine day in being shot and saved. So the council decided, and so, in due and dignified form, they announced

* Begun in No. 303, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"WHERE'S THAT MESSENGER?" SUDDENLY EXCLAIMED CAPTAIN GROVER."

to Captain Grover, before he had an opportunity to bid his veterans charge.

The official duty of the Captain after that was to disarm his captives, the weapons to be all returned upon reaching the reservation, and to order them at once into a camp by themselves, under a guard. Word was sent to Garry and his men to move the quadrupeds down the river as fast as possible, the prisoners there being untied and sent to their main body. Rapid orders were given, and were mingled with as rapid conversations with Judge Parks, Yellow Pine, and Long Bear.

"Where's that messenger?" suddenly exclaimed Captain Grover, after he had listened to the facts as to the sending of Two Arrows. There was a glow upon the brave soldier's face, and he was unbuckling the flap of one of his holsters, for he was yet in the saddle.

Two Arrows was summoned, and came forward, and a great many eyes were upon him.

"Young brave!" said Captain Grover, emphatically, "I never heard of a pluckier volunteer in all my life. Take that; keep your head level; that's all. You've more courage than you've any real need of."

"That" was a handsome silver-mounted army revolver. Given in that way, it was a mark of distinction for a great chief to be proud of, and Long Bear, indeed, was nearly as proud as Two Arrows.

"There, Sile," said his father; "see that you do as well with your advantages as that Nez Percé boy has done with his."

"I will, father; but why could he not have some more? What is to hinder him from going to school? There's all my gold, now, in the wagon; I'd spend a good deal of it."

"Sile, my boy, I've been thinking of it. We will do it. It's a good thing. The girl too."

It was time now for Captain Grover to ride in and see the notch and the mine, and to get the best dinner the miners and Ha-ha-pah-no could cook for him and his men. Then it was time for Na-tee-kah to go nearly wild with pride over her brother and his revolver. After that there was a long consultation between Long Bear and his children and Judge Parks and Sile. Two Arrows seemed to be inclined to say very little at first. He sat with his new rifle across his lap, and his priceless revolver resting upon that, and One-eye came and sat down beside him. Long Bear himself seemed to be in doubt as his pale-face friends urged upon him the advantages of their offer. He was hardly able to see what good there could be in the learning of the white men for a red horseman of the plains; but at last Two Arrows motioned to Sile for his spy-glass, hanging at his side. He took it, and looked through it at the distant mountains, and then turned to Long Bear, and pointed at them, saying: "Look! See!"

"Ugh!" said the old chief; "see heap."

"Now look. See," said Two Arrows—"see big heap."

"Ugh! Big medicine," said Long Bear, handing the glass to Sile; but Two Arrows arose, and stood proudly erect, rifle in hand.

"Will you go?" asked Sile.

"Go," said Two Arrows. "Good friend. Go. Got Nez Percé eye now; want pale-face eye."

"Ugh!" exclaimed Long Bear; "what Na-tee-kah say?"

The question was put to her, but it was hardly needful, after she found that Two Arrows was to go. She was willing to learn anything he did, and she was not even daunted by a quick mental vision of a white lady with her bonnet on. She would even wear the dress of a pale-face squaw if Two Arrows would put on such things as were worn by the Red-head. So it was settled, although it would be a number of weeks before the Judge and Sile could set out for their Eastern home.

At several points in the East there are schools designed and maintained for the special education of Indian girls and boys, only needing greater help from men and women who have money intrusted to them by the Giver.

Among all the tribes of the West, and in every band, Na-tee-kah and Two Arrows wait to be found and enticed into a training that is for their everlasting good and for that of their race.

THE END.

MR. THOMPSON AND THE HORNETS.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

MR. THOMPSON lay in the shade of the hedge, half leaning against the stump of a tree, and gazing up through the branches in a listless way.

"I wonder," he was thinking—"I wonder if those insects humming around are bees, or hornets, or just plain bugs. I wonder—wou—ner—wou-n-u—n—" and his murmurs became more and more indistinct, until they ran into a regular hum, as he breathed almost like the hum of the "bugs" he was wondering about. Suddenly he roused himself, and exclaimed, "Shoo!" making a vigorous dash at a hornet which was buzzing close to his head. "Go 'way!" he exclaimed, waving his hat, to the imminent peril of the numerous specimens which he had stuck on it—"go 'way! I don't want you."

"I thought you wondered what we are, so I came to tell you. That's no way to receive company, anyhow," buzzed the hornet, angrily, flying nearer and nearer to Mr. Thompson's head.

"I beg your pardon," said Mr. Thompson, hastily, for he had no desire to offend the warm-tempered little insect. "But I did not know you were calling on me. I thought you were just buzzing around, as it were, and that you might bump against me."

"And hurt yourself," said the hornet, sarcastically.

"Hem—hem—a-a-h! that is—is—is-s-s-s," said Mr. Thompson, stammering in his efforts to invent a reasonable excuse—"that is—is-s-s-s—" he kept on murmuring, until the hornet suddenly interrupted him with,

"There, now, I'm sure you look ever so much better than you did, and as for your voice, there can be no comparison."

Mr. Thompson was a little puzzled, and put up his hand to scratch his head. Something seemed to be wrong; he could not make out exactly what until he happened to glance at himself in the polished tin specimen box at his side. Sure enough, he was a full-grown hornet—rather a large hornet, but not noticeably so.

"Now, how much better you look!" said the hornet, complacently looking at poor Mr. Thompson; "how much more graceful! Why, you should really be proud of yourself. I can't see how you men can be contented with your great clumsy bodies, which it is impossible to fly with."

"What were you doing before you came here?" inquired Mr. Thompson, who had no idea of getting into any discussion of the relative advantages of being a man or an insect with so quick-tempered an adversary as his new friend.

"I was gathering building material," replied the hornet. "Now there is another place where we get ahead of you stupid men. You people— Well, if you didn't, some other men did. You people made a great fuss about having invented paper houses and water-proof paper. We have lived in paper houses made of water-proof paper which is made from genuine wood pulp. So you see the idea of wood pulp for paper is an old one with us."

"Is it so?" said Mr. Thompson, becoming interested. "How do you manage it?"

"Come along and I will show you," said the hornet, good-naturedly, leading the way toward a neighboring fence. The hornet perched on the top rail for a moment, just long enough to tear off a minute sliver with his strong mandibles, and flew off, chewing it to a pulp. Mr. Thompson followed to where, not far away, a large nest hung suspended from the lower branch of a tree. It was shaped just like a big pear, with the small end down. At the very point of the lower end was the entrance to the nest, a round hole about an inch in diameter. The hornet flew directly in here, and Mr. Thompson followed. The walls of the nest, which were made of successive layers of wood-pulp paper, were about an inch and a half in thickness. In the interior hung three layers of comb shaped just like a honey-bee's comb, but made of paper instead of wax. One remarkable thing which Mr. Thompson noticed was that these combs were not attached to the sides anywhere, but hung suspended from the middle of the roof. Hurrying all round were a number of hornets, which seemed to be engaged in putting the finishing touches upon the lowest comb.

"MR. THOMPSON BEAT A HASTY RETREAT."

"How many members are there in your family?" asked Mr. Thompson of his guide.

"About three hundred," was the reply. "We rarely have more than that, nor less than two hundred, in a nest."

"I disturbed a nest once with more than a million in it," said Mr. Thompson, with much feeling.

"Oh no; you only thought so," responded the hornet, good naturedly. "We are pretty lively when we mean business."

"What do you live on?" inquired Mr. Thompson, after looking around for some moments. "I don't see any honey."

"Oh, we don't eat honey; we live on spiders and flies and fruit; principally fruit—sweet pears and berries," answered the hornet.

"Well, what do you put in those comb cells?" inquired Mr. Thompson.

"Our children," responded the hornet, with an air of pride.

"What?" exclaimed Mr. Thompson. "Are those ugly white worms your children?"

"Ugly white worms!—ugly white worms!" shouted the hornet, pale with anger. "I'll teach you—"

Mr. Thompson waited to hear no more, but beat a hasty retreat, diving headlong out of the nest. He suddenly found himself lying on the ground under the tree, and the hornets coming out of the neighboring nest as fast as they could follow one another. "Just like a stream of molasses out of a jug," as Mr. Thompson said, when telling me about it afterward. The poor man sprang to his feet and ran as fast as his long legs could carry him, with the hornets after him in a solid stream. Fortunately only one or two caught him, but they left their marks on his face and neck, which were to him sufficient proof that he had not dreamed his adventure.

"For," as he very justly remarked, "a dream don't swell a man's head like this," and he pointed dolefully to a number of painful-looking swellings which had been caused by the stings of the indignant hornets.

THE LAKELAND SKATING RACE.

BY JOHN R. CORVELL.

I.

"I SAY, Joe, what d'ye think? Dan Hartley's going to try for the skates."

"Wha-at?"

"That's what he says, anyhow, and from the way he said it he expects to win."

"He win?" Joe Brown, the school bully, looked around at his companions with a sneer on his face. "I can beat him backward."

"Of course you can," agreed Ben Peters, admiringly. "Now, if it was washing dishes or scouring knives, he could beat you every time."

There was a general laugh at this, for Ben was famous for sarcastic speeches; quite as famous for that as for his fawning on the bully.

"What d'ye mean by that?" demanded Joe, with a grin of expectation.

"Oh! nothing; only as I came by old Sally Hunt's this morning, there was my lord, the Duke of Patches, washing dishes for dear life. Maybe he didn't look silly when he saw me!"

"Duke of Patches!" shouted Joe, with a loud guffaw.

"That fits him, Ben; heh, fellows?"

When the general laugh which followed this sally had subsided, one of the smaller boys said, half apologetically, as if afraid of offending Joe Brown, "Bill Willis says he's the best skater in Lakeland."

"You shut up!" growled Joe, scowling at the speaker.

"What does Bill Willis know about it?"

"He says he's seen Dan Hartley practicing on the lake every morning at daylight."

"Look at that!" exclaimed the bully, in a tone of intense disgust. "Isn't that just like his sneaking ways? He can't come out fair and square like the rest of us, but must go crawling out before daylight. I hate a sneak."

"So do I," assented Tom Grover. "He might have let me see the answer to that sum yesterday, but he wouldn't do it; he said it wasn't fair. And I had to stay in an hour for it after school."

"Well," exclaimed Joe Brown, "I don't have anything more to do with him. He's so mighty good; always perfect in his lessons, and all that. Just like a girl."

"He's too good for you, Joe," said Ben, in his most sarcastic tone; "and for me too. What d'ye say?" turning to the boys—"let's all cut him."

Some of the boys agreed willingly, but others of them seemed to feel the meanness of the proposal, and would have held back if they had had the courage to stand against the muscles of Joe and the tongue of Ben.

"Here he comes now," whispered Ben, suddenly—"the Duke of Patches."

The reason why Ben had dubbed the approaching boy Duke of Patches was evident at a glance. Patches were plentifully scattered over the clean but threadbare garments of the lad, telling a plain story of a hard struggle with poverty.

He was a slender, active boy, and there was a glow of cheerfulness and good temper on his bright face as he briskly approached the boys, most of whom suddenly busied themselves making snow-balls.

"Has the first bell rung yet?" he asked.

"Look here, my Duke of Patches!" Dan started, flushed, and looked uneasily, first at Joe and then at the other boys, as he caught the meaning of the brutal words. Some of the boys slowly moved away, ashamed to hear Dan hurt, but lacking the spirit to say so. Joe went on, "We've been talking about you, and we've made up our minds we don't like your sort. We don't like sneaks. You can just mind your own business after this."

"Washing dishes is his business, Joe," said Ben.

"So I've heard," said Joe, with a boisterous laugh.

The red and white chased each other out of Dan's cheek as he listened, and for a moment his gray eyes flashed and his hands closed convulsively; but the next moment, with quivering lips and moist eyes he looked beseechingly at his companions. The faces that might have been kind were turned away in shame, and the poor lad, feeling as if all the light had gone out of the world, walked with a swelling heart into the school house.

The scene was not over with his departure, however, for a pretty girl of about fourteen years of age, who had been an amazed and indignant witness of the meeting, spoke up in a voice full of wrathful scorn as the door closed behind the heart-broken boy:

"That was brave. You ought to feel proud. I'll just give you my opinion, Joe Brown. Dan Hartley isn't a sneak any more than he's a bully. There isn't any shame in wearing patches, but there is in twitting him with it; and if he helps a poor old woman by washing dishes and chopping wood for her, so much the more credit to him." And Bess Morton walked past the crest-fallen group with head erect and brown eyes flashing.

II.

There was not a boy in the Lakeland school who did not covet the beautiful pair of nickel-plated club skates which Judge Morton had offered to the best skater. The general expectation was, however, that Joe Brown would win them, for he was a remarkably good skater, and Joe was not a bit too modest to firmly believe the same thing. Nevertheless, there were nineteen other boys who had collected courage enough to compete; for the race had been so arranged as to give everybody the best possible chance.

The contest was to take place on the last Saturday before school closed for the Christmas holidays; and when that Saturday came, as it did a few days after the scene between the boys, all Lakeland crowded down to Lake Minnetuxet to see the sport.

For convenience the twenty contestants were divided into two parties of ten each. The winner out of the first ten and the winner out of the second were to decide who should have the skates by winning two out of three races against each other.

The course was two miles long. It so happened that Joe Brown was in one party and Dan Hartley in the other. The ten of which Joe was one were to start first, and a very eager, excited lot of boys they were as they stood in line waiting for the signal to start.

"Are you ready?" cried Mr. Steele, the principal of the school.

"Yes."

"Bang!" The sharp report of the pistol rang out into the crisp air, and the ten boys glided swiftly off on the smooth ice. For a few rods they kept well together, and then Joe Brown's jaunty red skating cap could be seen shooting to the front. He was the first to round the flag, and first to cross the line at the finish. It was a comparatively easy victory, and Joe was full of boast and swagger when his admirers crowded about to congratulate him.

The other ten now took their places, and the few who knew that Dan had been secretly practicing watched him curiously, but for the multitude there he had no interest.

Off they went. There was evidently no Joe Brown in that race, for the leadership changed half a dozen times before the flag was reached, and after it was rounded there were still four of the skaters who kept well together. On they came, almost in a line, and the spectators began to urge them by name—all but Dan Hartley, who, if not unknown, at least seemed to be friendless. Not one voice shouted his name.

Within a hundred yards of the finish the line broke, and two of the skaters took the lead. They kept breast to breast almost to the end, when the slim boy in the faded cap made an extra exertion, and shot across the home mark two yards in front of his competitor. Then people asked who he was, and Joe Brown discovered that he would have to struggle against the "sneak" for the coveted skates.

The races between the winners were to be of one mile only, and time was allowed Dan to recover from his exertion before he was called to take his place by the side of Joe. The excitement was very great, and not a few who disliked the bully would have been glad to see the shabbily dressed boy win; but his lighter build and his close struggle to win contrasted unfavorably with the stalwart limbs and easy victory of Joe.

At the signal they darted off swiftly, and everybody was astonished to see how the easy, graceful strokes of Dan kept him side by side with Joe, whose more powerful strokes made him seem to go faster than his antagonist. Almost in a line they swept around the flag. The real race had already commenced, for Joe made the most desperate exertions.

Dan fell behind about a yard, but there he staid, in spite of all Joe could do to get away from him. Joe afterward declared it was just Dan's sneaking way. As they approached the goal, Dan began to creep up, and Joe put forth every effort of skill and muscle to keep the lead. Nobody could guess which would win. It was a hotly contested race to the very last, when Joe, by a violent effort, threw himself forward, and carried away the outstretched line a foot in advance of Dan.

A tremendous cheer went up from the excited crowd, and Joe was hurried off by his jubilant friends to the little house which had been erected, and was heated by a stove for the benefit of the colder ones. An occasional word of encouragement greeted Dan as he skated quietly to the house, but nobody went with him to cheer him up for the next trial.

While the boys were resting a contest between the older girls of the school for some trifling prize was going on. By the time that was over, the two boys had their skates on again, and were eager to start.

Off they flew, and each was so anxious not to give the other any advantage that they skated together almost like one person. In this way they swung around the flag, and with heads up and bodies bent forward, swept swiftly homeward.

On, on they glided, with a quick shirr-shirr as the bright steel cut the smooth ice, and the nearly exhausted lads strained every nerve and muscle to gain but an inch on each other. Nobody could guess which would win, and the rope was almost within reach before Dan, seeming to call his whole body to his aid, fairly hurled himself forward and carried away the line, winning almost by a hair's-breadth.

Naturally the intensity and closeness of the struggle between the two boys made the spectators only the more interested in the final race which was to decide the contest, and as a consequence very little attention was paid to the match between the smaller boys with which the time of resting was filled up.

"Who's going to beat this time, Joe?" asked one of the boys, as the contestants were taking their places at the starting-line.

"I am," answered Joe, with an ugly scowl on his face. "I'll beat that sneak or burst a blood-vessel."

And it really did look as if he would keep his word, as far as regarded the blood-vessel anyhow, for he started off with a violent energy that for a few moments gave him the lead. But the effort was an unwise one, as it put him out of breath too early in the race, and enabled Dan not only to overtake him, but to pass him soon after rounding the flag.

He did not get far ahead, hardly enough for those in front to notice it, but quite enough to make Joe furious, and to cause him to exert himself to the utmost. Down they rushed toward the rope, and the crowd, thoroughly excited, broke into loud cheers and yells of encouragement. All at once, not thirty yards from the finish, Joe was seen to throw up his hands, waver, and almost fall. It was but a moment lost, but it gave an easy victory to Dan, and he was declared the winner, notwithstanding it was shown that Joe had broken the heel-strap of his skate.

III.

On the Monday following the skating match the Lakeland school-house was packed with scholars and visitors, the latter having come to witness the closing ceremonies and the giving out of the prizes.

Anybody who had looked would have been certain to notice that Dan Hartley was exceedingly nervous and fidgety during the giving out of the prizes, and when his name was called as winner of the skates, everybody did notice that he changed very rapidly from red to white, and walked hesitatingly up to the platform. He looked very uncomfortable as he stood on the platform while Mr. Steele, holding up the glistening skates, began: "It gives me great pleasure, Daniel—"

"Stop, if you please, Mr. Steele."

"NOT THIRTY YARDS FROM THE FINISH, JOE WAS SEEN TO WAVER AND ALMOST FALL."

It was Judge Morton, the giver of the skates, who spoke. "I am sorry to interrupt you, but my duty compels me to do so. Did you"—he turned to Dan—"win these skates fairly?"

"Ye-ye-yes, sir," stammered Dan.

"Are these your skates?" The Judge spoke sternly, and held up an old pair of skates.

Dan nodded, for he could not seem to find his voice, while his face was fairly pallid.

"I did not need to ask," Judge Morton said, turning to the astonished audience, "for the skates had already been sufficiently identified. This boy"—pointing to Dan, who was looking around as if for some avenue of escape—"has been guilty of the most contemptible trickery. The proof is plain. I think he will not deny it. In one of his skates is a strap marked J. B. On the ice, after the race, was found a strap—a strap which had been cut, and which is the mate to the strap in this other skate. The cut strap had been in the skate of Joseph Brown, and was the cause of his nearly falling. The strap marked J. B.—Joseph Brown—does not belong to Daniel Hartley's skate. Is there any doubt as to who put Daniel Hartley's cut strap in Joseph Brown's skate?"

The stern Judge paused and looked at Dan, who stood trembling like a leaf on the platform, casting the most piteous looks at his accuser. For a moment there was a hushed silence, and then there broke out a loud murmur of contempt for the boy who could be guilty of such baseness. Suddenly a low sobbing wail was heard from the back part of the room—"Oh, my Daniel!"

Everybody heard it and hushed. Dan heard it. For a moment he seemed about to faint; the next instant he straightened up, and with flushed face cried out, "Mother, don't believe it; it isn't true."

And before anybody could recover from the surprise of this scene, another voice—a ringing, girlish voice—was heard from among the spectators: "Indeed it isn't true. Please let us pass."

Judge Morton, in bewilderment, looked at Ben questioningly, and the wretched boy, with downcast eyes, told how Joe had induced him to cut Dan's skate strap.

"But the strap was in Joseph's skate," said the Judge.

"I did that, papa," said Bess. "I didn't mean to; but I saw Ben doing something to Dan's skates, and when he was gone, I examined them. I saw the cut strap, and as there wasn't time to do anything else, I took a strap out of a pair lying near and put the cut strap in its place. I didn't know it was Joe's skate. I intended to speak of it afterward, but forgot it until you spoke just now."

Nobody doubted Bess, so Dan not only got the skates, but what he valued more—the good-will and fellowship of his class-mates.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAS," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER III.

IT would be hard to say just what Jo Markham's feelings were the next morning, when, dressed in her new attire, she hurried along Sailors' Row, eager to gain the better part of the town before her rude assailants waylaid her. In her neighborhood a new bit of ribbon, some fragment of finery, a feather, a bit of lace, or a pair of new boots might be made objects of envy and admiration; but by instinct Jo knew that a whole "new rig" would be hailed by her companions with shouts of derision, if not actually laid violent hands upon; and Jo, usually fearless and bold as any of the rough crowd, felt for the first time in her life a dread of encountering ridicule. In her rags, with bare feet, with her old hat on her head, or the head bared to the sun or the wind or rain, she felt equal to any emergency which her friends might produce.

"THE CHILDREN THOUGHT NOTHING SO DELICIOUS AS HER PICTURE STORY-TELLING." DRAWN BY W. T. SHIPLEY.

She saw Faith's white dress under the trees as soon as she turned into North Street, and so approached with a little of yesterday's defiance.

"Come in," called out Faith, cheerily—"in by that lower gate, Jo."

And Jo did as she was bid.

She found out that she did so all that morning. Miss Emerson took her down to the gray school-house, where there chanced to be no session that morning, and showed her where she could sit if she would come. It was a pleasant place near a window, and the chair was cozy and inviting. One of Faith's ideas was to have no benches.

"I want to make them feel themselves individuals," she had said to Mr. Benedict, the minister, when he objected to some of her notions. "So every child had his or her own chair; sometimes they moved them about, sometimes they sat in little groups, or drew near to Faith's own easy-chair and pretty desk. In winter-time there was an open fire, and the children took turns in caring for it.

Pictures hung about the walls—pretty colored prints, about which the children liked to hear stories. Faith let the "good" ones take turns in choosing a picture, and then she invented the story, pointing out the various points of illustration as she went along. One picture the children never tired of, and this represented a farm scene: some figures were coming down a long wintry road; lights burned in the house windows; some dogs were leaping joyfully about. How many stories Faith had told her children about that picture! Sometimes the figures were supposed to be weary travellers seeking shelter; sometimes they were the "family" returning home. Then the various rooms had to be pointed out, and a description of what was going on inside the house given. Altogether, the children at Miss Emerson's school thought nothing so delightful as her picture story-telling.

Mr. Benedict one day found Faith and her cousin Bertie engaged in this occupation, the children grouped eagerly about, animation and pleasure on even the plainest countenance. He listened with grave interest, and after that never objected to any of Faith's "peculiarities."

"I see what she is doing," he said to his wife that evening; "she is working those children up to all sorts of appropriations without their knowing it. Her kind of object-teaching is certainly a success."

Jo stood still, looking about the room with a sullen expression of astonishment.

"This ain't a school," she announced, suddenly, and flashed a defiant glance at Miss Emerson.

"Jo," said Faith, quietly, "this is my school. If you come to-morrow you will see the scholars and just how I teach them."

Jo made no answer, but moved about the room, looking at one thing and another.

"Sit down in your chair," said Faith, cheerily.

Jo obeyed. For an instant she remained motionless; then she lifted her eyes to her new friend and smiled.

"Guess I'll come," she said, in a timid voice.

And quite early the next day Jo appeared.

Among the scholars were half a dozen girls and boys whom Jo knew, and at sight of them the girl from Sailors' Row shrank back, and but for Faith's uplifted finger and warning look she would have fled.

"Come in, Jo," said Miss Emerson, rising and taking the girl's reluctant hand. "Children," she continued, "this is my friend Jo Markham, Jo," she persisted, quietly, "perhaps you would rather sit by me just now"—and before a word could be said, Miss Emerson had drawn a low stool into the shelter of her desk. Faith pulled open one of the drawers of her desk and took out a bag of various colored scraps.

"Jo," she said, loud enough for every eager little ear to hear, "will you help me for a while with these? Will you pin together all the different colors?"

Jo raised her eyes. Now it had never occurred to her that fun, or "having a good time," could be had in anything but her wild romping and playing, or fighting with the children of Sailors' Row. No sort of actual amusement had she ever known. Long ago she remembered the joy of an old doll found in an ash barrel, and she still treasured a box covered with shells which her grandmother had given her. But to find pleasure or amusement in anything so peaceful and simple was a wholly new and confusing idea.

Faith knew just how it was. Although she understood that Jo was different from any other child she had encountered, yet her varied experiences taught her that "beginnings were not to be made with books and lessons and much talking." Jo's first lesson was learned as she, with trembling brown fingers, sorted out the heap of pretty colored scraps.

The other children were having a little "talk" about geography. A map hanging on the wall was presided over by a tall boy, who pointed out the different countries as Faith's "story" went on. Then some questions followed.

"Jessie Duncan," said Faith, "suppose you wanted to go from England to France, how would you go?"

Jessie, a prominent pupil, answered, loudly, "Across the Channel, ma'am."

"And if you went to France, what people would you find?"

"French people."

"And in England?"

"English."

"Well, then, tell me, how did those French people first come to settle in that country?"

And so on and on, the very simplest questions impressing the most important facts.

Sometimes Faith let her hand drop and touch Jo's curly head with a gentle stroke. It was her only acknowledgment of the girl's presence until the class was over. Then she said to the new-comer, "How are you getting on, Jo?"

And Jo pointed in silence to her work. The little heaps were sorted, so far as color went, but in a very disorderly condition.

"Now, Mary Brown," said Miss Emerson, "I want to see if you know how to arrange these and pin them together."

It was her way of showing Jo how to do it, and Miss Emerson was rewarded for her care by seeing that Jo's eyes were keenly observant of Mary's work, and she even volunteered some assistance. Whatever the girl had dreaded from the first morning's experience, certainly the reality was pleasant to her. Sitting on the little bench with the pretty calicoes and bits of gingham, she liked to hear the cool sweet tones of Miss Emerson's voice even though all the words were like Greek to her untutored ears and mind.

"Well," said Miss Emerson, "you did very nicely, Jo; now let us have a little lunch;" and forthwith Miss Emerson produced a tempting-looking basket, out of which she took sandwiches and cakes and apples, and sat down in one of the leafiest windows, and ate her luncheon with Jo—Jo, the roughest, rudest girl in Sailors' Row.

But even Jo felt that there could be no approach to that familiarity which breeds contempt in this action. Gradually she found herself looking more and more at her new teacher; it seemed easy now to meet the glance of those sweet dark eyes, and Jo, in a rough, blunt way began to talk. Before they parted, Faith had begun to see a little into the girl's nature. Mind, heart, and soul were all unawakened, but Faith knew she would slowly find her way to those buried depths which God, putting into every human being, must have breathed into even this poor little wanderer.

CHAPTER IV.

FAITH met Bertie on her way home, or I had better say he met her, for Faith was walking with downcast eyes and a little happy smile touching her lips gently. Bertie, striding along North Street, saw her far in the distance, and read the meaning of her expression. He had seen Jo on her way to the school, and to tell the whole truth, had walked around the school-house unseen, and had taken a quiet glance at the teacher and her new pupil. He had seen Jo's eager though frowning study of the scraps, and he had seen Faith's slim white hand with the little hoop of pearls on it stroking the rough brown head just below her.

As they drew nearer to each other, Faith's smile deepened into a look of pleased recognition.

"All right, is it, Faith?" said the boy.

"Oh, Bertie!" was Faith's exclamation, with a long-drawn sigh. "Yes, I hope so. Here, come in to dinner with us. I have been making believe eat my lunch with Jo Markham. There is Kitty Barker in the window."

When the cousins entered the house, Kitty darted forward to meet them.

"Oh, Faith, you dear thing!" she exclaimed, rapidly, "Miss Grace has been telling me all you have been doing. Why, I really believe you will reform that girl."

Faith felt somewhat annoyed to hear Jo spoken of in that way.

"I don't know that she is so very hopeless, Kitty," she said at last, trying to smile. "It seems to me that, so far, the only hopeless part has been the way we all neglected her. Now come in to dinner," she continued, smiling upon the young people, and leading the way into the luxurious dining-room, where already Miss Grace was waiting with just that touch of impatience in her manner with which she always greeted Faith's return from any charitable undertaking. Miss Grace could not have said just what it was that annoyed her, for certainly no one could have been more entirely free from ostentation or foolish zeal in what she did than Faith Emerson; yet in the aunt's heart was always a desire to see her darling more luxurious in her tastes, more inclined to be a sort of princess than a little philanthropist in Ashfield.

Faith did not discuss either Jo or the school at the luncheon, and Kitty Barker readily launched off upon other topics—Ashfield festivities, tennis, lawn parties, all manner of amusements, in which she was just beginning to take a decided part. Half a dozen girls in Ashfield, of about sixteen years of age, like herself, were known as the "Buds." Faith was not very much older, but somehow no one would have dared to give her the title. Slight and girlish and fair as she was, there was something that defied anything unworthy a "little lady"; yet there was fun enough, and gayety, and that truest sort of joyousness—that which comes from a "soul at peace, a heart at rest."

Kitty delighted in being talked about by the boys in Ashfield as one of the "Buds."

"Fred Larcom is going to have a yachting party next week for us," she said, gayly. "I just heard of it at Mattie Root's. Won't we have a splendid time! You will be there, Faith, of course?" and Kitty's little dainty eyebrows were lifted as she glanced at her young hostess.

"Oh yes," responded Faith. She was by no means above the ordinary enjoyments of youth, and all the little summer fêtes gathered their charm from her presence.

Bertie began chaffing Kitty on her newly acquired rights as a "Bud," and declared that, on her account, he intended that all the boys at the academy should adopt a pink rose-bud for their parade bouttonnière.

Between this and the day for the excursion Faith had her hands full of many home employments. Some cousins from New York arrived—school-girls, who looked forward to the home in Ashfield as a paradise. With them Faith entered heartily into all sorts of summer fun and frolic, and toward the end of the week a large and gorgeous circus came to the town.

I have never known definitely whether Miss Grace knew how to account for the presence of some thirty young people, chiefly of the Sailors' Row district, who assembled in the circus grounds early, and entering, took prominent and certainly well-paid for places. Bertie distributed the tickets. Of course he had not pocket-money for such an enterprise; but Faith's eyes, meeting his, twinkled suspiciously during the performance, especially when Jo Markham's enthusiasm over the trained dogs knew no bounds, and Sandy Martin forgot to make himself disagreeable to his neighbors in gazing upon the feats performed by the gentleman with the balls and rings.

To see that company from Sailors' Row dash out upon the green where the tent had been pitched, dazzled, delighted, for once in their lives thoroughly happy, Faith declared at tea-time did her heart good; and when Miss Grace said it was simply shocking to see such a set of children attending the performance, Bertie said:

"But, Aunt Justina, we need a wholesome amusement once in a while for ourselves; why shouldn't it be the same for them? Just because they are poor and can't buy the tickets for themselves, is that any reason some one else should not give them the treat? When I have a whole Sunday-school under my control, I mean to have regular old-fashioned fun all around once in a while."

The circus had come and gone from Ashfield, however, and Bertie Farnham was going home, about nine o'clock, from his cousin's house, when he passed two or three of the men whom he had seen lounging about the tent doors. One of them was Sandy Martin's father.

The men were grouped against a railing on the cliff, and talking together in low tones. As Bertie passed them by he caught part of a sentence which rather surprised him.

"He says the girl knows all about it," one of the men was saying. "The young lady has her up at the house all the time, and if she can not help the job along—"

Then the words died away on the summer air. Perhaps they would have remained longer and with more purpose on Bertie's mind had not he and his comrades at the academy been so occupied at the time over the famous Barnabas "six-and-six" match, which always wound up the summer holiday. At all events, when they did recur to him, he wondered at his own stupidity.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE OCTOPUS, OR DEVIL-FISH.

BY SARAH COOPER.

THE only group of mollusks remaining for our study is that of the Cephalopods—a group which contains the most highly organized animals among the mollusks. The name cephalopod is derived from two Greek words which mean feet on the head. To this class belong the octopus, or octopod, cuttle-fish, squid, etc.

With one exception cephalopods have no shell. The body is covered with a thick bag or mantle, which is beautifully spotted, and which possesses the power of changing its color. The color is generally a mottled brown, but when irritated it changes to a reddish or purple hue, passing rapidly from one tint to another.

The head is distinct from the rest of the body, and contains nervous ganglia protected by a covering of cartilage, which is the nearest approach we have seen to the brain of vertebrates. The large staring eyes are likewise more nearly perfect than any we have yet found.

The eight arms, or feet, whichever we choose to call them, surrounding the mouth are the most striking feature of the octopus (Fig. 1). They sometimes grow to a great length, and they have two rows of suckers on the under side (Fig. 2) which adhere so firmly to surfaces that these animals are dangerous foes. Fastening the suckers to their prey, they draw it down to their mouths, and hold it firmly until it is torn in pieces.

The mouth opens into a throat which is well supplied with implements for crushing food. In addition to a lingual ribbon, there are two large horny teeth, which from their shape are known as the "parrot's beak" (Fig. 3).

Fig. 2.—SUCKERS ON THE ARM OF A CUTTLE-FISH.

and the octopods are enabled to escape from their enemies. This ink is sometimes used in water-color painting under the name of sepia. In fossil octopods the contents of the ink-bag have sometimes been dissolved, and still yield sepia of a good quality.

Octopods are found in most seas, those living in mid-ocean sometimes being very large. Within the last few years some large specimens have been taken on the Newfoundland coast. They are active creatures, often jumping out of the water, and they have a strange fashion of swimming backward. Their only means of propelling themselves is by forcing water out of the funnel. The jets drive them backward, and the arms trail uselessly after them.

Fig. 3.—THE "PARROT'S BEAK"

They also walk head downward, with the rounded body above. They prefer, however, to lie partly concealed by the rocks, with their arms floating round in search of something to kill, for they are extremely greedy, and they destroy large numbers of fish, crabs, and mollusks. Like the tiger, they seem to find pleasure in killing more than they need to eat. Their hiding-places are sometimes discovered by the number of dead shells scattered about. Octopods, in turn, are destroyed in large numbers by porpoises and whales.

The cuttle-fish (Fig. 4) is much like the octopus, but it has two tentacles longer than the arms, with club-shaped ends. There are also narrow fins at the side of the body, and the mantle is supported on the inside by a thin plate which is known as the cuttle-fish bone.

Many of you no doubt keep cuttle-fish bones in your bird-cages. Look at one, and you will find it has no resemblance to true bone, being formed of layers, as shells are, with a hard covering. As the captive bird pecks at this it obtains small particles of lime, which substance is needed for forming its bones. Birds living in their native freedom select for themselves such articles of food as they require, but when deprived of their liberty, their little masters and mistresses become responsible for all their wants being attended to.

Cuttle-fishes do not lie concealed in caves waiting for their prey, but they come out boldly, and give their victims a fair chance.

The octopus and cuttle-fish both attach their eggs by a cement secreted within them to branches of sea-weed, where they hang like bunches of grapes (Fig. 5). The mother sometimes selects a snug retreat in the rocks for raising her young family, and barricading the entrance with pieces of rock or heaps of shell, she allows no one to enter.

She is said to examine her eggs and rub them, sometimes syringing them with her funnel as if to keep off parasites. In about five weeks the eggs are hatched. The little creatures are about the size of a grain of rice, with eight points where the arms will grow, and they already have the power of changing their color.

In many countries these evil-looking creatures are used for food. They are highly esteemed on the shores of the Black Sea. Being neither meat nor fish, they can be eaten during the long fasts of the Greek Church.

In Southern Italy the octopus is taken alive to market, and displayed in large tubs filled with sea-water. Here the animals writhe and twist their arms, and display their dread suckers. All look straight in front of them with their great eyes, and at frequent intervals discharge water violently from their funnels in short, quick jerks. When a purchaser has selected one, the salesman seizes the octopus by the neck, and kills it by a skillful twist.

In these papers you will, of course, expect to find only that which is strictly true, and as it is difficult to know how much of fable may be woven into the wonderful stories that are told of devil-fishes, I will omit all anecdotes concerning them.

Little Boy Blue:

Allegro.

Little Boy Blue, come blow your horn, The sheep's in the meadow, the cows in the corn, Where's the boy that mends the sheep? He's under the hay-cock, fast a-sleep.

The musical score is written in 2/4 time and consists of three staves. The first staff is the melody, the second is the piano accompaniment, and the third is the bass line. The tempo is marked 'Allegro'.

HIGH SPORT.

"Oh, little girl, high in the air,
Pray what are you doing up there?
On a telegraph pole
You sit—'Twas my son,
I wonder how ever you dare!"

"And did you chance never to spy
A little girl sitting so high?
With bread-crumbs I fish,
To make up a dish
Of cock-sparrows, baked in a pie.

"Kind sir, since you see I'm so busy, Pray don't talk, or you might make me dizzy." H. MacD.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE Postmistress thanks all the little friends who have sent her pretty Christmas cards, holiday messages, and pressed flowers in recent letters. She wishes she could take every little hand in hers, and tell the dear boys and girls how much she wishes that the Post-office Box could be the brightest, sweetest little corner of coziness and comfort in the world for every reader. Try to feed to the Postmistress as you do to a dear auntie who has time to listen to your little troubles, to advise you when you are perplexed, and to help you keep your pretty little innocent secrets. Remember that she is delighted to receive your letters, and that she considers her boys a perfect guard of honor, and her girls are as lovely as a garland of flowers in her partial eyes.

Now, Little Housekeepers, where are the white aprons and the caps? Are the bowls and spoons, the sieves and the egg whisks, the cups and saucers, and muffin rings and pans, all in good order? For we must have a cooking lesson soon, you know.

Two Little Housekeepers have lost their receipt for chocolate caramels, and want another. Who will first send a very good one? Another wants to have a candy pull, and must know how to make the best molasses candy I could tell her myself, but I prefer to let you do so.

And, boys, here is a bit of work for you. Who will write the best letter for publication in the Post-office Box, with this for the topic, "My Favorite American Hero, and Why I Revere Him?" Frost! The pens begin to flourish. It's almost dark, so I'll put mine away for to-day.

Now for the letters. I wish I knew where the dear child lives who writes No. 1, but she forgot to tell me:

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I would very much like to be one of your little girl friends. I read Harper's Young People. My eldest brother brings them home. I like the letters about the boys and girls very much. I want to tell you about my pets. I have a little black kitten about as big as a tea-cup, and she is quite old, so I think she will not grow any more. Do you think she will? I had another kitten, which was white. She stole some meat one day, and Dick brought her out to the fields and hit her with a stick in the head. Dick is not my brother, but he lives near us. My sister Florence, who is six years old, saw the poor kit, and she nearly died with the fright. She brought him home to mother, who was very grieved, and who made a bed for it in the back kitchen. He was so nearly killed that his eyes were shut and his poor legs hanging dead; so, you see, as we could not get her to drink milk, we left her in bed near the fire, and in the morning, when my sister Agnes went out to the back kitchen, the poor kit was alive, and her eyes were quite bright, and she grew up a big cat, though she nearly choked herself after that with a cord. I have a lovely little dog, that follows Floss and me everywhere. We are living in the country, and we get lots of lovely flowers in spring and summer. Papa brought us two very large dolls when he came home in the summer, and my brother brought me a lot of little dolls. We have a donkey, and his name is Jack, and he comes when we call him. He is pretty old now—quite as old as Floss. He is awfully cute, but he is very fond of eating sweet-peas. He is very quick at driving us in to town, but we will get a pony soon. Florence and I have a castle in the roof of a tree in the meadow, and there is a ground of moss, but this getting too cold now to play there. We have a swing too, on the sycamore tree on the lawn, and a hammock. Our large cat often takes a swing. There is a lovely little baby living near us. His dear mamma died when he was born, and his grandma is his mother now, and we go to play with him so that he shall not be lonely for his mother. He is a sweet little fellow, and grows when he sees us. I think I have told you everything now, except that my eldest sister is our governess. She teaches us all our lessons. Floss, Jack, and me. I am nine years old. I was born on the 29th of February. I have a birthday only once in four years.

Your loving little friend, VIOLET F. L.

MADEIRA, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have taken in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since last January. I like it very much. I liked the story of "Holl House" very much, and was very sorry when it was finished. I also like the last story by Louisa M. Alcott, and "Two Arrows." I like very much. I also take in Nicholas. I am trying to make a collection of stones, but I have not got to make very many yet, as it is only three months since I began. I have been dressing a lot of little Chinese dolls for a bazaar; they are so quaint! I dress them from the ready colors I can find. I have seen Chillon Castle at Montreux as well as L. S. B., but I am afraid I have not been clever enough to write a piece of poetry about it. I think it is a lovely place. I got quite a quantity of flowers there, and I pressed them, among them a lovely wild lily, but unfortunately it has lost its color. I have no pets, but there is a big black retriever called Zulu which we keep in the yard. I am very fond of him, and he of me. I am thirteen years old. I hope my letter will not be too long to print; it is my first.

HARRIETTE M. J.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

My home is in Louisville, but I go to school in Danville, and I shall be ready to enter Centre College. For pets I have a large dog and some pigeons. I go hunting quite often.

J. R. K. (age 13).

BASFORD, STONE-ON-TRENT, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have never written to you before, but I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time. I take St. Nicholas as well as your paper, and I like them both very much. I am nearly eight years old. I should like very much to see my letter in print. I have done two charades all by myself. You will find the answers to them on another piece of paper. I am a little American girl. With love,

I remain yours truly, M. G. R. L.

BINGLEY, YORKSHIRE, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a little boy of nine. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since October, and like it very much. The story about Captain Trusty I like very well; if everybody would keep their place as he did, it would be better. For pets, I have two dogs and a cat. The dog's name is Rover and Fido, but I have no name for the cat. I go to school, and study reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and grammar. I live in the country, where there are woods and a stream. I have been to Worcester three times this year. Your little friend,

HERBERT MULDER D.

INGATERSON, ESSEX, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am five years old; my birthday is on the 5th of September. Katie is writing this for me. I have a box of tools. We have a very large nursery with a rocking-horse in it. We have a large Noah's Ark. There is a hay-stack down in the garden. I have a garden all to myself. I think the pictures in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE are very pretty. Good-by.

LICKS S.

THE MARSH, ABERDEEN, SCOTLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am seven years old, and I live in a manse in Scotland. My mamma came from America, and I have two aunts, one in Kentucky and one in Virginia. My mamma sends me this magazine. I have two little sisters, Frances and Mary, and one brother, Robbie. He has a cart, and one in Virginia. The play-house belongs to us. I have two linnetts in a cage. Papa calls Frances and me his little linnetts. Papa teaches us every day in the study. I have lessons in a nice Prima book. English is written in a copy-book. I never wrote before, so I wish very much to be put in. Your loving little friend,

BESSIE H. Y.

BASSOCKS, SESSON, ENGLAND.

I thought I would write and tell you about an outing our school had a little while ago. We started about eight o'clock, and took our dinners with us. We went to Newhaven, about fourteen miles from Lewes, and we had a picnic about eight miles off, along the foot of the South Downs. We passed by Plumpton Church, which has a wonderful echo. If you shout out a few words, they will be echoed, and if several persons shout, the echo sounds as if some people inside the church were mocking you. When we came in sight of Lewes, we saw a Perceps steamship with its red castle peeping out from among the trees. Before we got to Lewes we passed Mount Harry, where the battle of Lewes was fought. The castle was built by William de Warenne, who married Gundrada, the daughter of William the Conqueror. We then went to Newhaven by rail. In the harbor was a Perceps steamship with salt-petre, which had been in a collision, and they had had work to keep her afloat, and the other vessel sunk. We went over one of the steam-packets, the Delphin, that ran from Newhaven and Dieppe. We also went over a Norwegian vessel, the Tasmanian, from Christiana, with timber, the captain was a Perceps, and very few fellows. We went into an iron foundry, where they were making a large boiler, and a man showed us how steel is punched and cut. Afterward we went to the harbor, and there is a large fort at the entrance of the harbor. We had tea at Newhaven, and after that we rode back to Lewes, and from there we walked back to Hassocks by moonlight. I have nothing more to say, so good-by. PAMEL W. S.

COLUMBIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I live in Columbia, Lancaster County. Bert and I have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas gift for three years. We did not have a tree this year, because our great-grandfather died a few days before Christmas, but we had a Christmas party very prettily and had a tree and a stocking for mamma. We got over so many useful little things, as cotton, needles, a pin-cushion, a tape-measure, pins, and buttons, that I did not like to bring them. The stocking was filled to the brim. Mamma was so surprised; she thought it was a stocking that we had filled for a little colored girl. I think "Two Years Ago" is splendid, and I hope it will continue a long time. I like Indian stories. I have been reading Cooper's novels, and also "The Red Rover," "The Two Brothers," and "The Lone Ranger," and am now reading "The Pioneers." BESSIE F.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

This Christmas brought me many presents, but none more acceptable than a receipt for another year's subscription to this dear paper. Although I take the paper, the big folks of the family seem to enjoy it too. I have a sister named Eleanor, and we have very nice times together. She is only ten years old, but I am very proud to be in my "teens." HALLIE S. E.

THE LITTLE STREET-SWEEPER'S DREAM.

"Oh dear, how I do wish I were rich! How nice it would be to sit in velvet chairs and to have little dresses and other fine clothes!" said the little street-sweeper, as she saw some children going by.

"Come with me, then," said one who was at hand.

Jennie (for that was her name) looked around, and saw a lovely little lady standing on a stone, who had always been taken for a fairy.

"Follow me," she said.

Jennie followed her till they came to a trap-door in the pavement, and then down a flight of steps into the most beautiful room Jennie had ever seen, all lit with lamps of glow-worms.

Jennie changed too. She was dressed in silk and satin, and with much more than she had. So good many children playing around in this lovely room. Pretty soon they came over where she was, and began talking to her, with all kinds of toys, and with dolls, books, and all kinds of beautiful toys.

Then some other fairies came in and asked her to go into their room. The children ran to her, and Jennie followed, and saw a beautiful table with gold dishes, lovely flowers, and everything good to eat that could be found in all this world.

"I am so hungry," thought Jennie, "and how good it all looks!"

Jennie was just going to sit down, when she felt a rough hand on her shoulder, and a policeman's voice.

"What is the matter, little girl—are you lost? and who are you?"

"I am Jennie," "I was asleep," and I am only a little street-sweeper, after all!"

I have a large dog, and he is very wild and strong; I drive him in a wagon. I can do Kensington painting. I have painted three Christmas presents. One present I received was a Wooden toy containing a house. I bought it for a few times of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884, and I subscribed for 1885 and 1886; I could not get 1887, because it was the year of the war. I have never written a letter for the Post-office Box before, but I hope this one will be published. W. M. G.

NEW GEMESSE, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

I live in Washington Territory, on the Puget Strait, on a spit five miles long, in the new Gemesse Light-house. My father is keeper, and has one assistant. The house is of gray sandstone, 29 by 40 with a round tower in the center, from the centre to a height of 100 feet. There are 120 steps in the spiral stairs leading to the lantern at the top of the tower. The lantern is entirely of iron and brass. In front of the tower is the beautiful Dungeness Bay and the country back, while far in the distance is the beautiful Olympic range of mountains nearly all the year covered with snow. Every winter parties of hunters go up into the mountains to hunt. We have had no snow yet, and in the yard there are surprising quantities of flowers, and marigolds, and cabbages, and other vegetables growing in the garden. I have two brothers and two sisters, and a mother and a father. We have a little cow and calf, some chickens, a dog, and a cat. Four hundred feet from the house is the fog-whistle. ALBERT A. M.

This letter is the production of a boy only ten years old, who can not attend school, because there is none near the light-house which is his home. I think he has described the light-house very well, and I fancy some of the boys will wish they might pay him a visit.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are two little children, a boy and girl, and we have taken this paper for two years. The stories we like best are by Lucy C. Ellis, Jimmy Brown, James Otis, and William O. Stoddard. We like "Two Years Ago" very much. We have had a very nice Christmas, and a great many presents. Good-by, with love, from BIRNIE and SAMMIE N.

GUNSDON, COLORADO.

I am a little girl five years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly two years. I like to read, and one sister and I have a cartary which we call "New Year." I have never gone to school, but expect to begin in January. My sister reads the stories to me, and I like them very much. BESSIE L. E.

GUNNAGE, ST. MICHAEL'S, SASKATCHEW, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I thought you would like to know about my little white kitten, Eva, she is so sweet. She was born on the 23rd of July, last summer. I was so pleased when I saw your thought Eva Grace a pretty name! After she has eaten her food, she tries to purr it as a dog would, but never shows any other feelings. She likes to play under the sofa cushion when I put my finger through to make a little house, but her favorite plaything is my pocket handkerchief. I can hear her one of the ends, and she will peck, puts her tail high in the air, and marches away with it tossed over her back to her bed, where she lies down and after a while it is very tame, and sometimes she purrs if only the tip of her tail is touched.

I have made a pen-wiper from Elith L. Johnson's description, and it has been much admired. I send you a picture I painted of Eva, and some violets that grew in my garden. If you can find my next letter near my birthday, you will be glad of the gift of January. KATIE W. (aged thirteen).

I have tried to gratify you, dear child, but your birthday will be a month old before you see this in type.

SALEM, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have a little sister who is eight; her name is Annie. I go to a private school, one door off, so it is very convenient. I study French, history, geography, arithmetic, spelling, and reading. Our pets are two dogs, two horses, and a cat. My uncle gives my sister and me our lovely paper. We all enjoy it very much. My favorite stories are "The Ice Queen" and "Roll House." If you ever come to Salem, won't you come and see me, please? I would be ever so glad to see you.

Thank you, Katie.

GUNSDON, COLORADO.

We live on the western side of the Rocky Mountains, fifty miles beyond the Marshall Pass, the summit. I have taken this periodical for two years, and like it very much, especially the Post-office Box. In reading one of the letters some time ago, about some girls in New Orleans who had never seen snow, I thought I would speak of it here. In 1883 we were found with about three feet of snow, but had sleighing for nearly six months, about one foot of snow has fallen here this winter, and the mercury has been down to thirty-one degrees below zero. We have three brick school-houses, two of which are now occupied this winter, with an average attendance of two hundred and fifty pupils daily. The skating is splendid. There are two rinks, and one ice rink, two blocks from the school-house, and I have been spending my mornings there. The markets here are well supplied with venison, and I constantly buy some of the best venison of deer and elk, killed within a few miles of town. The Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school has an average attendance of over one hundred persons. The next time I write I will describe my beautiful mountain town. I remain your faithful reader, GRACIE R.

Let the next time come soon, Gracie.

JERSEY LANEING, CALIFORNIA.

We have a small school here; there are eleven scholars, and I am the teacher. I am ten years old, and live in the country. It is about two miles' walk to school. I live on a farm, and my father has a great many horses and cattle, and I like to ride on his back very much. I have three colts and one horse. J. EVERETT U.

The boys who live in town will think Everett has fine times in the country.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl ten years old. I live in the city in winter, and in summer I go to a very pleasant place called "Brighton," which is the "mas Club" was very nice. I copied some things for Christmas from it. I think Aunt Jennie was very kind. I hope you had a merry Christmas! I had. May I belong to the Little Housekeepers' Club? With much love, MARGARETTA H.

Of course you may.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I took HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE all last year up to the time we were away, but I took full I did not begin again, because papa said I brought enough papers and magazines. I was very much worried about this, as I wanted to take it again this year; so, much to my surprise and joy, I found on Christmas morning a year's subscription to the paper among my presents. I think Mrs. Lillie's stories are very much liked. I am going to inclose in this letter the answers to two enigmas, and also one composed by myself. I will have to stop now; so good-by, and a happy new year from MAY H.

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBRASKA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am ten years old. I am the only boy. I have two sisters older than myself. I think Mrs. Lillie's stories are very nice; Daisy; I'm very gentle. I have a cartary, which I think is real try to name as Bessie C. child. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and like it ever so much. EDGAR C. L.

THE LITTLE RED DRUM.

WHENEVER I play on my little red drum,
Some one of the family's certain to come
And frighten me out of my life and my wits,
And take it, and threaten to smash it in bits.

I just think it's mean I can't have any fun
From the bust of the morn till the set of the sun;
And if they can't stand my tum-tumpy-tum,
Oh, why did they buy me a little red drum? R. K. M.

THE "FOOL'S CAP" TRAP.

OF all oddities of the trap kind, there is perhaps no one more novel and comical than the "Fool's Cap" crow trap. Crows are by no means easy of capture in any form of trap, and they are generally as coy and as shrewd in their approach to a trap as they are bold in their familiarity and disrespect for scarecrows. But this simple device will often mislead the smartest and shrewdest crow, and make a perfect fool of him, for it is hard to imagine a more ridiculous sight than is furnished by the strange antics of a crow with his head imbedded in a cap which he finds impossible to remove. The cap consists of a little cone of stiff paper, about three or four inches in diameter at the opening. This is imbedded in the ground up to its edge, and a few grains of corn are dropped into it. The inside edge of the opening is then smeared with bird-lime.

The crow, on endeavoring to reach the corn, sinks his bill so deep in the cone as to bring the gummy substance in contact with the feathers of his head and neck, to which it adheres, in spite of all possible efforts on the part of the bird to throw it off.

ELIPHALET'S GOLDEN RULE.

ELIPHALET JAMES
Doesn't like to play games
Of any sort whatsoever.
Be it tag or tennis,
With Dick or Dennis,
Or any one else as clever.

But he'll fly a kite
From morning till night,
At the risk of losing his dinner,
Or will run a race,
If he has first place
And a chance of being the winner.

He never will play
At ball or croquet,
Which others enjoy intensely,
But will sit in a nook
With a story-book,
And laugh and giggle immensely.

He plays off jokes
Upon other folks,
And finds, oh! lots of fun in it;
But if Jack or Jim
Plays a joke on him,
He is out of sorts in a minute.

And I venture to say
There are boys to-day,
Not far from Trinity temple,
Like Eliphalet James,
Who never play games,
Except upon other people.

A VERY INTERESTING STORY.—DRAWN BY P. NEWELL.

A HUNT FOR ELK CALVES.

BY LIEUTENANT FREDERICK SCHWATKA.

IT was well along in June of one year that, with another officer for a companion, some twenty or twenty-five cavalry soldiers, and two army wagons to carry our effects, we started for the haunts of the elk. Ten or twelve miles of our march next day brought us to a little lake, which, though full enough in the spring, is dried up in the long summer. It is called Elk Lake, because a number of years before we had killed some elk here in the winter. From this point on we were expected to "keep our eyes open," for elk might be seen.

Next day three or four parties were sent out in different directions, and with four or five picked men to accompany me, I started early on a northward course. Having ridden nine or ten miles without seeing any sign whatever of elk, we turned abruptly to the westward, going a like distance on the new course. It must have been fully two o'clock in the afternoon when we came upon a fresh trail of elk, leading off to the westward also, and we followed it about an hour at a good brisk trot before we sighted the animals. As we had seen them first, we withdrew under the ridge from whence they had been sighted, and gave our horses a chance to get their wind. Then noting the herd carefully, we began winding through the valleys and passes between the hills to get as close as possible before making the final dash. Here we rested a minute or two, getting our lassos ready, and then crawling up to the ridge, darted rapidly over it for the game we had seen hardly a hundred yards away a couple of minutes before.

It was gone. There was not a sign of a hoof or hair of the large herd we had seen but a few seconds before on the little plateau over which we were charging.

"They have got our wind and gone!" was the exclamation of more than one, and we dug spurs into our horses and fairly flew across the place. The instant we came to the crest, there was the whole band of elk grazing along its foot, and our rapid pace had carried us right in among them before they knew what to think. In a few seconds, however, they had recovered from their surprise, and were scurrying away over the sand hills. I picked out a fine calf in one of the herds into which they split, and hurriedly arranged my lasso to throw it over his neck, but he seemed to think that his mother could take better care of him than I possibly could, and he stuck so closely to her side that I could not get a chance to throw my lasso.

Two or three times I dashed at them, shouting, but they would not separate, and my horse was showing signs of fatigue. In one of these dashes I got so near that I thought I would make the attempt anyway, and I gave the rope a toss for his head. The noose fell along his back, neck, and face, even to his nose. Had it gone two or three inches farther it would have fallen over his head, and I would have had him by simply tightening up the noose. I tried to toss it over him yet by giving a spiral twist to the rope, but it kept slowly dragging to the ground, and running directly against his mother, her body scraped it off of his, and it fell between them. In the dust and the sand the two kicked up I could not tell exactly what had taken place; but I saw the rope spinning out like a trout-line from a reel, and a second after saw what had been done. I had lassoed the old cow by one of her hind heels.

The vaqueros of Mexico may be able to hold the wildest Texas steer with the lasso, and even the horsemen of the South American pampas to curb the strongest wild horse, but I do not believe I held that cow-elk a quarter of a second after she had gotten to the end of the lasso, and had given one or two of her desperate kicks.

Although I did not succeed in entangling the young elk, all this fierce clatter around his ears got him separated from his mother, and leaving the rope to chase the latter,

I devoted myself to the calf. Once or twice I thought I could jump off my horse, run two or three steps, and catch the calf, but the minute I got to arm's length of the bridle, the horse, from exhaustion or fear of the calf, would not budge another inch, and I would have to mount him again and spur him on.

After a number of such unsuccessful attempts—for I really had no other method of catching it without my lasso, and I dreaded dropping my horse's bridle for fear he would run back to camp—I was at last rewarded by getting hold of the calf by the ear, and what with the little one's terror at my strange method of attack, and the unwillingness of my horse to have anything to do with the small elk, which kept up a constant bleating, I thought I should be pulled in two. They even got me thrown to the ground, and my mouth and nose full of sand. I could spit it out of my mouth, but dare not disengage a hand to do anything else.

After a struggle of ten or fifteen minutes, probably, that seemed nearly half as many hours, the two others gave up the struggle enough for me to throw the calf, and taking the buckskin string with which a cavalryman ties the end of his pistol holster to his right leg to prevent its striking him hard blows when running, I tied my capture by the fore-foot.

In a few minutes I heard double shots off to the south of my position, the signal we had agreed upon to show that the person firing had captured a calf and wanted assistance. Going to the top of the nearest hill, I planted the butt of my carbine in the sand, tied my big neckerchief to it, so as to guide me back to the spot, and rode over to the place, where I found the man with another calf which he had lassoed.

In a few minutes all the men had come together, my calf was brought over, and the next question was how to get home with them, for we were a good fifteen to eighteen miles from camp.

We adopted the following plan, and found it work splendidly. The stirrup straps were shortened until the rider's knees were level with the pommel of the saddle. Into his lap thus formed the calf was placed, facing the rear, one arm passing under its head, which rested on his shoulder, and the other passing behind it. Its bound feet, passing to the rear, were again tied to the rear girth of the horse. The bridle was thrown over the horse's head, and another rider led the animal. This was all right, except in going down-hill, when the short stirrups and the calf pulling forward made the rider feel sure he was going to pitch forward over the horse's head. An extra man, therefore, was sent ahead to pick out the most level trail over the hills.

Although a little tiresome, by changing places twice we all got home that evening in fine shape, and I seriously doubt if we could have done so in any other way—at least so well for the little ones.

Once home, we kept the elk calves in a stable for a few days, and then turned them loose into the garrison inclosure, where they were given the range of the premises. They were very tame, and great favorites with the soldiers, who were constantly petting and feeding them, and as you can readily imagine, with so much care and attention, they grew up to consider themselves part of the garrison.

It was a warm day in the late fall that I was sitting on a camp-stool in the shade of my horse, when all of the small elk, the last year's capture, came walking slowly along through the open gate that led into my yard. The hall door was open, and the leader, a handsome little buck, peeped in. At once his gaze seemed riveted, and without taking his eyes off of the interior, and with ears sharply set forward, he walked up on the porch, and after gazing for a few seconds, walked in. The other nine elks followed his example, and when the last one disappeared in the hall—a very large one, as big as an ordinary room—I went to investigate, and saw a sight that would have made a horse laugh. There in solemn array stood the row of little ones, in as perfect a line as the soldiers (from whom they may have copied it), their heads elevated and ears pricked forward, gazing most intently at a fine set of elk's head and horns that I had had mounted and set up in my hall a couple of days before as an ornamental gun-rack.

For a half-hour they gazed at it, touched their noses timidly to its nose, and then walked away, and for days afterward they would visit it, and when romping on the parade-ground would run up to the hallway, look in, give a snort, and tear away again, as much as to say, "Come along, old fellow, and have a good time."

THE DOCTOR'S "GREAT MEDICINE."

BY DAVID KER.

"WELL, Doctor, what news?"

"Oh, the red-skins are having a talk down there, and by the way some of them looked at me as I passed, I should say they mean mischief."

"Hum! That's awkward."

It was awkward indeed. The two men who were speaking and the two American hunters who accompanied them were the only white men among a whole tribe of Indians, and if it came to a fight (which seemed probable enough just then), their Indian guides were quite as likely to fight against them as for them. What was to be done?

"They know that we've come to trade with them," growled the younger man, "and that we must have plenty of things with us that are worth taking, and if they choose to get them cheap by simply cutting our heads off, I don't quite see how we're to hinder them. What fools we were to come here at all!"

Little did the discontented speaker dream that, not many years later, thousands of white men—ay, and white women and children too—would be carried safely and easily across that wild region by express trains running from one side of the American continent to the other, and that the very name of the Indians who were now threatening him would then be almost forgotten.

"Waiting a bit," said the Doctor. "I've got a plan."

"Have you? What is it?"

"Well," answered the Doctor, stepping into the rude wigwam allotted to them, and bringing out a small brass-bound box, "I heard one of the Indians say something just now about 'the bad spirit that came among them twelve moons ago, and killed many of their warriors with sickness.' Then I noticed that several of them were marked with small-pox, and that was what gave me my idea."

But before the Doctor could explain what his idea was, the young Indian chief was seen coming up the hill toward them, followed by fifteen or twenty of his best warriors, all well armed, and looking unpleasantly fierce. Instantly the two traders seated themselves in the door of the wigwam, with the two hunters standing behind them, rifle in hand, ready to fire at the first sign of mischief.

The Indians sat down in a circle right in front of the white men, but for some minutes not a word was uttered. At length the young chief himself rose and spoke.

"Pale-faces! ye have hunting grounds of your own far away toward the rising sun and the great bitter water. Why come ye hither into the lands which the Great Spirit has given to his red children, to trouble them and do them wrong?"

"There is a cloud before the eyes of my red brother," answered the Doctor, in the same language, "or he would not speak thus. We come not to trouble or to wrong our brothers who live toward the setting sun, but to trade with them and to be their friends."

"Friends!" echoed the chief, scornfully. "These were the words of the pale-faces who came among us when the leaves were green twelve moons ago. But when they had eaten of our venison, and smoked the pipe of peace at our fire, they stole from us and cheated us. Their scalps now hang in our wigwams, and perhaps," he added, patting his long knife significantly, "there may be other scalps there soon."

A stern hum ran through the listening circle of Indians, and for a moment they seemed about to spring up and rush upon the Americans. But just then the Doctor rose, and holding up his hand for silence, spoke thus:

"Chief of the Shaways! we have come to you as guests, and now ye threaten to kill us because ye think we are few and feeble. But the white men, though few in number, are mighty in skill. See!" (and he pointed to the brass-bound box at his feet). "In this box I hold that which can sweep you all from the earth as the wind sweeps the dust of summer."

The threat was uttered so firmly and so boldly that several of the superstitious Indians were seen to exchange startled glances, and the young chief himself began to look uneasy, although he tried to mask his agitation by answering, haughtily:

"Words are not as sharp as tomahawks, nor as heavy as war clubs. Let the pale-face show us that what he says is true."

"Good," said the American. "Let the chief lay his buffalo-robe on this log."

The Indian wonderingly obeyed. The Doctor let fall one drop of liquid upon it from a phial which he took out of the box, and when he held up the robe, the savages saw with secret terror that it was scorched right through as if with a hot iron, and that a hole was burned in the wood below it.

"Can ye bear a shower of rain like that if I bring it down upon you?" cried the American, sternly. "Or what will ye say if I turn your streams into blood? Look here!"

He filled a bark cup from the brook, and with one drop from a second phial out of his wonderful box turned the clear water blood red.

The Indians looked at each other in silent terror, and even the daring young chief drew back.

The Doctor eyed them in silence for a few moments, as if to let this lesson sink well into their minds before he went any farther. Then he stooped once more over the inexhaustible box, and drew forth a third phial, which he held up so that the whole assembly could see it.

A fearful-looking phial it was in the eyes of the dismayed savages—long, narrow, with a neck twisting like a snake, and all of a jet-black color, with which the ivory stopper, carved into the shape of a skull, contrasted grimly enough.

"Behold!" shouted the American, in a voice of thunder; "in this bottle I hold the spirit of the small-pox who destroyed so many of you twelve moons ago. Say but one word more, and I will let him loose to sweep you from the earth."

A cry of terror broke from every lip, and in a moment the whole band (including even the chief himself) were at the feet of the "medicine-man," imploring him not to smite them with the fatal pestilence whose awful ravages were still fresh in their memory.

"So be it," said the Doctor, with the air of a king receiving a deputation. "So long as the hearts of the Shaways are clear and their tongues straight, all shall be well; but the moment a cloud rises between us, the death phial shall be opened."

The mere threat was quite enough for the terrified savages, and although the Doctor's fair dealing afterward won the favor of the whole tribe, their awe of his "great medicine" never quite wore off.

PYRAMID MOUNTAIN.

WATER.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

ALL that we are told about the creation of the earth in the Bible is just the simple fact. It is left to us to study how this fact came to be. The Bible says: "In the beginning (God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void [or empty]; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." That is the history, in a few words, of millions of years, before plants or animals or people lived upon the earth. We can only guess how this great round world came into being. Perhaps our guesses are right, but there is nowhere an answer to the enigma of the past with which we may compare these guesses to see whether they are correct.

So we will only go back to the time when the earth was a rocky globe, intensely hot inside, and covered with a universal sea, when the earth, as it moved round the sun, might be compared to a mighty drop of dew moving round a globe of glowing fire. We must get rid of all our notions of the world as it is now, in order to go back in imagination to that time. The earth was not beautiful then, the land was not adorned with trees and grass and lovely flowers, the air was not full of humming insects or swift-flying birds, nor the waters of darting fish and delicate floating sea-weed. It was a desolate waste of waters, a shoreless sea, whose tides, instead of rising and falling and breaking upon some sandy beach, followed the moon, sweeping unbrokenly around the globe. There were no blue skies overarching the wide waters, no fleecy clouds turning to gold in the sunsets. A heavy mass of leaden clouds covered the sky, and poured down into the hot seas hot rain-water day and night.

The only things in the world then were rocks and water, fire and air. But as the earth cooled, these began building the continents and islands, and dividing up the waters into seas and rivers and lakes.

First came the fire and lifted up part of the earth's crust in his struggles; another part of the crust would go down, and into these low valleys the waters would collect, leaving the high bare rocks standing up out of the sea. In this same way many islands and continents arose out of the sea. Next came the turn of the air in the work of world-building. The air around the earth then was like the air now, only that it had a great deal more moisture in it, and the gas that comes from burning—called carbonic acid gas—than our air has. Such air as this has a very peculiar effect upon some sorts of rock: it slowly dissolves them; the waves of the sea, or the rivers pouring over the rocks, soon carry this dissolved rock, or earth, as it really is, away, and finally it settles in the ocean, forming layers of soil, which after a while become solid rock again. Then again these layers are uplifted, and again they become rotted partly away, carried off, and deposited. In the first illustration you see a very remarkable mountain in our Western country. The layers of rock look as if they had been built, and the little cones of washed earth around the base as if they were cut out of the rock, but this is all the water's work. This is not mere guess-work. The world is not done yet: it is still a-making; just the very same things are happening now in various parts of the world as went on of old.

Islands have suddenly risen out of the sea, and men away by the waters till in one place an archway has been made directly through them.

When the layered rock is lifted up, it is of course very much strained and cracked; the water gets into these cracks, and so does its work much faster. The Clett is a single pillar of layered rock standing up in the sea. The layers in this rock correspond exactly to those on the cliff nearby, showing that it was once part of a great cliff reaching out into the sea.

have seen them. At the mouths of great rivers and in the bottoms of ponds land is forming all the while. In some places, on the dry land, rock where it stands is rotted into earth, and gradually washed away by the rain, and where the weather is cold enough to freeze, this work goes on faster still. When you have an opportunity to examine a piece of brown stone, used so much to build houses of, or as facings to brick houses, look carefully at it. You will be apt to find that there are on the surface loose flakes which you can rub away with your finger. Brown stone is full of little cracks and crevices and openings—the water soaks into these, and when it freezes it pries off the piece of stone above it; the ice, taking more room than the water, acts as a wedge. When the earth became cool enough to permit the rain to freeze, the rocks were in this way more quickly reduced to earth.

Just the same things went on in those days that go on now, only they were more violent. The cool crust of the earth was thinner; the inner fire, therefore, oftener succeeded in breaking its way out; the earth was more shaken; its crust was more torn and crumpled. There were, of course, more earthquakes, a larger number of volcanoes, and greater quantities of rain fell into wider seas.

See the picture of the Rocks at Brough. These cliffs have been slowly deposited in layers, and then lifted up by the fire, tilted as you see, as they were raised, and then again they have been worn

THE "CATHEDRAL," LURAY CAVES, VIRGINIA.

Water does some very wonderful things when it falls over a precipice, and so makes a cataract. At Niagara the waters of the great lakes on their way to the sea fall over a high precipice of rock. This precipice is made of very hard rock on the top, while the layers underneath are much softer. The boiling of the waters as they tumble over the high cliff gradually wears away the softer rock below, then the upper layers stand out like a shelf, and over this the water falls. The rush and strain finally crack off the projecting shelf, and it breaks and falls; then again the softer rock is hollowed out; another shelf forms and is broken away. In this way the waterfall has worked its way backward for seven miles, as the rocks on each side of Niagara River show.

Great rivers like the Mississippi wash up earth where they flow swiftly from high land to low land; when they come to a more level country they "slow up," and begin to drop the earth. Anything which makes the current run slower causes this sort of a deposit. Where two currents meet, as where the Ohio flows into the Mississippi, the two jostling together hinder each other, and in the contest earth is dropped, and a sand bar is formed, making the river very shallow there. No matter how many times such a bar is removed, it comes again. Where the Mississippi empties into the Gulf the current spreads out, and so slows very much, and a great deal of earth is dropped.

Some rivers in India have built up their beds by dropping earth in this way all along through the low plains, until the bottom of the river's bed is higher than the country around. When the river overflows its banks, the fields beyond the high bed are flooded. Then, when the river sinks again, the water can not get back into the channel, and it lies on the fields and kills the crop.

Some kinds of rocks are more easily dissolved by water and carbonic acid than others. When layers of different kinds of rock are exposed to the air, they crumble away very unevenly, and so make curious-shaped rocks, sometimes standing up like monuments in the sea or on land.

In rocks which are not dissolved in this way the water sinks into the cracks and flows away, doing very little work; but in limestone rocks, which the water does dissolve, the crack is washed larger and larger, till a cave is hollowed out in the solid stone down under the surface of the ground. The water goes on trickling and dripping from the roofs of these caves, and decorates them just as the freezing water in winter decorates the edge of your portico roof with icicles. I am sure you have often watched icicles form. As the rain fell from the roof, drip, drip, drip, each little drop left a little bit of itself behind frozen, and so an icicle gradually grew from these many drops.

But perhaps you were too busy looking at the sky, to see if it were going to clear, to notice what happened underneath the icicle on the portico steps or the ground. There each drop left a little of itself again before running away, and a heap of ice was formed. Now in the limestone caves just this sort of thing happens. The water, instead of leaving a little of itself frozen behind, leaves a little of the limestone that was dissolved in it behind, and great stone icicles are formed, which never melt. These are called stalactites, and below them the mounds of stone grow up, often far finer than the stalactites. The stalactite from above and the heap of stalagmite below often meet, and so form a pillar from floor to roof. Some of the best examples of these formations are found in the Luray Caves, Virginia.

These limestone caves are sometimes so near the surface of the ground that the roof gives way, broken in by the roots of a tree, and down goes the living tree into a great hole in the earth. In the Western country some of the rivers rush into such openings, and run under-ground for miles, and are called lost rivers; but far away perhaps the same river comes to light again, though it is not always recognized as the same.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOESE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER V.

THE day of the yachting party was not as bright as the "Buds" could have wished. A thin fog gathered before they were well out; but the company was a very happy one, and bent on enjoying every instant. Faith was certainly in radiant spirits; she loved the water, and felt full of youth and vigor and happiness. Things seemed very bright to the young girl just then; it was impossible for her to doubt anything or anybody, so that it was a little jarring to have their chaperon, Mrs. Keith, pin her down in one corner and reprove her for "taking up" Jo Markham. Did she know the girl had once actually stolen?

Faith's lips curled slightly as she asked, briefly, "When?" "Last summer," Mrs. Keith said, as earnestly as she could, and manage her white silk parasol at the same time. "She was actually arrested for it."

Faith looked down at her gloved hands, and said presently: "I will ask Jo all about it, Mrs. Keith; but even if it were so, it would be an additional reason for my taking an interest in the poor child." And the dark eyes, lifted tranquilly, challenged little Mrs. Keith to say anything further.

But all the party had reason to remember Jo that day. Not far from shore, but in a fog, they came to a standstill. It was growing dark; the pleasure of the day was nearly ruined by the prospect of such an ending, and those whose spirits had been lightest sank to the ebb where grumbling comes in.

While the depression was growing general, the sound of a horn suddenly reached them, blown somewhere not far off. It was answered in the best way they could contrive: then sounded the splash of oars; gradually out of the fog appeared the bow of a boat; then the whole boat defined itself, and finally Jo's figure, her strong arms working valiantly; but before any one spoke, she called out, roughly, "Got Miss Emerson there?"

Faith was at the side of the little vessel in an instant, and looking down, said, "Why, Jo, yes—here I am."

"I'll row you back," was Jo's laconic answer. She rested on her oars and lifted her eyes to Faith's. Apparently she did not consider the fact that any one else was on board; but it ended in Jo and her boat being made most useful in conveying the party to shore; and when once all were landed, and some one pressed forward in a conspicuous way to reward her, she flashed an angry look in return and said, brusquely:

"What do ye think I come around there for? I see your boat when I was out, and thought like as not you'd get stuck, and I knew you had her—and that's all I cared about."

Angry, defiant, and rebellious, Jo strode away in the direction of Sailors' Row, leaving her passengers to laugh heartily over the scene.

All but Faith and Bertie.

The cousins exchanged looks as they walked up the road from the pier, a little behind the others. Faith was smiling.

"Aren't people stupid?" she said to Bertie. "They judge of poor Jo by her blunt way, her rude speech, which in such a girl means just nothing at all. It actually counts for nothing, as it is what she has heard all her life. As well expect Kitty Barker to talk modern Greek because she has been in Athens as to expect Jo to understand the commonest form of politeness in our language. That is what aggravates me so," continued Faith, her eyes shining: "people insist upon judging a girl like Jo from their own stand-point. Now see here, Bertie"—and quiet Faith turned around, energetically facing her cousin with real excitement of voice and manner—"how much worse is it of Mary Leigh and Kitty Barker to talk as they did to-day than for poor Jo to even fight those boys!"

* Begun in No. 334, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Of course," assented Bertie.

Faith walked along in silence a moment. She felt full of righteous wrath, and that she could vent her feelings to this devoted ally and confidant was a source of comfort.

"Jo meant to do a real service, and it was fine of her—fine, I say—to refuse the dollar Mr. Larcum offered her. Think of all it would have done for her, and yet the girl was too fine to take it."

The result of all this was a more decided championship of Jo Markham than ever. Ashfield began to feel that Faith Emerson really was carrying her charitable enterprises a little too far when one Sunday she walked into church with the girl, well dressed, by her side, and entering the pew, handed her a book, and during the whole service kept tender watch of the uncertain little face and hands, the reluctant figure which looked ready to fly out any moment. It is true that Miss Grace was not with them. She had feebly and vainly objected to this open championship of Jo, and had pleaded a headache to escape accompanying her niece that morning, and Faith wisely forbore commenting upon it when they were dining at one o'clock.

These summer days, when there was no regular Sunday-school, Faith had her children for an hour in the school-house, and this was Jo's first day of attendance, but in the middle of it she walked out, and of her own accord sat down upon the steps. She could not have said why, but she had a stifled sort of feeling that day. Her grandfather had been, as usual, with his most disreputable companions on Saturday evening, and the girl in terror had spent the night in a neighbor's attic, not sleeping, but crouching in a window where she could watch the rickety dwelling her grandfather called home, and seeing that he did not do anything very desperate. Fire was her horror, having gone through it once. Only her promise to Faith had made her dress herself in her "good" clothes and go with the young lady to church; but already, even though in a dull way, Jo was beginning to feel the effects of Miss Emerson's method with her—that she was a friend. Something of Faith's own purity and strength, her simplicity and straightforwardness, was reaching the other's heart, and although Jo could not have even defined it as an idea, there was a sense of room to breathe and move and grow and be restful when she was near her protectress.

It was on the little back porch of the house that Jo sat. From there she could see the hilly slope, green and warm, and the strip of beach, and the shining hazy water. The girl strained her eyes to look for the distant sails in the harbor across the bay. The one bit of sentiment or poetry or romance in Jo was her love of the water, and the objects she had long known as moving upon it. Perhaps it was only an instinct or a craving after a freer life. "If I were a boy," she thought, "I would get on one of those ships and go sailing away, and away, and away forever. I guess I'll tell her that." She wondered how it would feel if you were very tired, and lay right down in the water and got drowned. Fishes would eat you, Jo supposed. She remembered when Mark Welch was brought into Sautors' Row drowned. He certainly did not look particularly comfortable, or as though he had had a nice time in the water. But it would be cool and quiet anyway—certainly better than the dirty crowded little kitchen, with her grandfather seolding and storming or beating her for everything.

From the open school-room door Jo could hear the children's voices rising and falling, not very tunelessly, but the singing rather pleased Jo, although the words of Father Faber's hymn meant nothing to her.

"Joy! joy! the mother comes,
And in her arms she brings
The Light of all the world,
The Christ, the King of kings,
And in her heart the while
All silently she sings."

The words here and there rather caught Jo's fancy, and she began to beat time with her foot. She had no idea that from her desk Miss Emerson was quietly watching the tired little figure in the doorway.

The hour was ended, the children were preparing to depart, when up the cliff came a boy's figure, one Jo knew only too well—that of her special tormentor, Sandy Martin. He approached, executing one of his most warlike dances, and grinning derisively at Jo.

In an instant the girl's whole attitude changed. From one of listless, contented idleness or rest, it was alert, tense, and defiant. Sandy represented Sautors' Row—all its cruelty, meanness, and contention. Miss Emerson, the school-house, everything connected with her new life, vanished in a sort of angry mist as the boy flung a taunting remark at her before he was on the top of the hill. He had been away lobstering for weeks. Now he had come back. Jo rose to her feet, and Sandy might have seen that her eyes and her attitude were ominous.

What jeers and sarcasms and taunts the boy uttered Faith never knew, but her first consciousness of his presence was seeing Jo in the heat of battle; hearing her, as Sandy drew back, with a derisive peal of laughter, cry out: "I hate you! I hate you! I wish you were dead! I hope you'll be dead, dead, dead, and that you'll be burned up! I wish I could kill you, and I would!"

The girl, with her great eyes full to the brim of burning unshed tears, stood out in a patch of vivid sunlight, drawn to her full height, her hands clinched, the impersonation of passionate, vindictive rage.

Faith stood still in the centre of her school-room just long enough to comprehend the situation and to compose herself. Then she turned to the children, who were gazing upon the scene open-mouthed and open-eyed.

"Go," she said finally, with a queer little tremble in her voice. "Go, children; do not wait, if you please."

They drifted out of the other door and down the warm, dusty slope, regretfully enough, for Jo Markham was a sufficiently interesting "character" to make them anxious to stay and see the result of this meeting with her well-known foe, Sandy Martin.

Sandy, flushed, dogged, and angry, was leaning against the side of the school-house when Miss Emerson's figure appeared in the doorway. He looked down sullenly, twirling his hat in his hand.

Faith could hear Jo's quick, short-drawn breathing, but she did not look at her.

"Sandy," she said, quietly, "I am sorry you like to tease any girl. Now go away like a good boy. Or stay—will you do an errand for me?"

The boy raised his eyes a moment, and his lips seemed to try and form a "yes."

Faith turned hurriedly back to her desk, wrote a few lines to Bertie, and came back, handing the little note to Jo's tormentor.

"Please, Sandy, take that down to Mr. Farnham's, and bring the answer back to my home on North Street."

Faith turned to Jo; the girl had begun to droop; she had her hands tightly clinched against her breast, and her eyes were fastened upon Miss Emerson with the look of some poor hunted creature, but the anger had not gone; the color in her face flamed, and Faith could see that her worst feelings still held her in their control.

"Jo," said Faith, gently, "come in here, dear."

The girl followed, and Faith sat down, not by her desk,

"FAITH DREW THE GIRL'S HEAD DOWN UPON HER KNEE."

but near the fragrant fire-place. Jo flung herself upon the ground and burst into a passion of tears.

Faith said to herself afterward that it seemed to her as if the child were crying out the whole agony and cruelty and vindictiveness in her life. She neither spoke nor moved for some time; then, laying her hand on the rough brown hair, she said, quietly, "Jo, look up; let me talk to you."

Jo started up, and resting on her knees stared at Miss Emerson, her eyes heavy with weeping, her face crimson and yet haggard.

"Jo," the young lady said, drawing the girl toward her, "I know it was hard; I know how cruel Sandy seemed; but then, my dear, you know we all must do our part. Jo, see here."

Faith had been very careful not to force any religious ideas suddenly upon Jo, but now a thought occurred to her.

"Jo," she went on, "I want you to look at that picture."

Jo raised her heavy eyelids and wearily followed the direction of Miss Emerson's eyes. They rested on a simple picture of our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane. Faith, desiring a religious picture in the school-room, had chosen this one as the most appropriate for stories of Christ to her children. The silent garden, the divine heroic figure, the sleeping disciples—these gave her the themes she needed; and the children had learned to think of Christ as the Saviour who longed to be remembered and loved and appealed to. If He was lonely, tired, and forgotten, could He not understand the better our poor human desolation, our sadness and sorrowfulness? This is what had been in Faith's mind when she chose the picture; and now, taking Jo's hot hands in her own cool, tender ones, she said, gently:

"Jo, did you ever notice that picture up there? I want you so much to look at it, and let me tell you a story."

Jo drew nearer, though still in that half-crouching attitude, and with the strained look in her eyes. Faith contrived to get her on a little footstool beside her, and then she drew the girl's head down upon her knee.

Nothing could have been more difficult in her dealings with Jo than to know just how this story should be told. At that moment the poor child was all roughly, coarsely, angrily, wearily human. Faith had to think of the best way to show her that Christ in His most glorious divinity was filled to overflowing with a knowledge of just such human needs as hers; that it was for such as her, poor Jo

Markham, knowing nothing better than Sailors' Row could teach, that He had given us His life and His death.

But it was hard. Faith for some moments was silent; she stroked the brown head on her knee, and looked beyond it to the open door, the stretch of warm summer country, the placid, shining sea. Afterward she used to think with a curious feeling of the convictions that came to her in that hour; that she, as well as Jo, had a "part to fill"; that for some reason her life duties were growing clearer to her; and so, you see, Jo taught Faith almost as much as she was learning. The school-room never seemed quite the same to Faith after that afternoon. Perhaps there had been a little too much sentimentality in the way she had first gone into her work. The children had been fairly good. Faith liked surrounding them with pretty objects, idealizing their dreary lives, which was all right, and certainly had proved successful; but now she had been brought for the first time face to face with something that was like a concentration of all the elements she had expected and yet dreaded to encounter in her children. Jo, like a tired wanderer resting her head on Miss Emerson's knee, was terribly real.

TOBOGGANS AND TOBOGGANING.

BY N. P. BARCOCK.

IF there is any more healthful or invigorating sport for boys than coasting, it does not at this moment come to my mind. I have often thought it a great pity that there could not be some arrangement, some edict of the Mayor and Aldermen, or somebody or other in authority, whereby such streets as East Thirty-fifth Street, for instance, which have steep hills in them, could be set apart, whenever there should be snow on the ground, for the exclusive use of the boys of New York. It is quite melancholy to think that there are thousands of boys now growing up in New York who have no more idea of the delights of going down-hill on a "Boston clipper," or even, for that matter, on an ordinary ten-shilling sled, than has the most ignorant heathen in Africa. Fancy their having no notion in the world of the joy of plunging headlong through a spray of fleecy snow from the summit of a noble hill down into the level valley below! Fancy their being in complete ignorance of what it is to perch sideways on a four-foot cutter, and be carried as on the back of a flying steed over a road of glistening ice and snow!

In certain parts of New England that manner of mounting and managing a sled (which consists of sitting on the left thigh, with the left leg well curled up under you, and the right leg extended as a steering gear) used to be, and, for all I know, is to-day, described as "going New-Yorker fashion"—a pleasant bit of sarcasm, no doubt, invented by some country lad in mockery of the misfortunes of his city cousins.

It is not, however, with coasting in the old-fashioned manner on cutters, clippers, "double-rippers," or single "sharpies" that this article proposes to deal. It is the sport of tobogganing as represented in the accompanying picture that commands our attention. The toboggan owes its origin to nobody in particular. Originality is claimed for it with equal reason at the hands of the Canadian Indians and the Russian peasants.

I am quite positive that there are many boys who will eagerly inquire in what respect the toboggan is better than the two-runner sleds to which they are accustomed, and will want an explanation of the reason why tobogganing has in so many places superseded the old-fashioned manner of coasting. I hasten to explain to the proud owner of a steel-shod "sharpie" that it is not because the toboggan is a faster steed than his fleet pet. You may give yourself no uneasiness, my young friend, in regard to the superiority of your "sharpie" or your "cutter" as a rapid traveller. No toboggan that was ever built can give you its dust, or rather its snow. The truth is, American-made sleds have proved to be too fast for the steep Canadian slides, and if placed on some of the artificially constructed ice slides where toboggans are used, would become entirely unmanageable. In addition to its greater safety, the toboggan also has the advantage of carrying its rider or riders close to the level of the snow, thereby producing an exciting sensation of sliding down hill with nothing under you—a sensation so delightful that the Governor-General of Canada himself does not despise it.

There are to-day many kinds of toboggans. The old Indian contrivance which, as has been said, was constructed of bark, and was lashed together with thongs of deer hide, has been succeeded by shop-made toboggans both in Canada and the United States. Some of the best toboggans now in use are manufactured at Saratoga, where there is a toboggan slide of which I shall speak further by-and-by, and there is an extensive manufactory of them in Vermont. I saw on sale at a store in New York the other day a large assortment of toboggans both of the Canadian Indian and Yankee invention. The former sold as low as four dollars and a half a piece, while those from Vermont were priced at eight and nine dollars each.

A model toboggan is made of long strips of birch, ash, or bass-wood, about four inches wide, and curied up evenly at one end. These strips are securely screwed into cross pieces of tough wood, pains being taken to bury the heads of the screws, so as to leave the bottom perfectly smooth. No space should be left between the strips, but they should not be adjusted so tightly as to prevent a slight independent movement of each strip, it being essential that the bottom of the toboggan should have a certain amount of give in order to adapt itself to all the inequalities of the surface of the slide.

A toboggan made of a single board is vastly inferior to one composed of narrow strips as above described. In some instances the under surface of these strips is slightly rounded, although it is questionable whether anything is gained by that method of construction. Along the sides of the toboggan there should be a low stanchion or hand-rail. The wood of which the toboggan is made should be about three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness, and properly proportioned toboggans are from fifteen to twenty-four inches wide and from four to eight feet long. By laying a cushion upon the sledge a comfortable vehicle is made for lady passengers, no more than three of whom should be taken at a time, unless the steersman is exceptionally strong, cool-headed, and an adept at the sport.

There are two methods of guiding the toboggan; it may be done with a short stick held in the right hand and dragged along the snow at the side of the toboggan close to the rear end, or, as is more generally the case, by the toe, the steersman taking the attitude before described as "New York fashion."

With the growth in popularity of tobogganing has come about the manufacture of toboggan suits, and whether you indulge in a complete outfit or not, I should, at all events, advise you, in case you try tobogganing, to provide yourself with a pair of toboggan shoes, which are manufactured of stiff black leather well oiled and riveted together with brass nails. These you slip on over your other shoes, and find them not only warm, but heavy and strong enough to enable you to steer without discomfort to your toes. The popular toboggan costume consists of a jacket made of blanket material (usually white, with a blue or red bordering), having a hood or toque to envelop the head; knee-breeches of the same material and thick woollen stockings complete the costume, which is both comfortable and picturesque.

Great preparations have been made this year for tobogganing at Saratoga, and the Saratoga Toboggan Club comprises about four hundred members, residents of Schenectady, Troy, Albany, and even of New York being on its list. The slide starts at Glen Mitchell, a mile from the Town Hall, and is one of the best in the country. At the start there is a wooden trestle containing three chutes or slides, and a broad platform at the top, approached by stairs. Starting at a point one hundred and eight feet high, the toboggans sweep down the ice-covered trestle for a distance of more than seventy feet before the natural hill is reached. As the grade is one foot in every three and a half, the lightning speed which the toboggan attains immediately after its start can be imagined. A strong bridge crosses the slide about midway down the course, from which a splendid view of the exciting sport can be had.

Another prosperous toboggan club has just been organized at Orange, New Jersey, where there is a fine natural slide eleven hundred feet long down the side of the mountain. At the start a broad platform has been built. The descent is at first very steep, and the course then runs over a series of lesser declines, with bampers which bring shouts of pleasure to the lips of the blanket-clad coasters.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

ONCE upon a time there was a King who had three daughters; the elder two were handsome enough, but the youngest, whose name was Golden-hair, was the prettiest maiden to be found within the four ends of the earth.

One day the King went out hunting with all his people. Toward evening he found himself in the forest at a place where he had never been before. He wandered up and down, and here and there, but the further he went the less able he was to find the road home again. As he wandered thus he came to a place where a great raven, as black as the soot in the chimney, and with eyes that glowed like two coals of fire, sat in the middle of the path in front of him.

"Whither away, King?" said the great black raven.

"That I can not tell," said the King, "for I am lost."

"See, now," said the raven, "I will show you the way out of the forest if you will give me your youngest daughter to be my wife. If you will not do this, off I go, and then there will be no getting out of the forest for you, but here you will have to stay as long as you live."

Now one will do much before one will stay in a dark forest forever. So the King promised at last that if the raven would show him the way out of the forest, it should have the Princess Golden-hair.

So the raven flapped on ahead of the King, and so showed him the way out of the dark forest and home again.

"To-morrow," it said, "I will come for my bride."

Sure enough, when the next morning came, there was the great black raven sitting outside of the castle gateway waiting for the Princess Golden-hair to be sent to him.

Up he took her on his back, and away he flew with her. As for the Princess, she did nothing but weep and weep. By-and-by they came to a little hut on the top of a great bleak hill. In the hut stood a table, and on the table stood a golden goblet of water, a silver cup of wine, and an earthenware jug full of bitter beer. Now the Princess was glad enough to get a drop to drink for refreshment's sake; but she never looked at the earthen jug or the silver cup, but going straight to the golden goblet, she wet her lips with the water.

And then what do you think happened? Why, the hut grew and grew until it changed into a splendid castle, all built of pure silver and gold, and all of the many birds outside changed into men and women servants. As for the great black raven, it was a raven no longer, but the handsomest Prince in all of the world, and the only thing black about him was the long curling locks of his hair. He kissed the Princess Golden-hair, and said: "Now indeed have I found my true bride, and none other. You have freed me and my castle and all my people from enchantment, which no one but a real Princess could do; for my wicked step-mother laid spells upon us which could only be broken when a real Princess drank out of the golden goblet."

Well, a year passed by, and the Princess was as happy as the days were long; but at the end of that time she began to long to see her father and her sisters again. So she begged and begged so prettily that at last the Prince said she might go if she would be contented to stay only three days. Then he gave her a napkin of the finest linen, and told her that whenever she wanted anything, all she had to do was to spread the napkin and wish, and it would be there. But one thing she must not wish for, and that was for himself, for misfortune would come of that.

So off the Princess went to her father's house; and a fine sight she made of it, I can tell you, for she rode in a golden coach drawn by four milk-white horses, so that every one she passed stopped and looked after her, and the little boys cried "Hi!" and ran along beside.

Dear! dear! but the King was glad to see her. As for her two sisters, they grew as green as grass with envy. The Princess told them all about what had happened; but when she had ended, they only nodded and winked at one another, as though they did not believe a word of it.

Yes, yes; it was all very well to talk about her handsome Prince, but why had she not brought him along with her? That was what they should like to know. Oh, the Princess could not tell them that; she could bring him quickly enough, even now, if she chose, only he had bidden her not to do so.

Prut! It was well enough for her to talk, but seeing was believing. That was what her sisters said.

So they talked and talked, and the end of the matter was that the Princess spread the linen napkin on the floor, and wished that the raven Prince might be with them.

No sooner had she wished it than there he stood; but he looked at no one but her. "Did I not tell you that misfortune would come of it if you wished for me?" said he. "Now I must leave you, and go where you are not likely ever to see me again. Nevertheless, here are three golden balls, and if you can find me and bring them to me, all may be well again, and I will forgive you for this."

Then the Princess would have spoken, but he gave her no time for that. He snatched up the napkin, and, becoming a raven once more, flew through the open window and across the tree-tops, and was gone. At the same time her golden coach vanished, and the coachman and footmen flew away, so that not one of her fine things was left.

Poor Golden-hair wept and cried for a whole day and a whole night. But at the end of that time she dried her eyes, and putting the three golden balls in her pocket, and tucking up her skirts, started off into the wide world to find her dear Prince again. At last one day about night-fall she came to a little hut in a deep forest, and in the hut sat an old woman with hair as white as snow.

"What do you want, child?" said the old woman. "Do you not know that this is the ogre Gruff's house, and that if he returns and finds you here he will kill you? I tell you that he spares neither the young nor the old, the plain nor the handsome. As for me, I am his grandmother."

But all this was one to the Princess; she could no longer drag one foot after the other, so there she must stay, even if Gruff should find her when he came home.

Then she told Gruff's grandmother all that had happened to her, and Gruff's grandmother took pity on her because she was so pretty and so tired. She gave the Princess Golden-hair something to eat, and then hid her in the tall clock that stood in the corner, so that Gruff might not find her when he came home.

By-and-by in came Gruff, and hung up his great cudgel behind the door. "Hu-u-u!" cried he; "I smell a man's blood in the house for sure."

"Man's blood, indeed!" said his grandmother. "As though any man would come to this house! But now I think of it, a crow flew overhead to-day and dropped a bone down the chimney. Perhaps that is what you smell."

So Gruff said nothing more, but sat down to supper and ate heartily, for he had had a long journey that day.

"See," said his grandmother, "I had a dream to-day. A Princess is out in the world hunting for her sweetheart, and can not tell where to find him."

"That is easy enough to tell," said Gruff. "He lives in a great castle that stands at the end of the earth on a high hill of smooth glass."

"That is good," said Gruff's grandmother; "but I dreamed that, after she found where he lived, she was too weary to journey thither."

"That is easy enough too," said Gruff. "Out in the forest yonder stands my black horse tied to an oak-tree. If she could only find the horse, and loosen him and mount his back, he would take her there quickly enough, for he can travel more rapidly than the north wind."

"Yes, yes; that is all very well," said Gruff's grandmother, "but I had a third dream. I thought that when she came to the smooth hill of glass she did not know how to climb to the top. What is the answer to that?"

"Prut!" said Gruff; "there is nothing easier to do than to tell. Over by the glass hill are seven birds fighting in the tree-top for an old hat. If she will throw a stone in the midst of them, they will drop the hat and fly away. It is Wish's own hat, and if she will put it on her head and wish herself at the top of the hill, she will be there quickly enough."

After that Gruff put on his cloak and took up his cudgel, and was off like a whirlwind. Then his grandmother opened the clock, and the Princess came out and thauked her and went her way.

She hunted here and there through the forest until, sure enough, she found Gruff's great black horse tied to an oak tree. She loosened the bridle and mounted upon his back, and away they went, until the chips and the stones flew behind them. So they soon came to the high hill of smooth glass that stood at the end of the earth, and there, on the top of it, was the castle of the Prince, sure enough.

Then the Princess hunted around for the birds that Gruff said fought for Wish's hat. Presently she heard them making a great hubbub, and looking up, saw them in the tree-top above her, fighting for the old hat, just as Gruff said they would be doing. She picked up a stone and threw it in the midst of them, and they dropped the hat and flew away screaming. Then she put on the hat and wished herself at the top of the hill, and there she was as quick as a wink.

Now her shoes were worn into holes by long journeying, and her clothes were torn to threads and tatters, until she looked, for all the world, like nothing else than a common beggar-maid, except for her golden hair. So it was that when she knocked at the door of the Prince's castle, and the porter came and opened it, and heard that she wanted to see the Prince, he snapped his fingers and laughed. All the same, he told her that the cook wanted a serving-wench in the kitchen, and that she might have the place if she liked.

Well, there was nothing for it but for the Princess to serve in the kitchen or go away again. So she bound up her hair in a tattered kerchief so that the beautiful golden tresses might not be seen, and down she went to serve the cook.

The soup for the Prince's dinner was cooking at the fire, and the Princess was to stir it so that it might not be burned. So she stirred it, and stirred it, and as she stirred she wept.

"Why do you weep?" said the cook.

"Ah me!" said the Princess; "once I ate with my love and drank with my love and lived by his side. If he did but know to what I have come, how his heart would ache!"

After that the soup was served, and the Princess dropped one of the golden balls that the Prince had given her into the dish. The Prince ate his soup, and at the bottom of the dish lay the golden ball. "Where did this come from?" said he.

The next day the same thing happened—the Princess stirred the soup, and as she stirred she wept. Then, while nobody was looking, she dropped the second golden ball into the dish, and the Prince found it as he had done the other.

The third day the same thing happened—the Princess stirred the soup and, when nobody was looking, dropped the third golden ball into the dish.

Then the Prince sent for the cook: who had been putting this and that into his soup, he wanted to know.

Oh, the cook could not tell him that, but perhaps it was the new serving-wench, who wept and said things that none of them understood while she stirred the soup. When the Prince heard this he said that he must see the girl. So the Princess came and stood before the Prince, and he looked at her, but did not know her until he happened to see her golden hair shining through a hole in the ugly head-dress that she wore. Then he reached out his hand and snatched it off her head, and her golden hair fell all about her shoulders until it reached the floor. Then he knew her well enough, and he took her in his arms and kissed her, and all of her grief was turned to gladness.

WILLY'S SATURDAY NIGHT.

Saturday comes but once a week—
That's once too oft for Willy.
For he dislikes to take a bath;
I'm sure you'll think him silly.

It's either cold or bad sore throat
He has, or chills and fever,
And sometimes he grows peevish, he
Invents—the sad deceiver!

But mamma does not make a fuss,
Experience has taught her,
The proper treatment for each case,
And that is soap and water.
So Willy always takes his bath,
And soonily sleeps till Sunday;
And he is just the clearest boy;
That is, at least, till Monday.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

KEALAKAUA, HAWAII.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—A gentleman lent me some of the last numbers of your nice paper, and I read some of the tales written by little girls, so I want to tell you something about my home. We live close to the bay where Captain Cook was killed, and in October last I went with my mother and two sisters to a native feast given by the Princess Likei (the King's sister), in honor of her only daughter's birthday. We had the feast in a "lanai," which is something like a very long porch without sides, and covered on the top with cocoanut leaves. There were two or three hundred and one was built right up close to the water. There were between two and three hundred people present, and we all sat upon mats put on the ground, and ate with our fingers, as the natives all do. There was an abundance of everything that is nice, both native and foreign, and I think all enjoyed themselves. The affair caused quite an excitement, as our district is usually very quiet. The houses are very much scattered here, but it is very pretty, as there are plenty of trees. The native women all ride astride, the same as the men, and trimmings which makes it look nice; and at their holidays they wear wreaths of bright colored flowers around their necks, called "lei." The houses are usually made of dry grass, but some that are better off have them made of wood. They live chiefly upon "poi," sweet-potatoes, and dry fish. Poi is made from the taro, and pounded dry with a stone mallet, and then mixed gradually with water. They use canoes made out of the trunks of large trees, in which they are fishing, and they are also very active in the water, steering their heads in, and then coming up again as quickly as possible at quite a distance from where they went down. There are sharks all along the coast, but it is very seldom we hear of an accident. There are scarcely any animals here except those which have been imported, and will not include the wishing you a happy new year, as Christmas will have passed before this reaches you.

LEILIE G.

We are very glad to read this letter from a dear, far-away correspondent.

ALLACATA STATION, DIMBOLO, VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.

DEAR KIND POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little girl seven. I am a sister of Lulu S., who wrote not very long ago. I like this paper very much. My sisters and I like reading the letters the best. The weather is very hot, on account of bush fires.

We have just finished shearing; our pets had such beautiful fleeces. I will tell you the names of them—Minnie, Matt, Dora, Rebecca, Pat, Bielle, Humphrey, and Solomon McEortom. Do you think I write badly? I go to school every day, and study music, spelling, grammar, geography, and parsing. My sister Eda says I sometimes practice very badly, and then she gives me a cross. I hope you will print this little letter, as I would like to see it in print. I remain your loving little DAISY S.

You write beautifully, and you must try to practice just as well as you write.

CHARLOTTE,

NORTH CAROLINA.

We are three little cousins—Sadie, Mary, and May, and our names are ten, nine, and eight. We have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a year, and we want to thank you for the help in making our Christmas presents which we received from a "Brighties' Christmas Club." We made five spectacle-wipers, four pen-wipers, two hair-pin balls, and a matchless boiler. They were all much admired by our friends. We wrote some verses, and sent Mary gave her sister a hair-pin ball, and with it sent this:

THEM WITH OUR PRESENTS. MARY GAVE HER SISTER A HAIR-PIN BALL, AND WITH IT SENT THIS:

A POEM TO MY SISTER, CHRISTMAS, 1885.

My dear sister Kiddy,
Be happy and so witty,
I send you this ball,
To hang on the wall,
So when hair-pin you take out,
Don't throw them away,
But stick in this fello;
So found and so yellow;
He will neither scold nor kick
At his skin when you do prick,
But always be ready
To hold the pins steady—
With sorrowful face,
As my love for you.

Sadie included the following, with a pen-wiper, to a young lawyer. We will have to omit his name, but it rhymes with "skip":

My dear _____
You must not hop and skip
When the present you see
Use of it and keep it clean
For lawyers should ever
Be tidy and clever.
When clients are seen
To climb up the stairs,
And sit on the chairs,
Which sorrowful face,
To tell of their cases.
So take, my dear "Dadie,"
This present from Sadie.

We had a delightful Christmas, and received many pretty presents. Yesterday Mary's ninth birthday, and she had a cake with nine wax candles on it. Wishing you a happy new year, we are your little friends, S. M., and M.

Thank you for this pleasant letter. I am glad you found the Christmas Club papers so helpful.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.

I am a little girl seven years old, and live in a house on a great park that surrounds the college buildings. There are a good many little children on the grounds, so I have a fine time playing. My doll has a little monkey which is over three-foot high, but she is about a foot long. He is a mournful-looking creature, but he is very good and gentle, and allows the children to ride him or drive a cart. One day one of the children drove him to the city, more than they miles away. Santa Claus did not forget to come to our house, although I did not see him. I watched for him a long time, but he did not come until I was asleep. I do not see how he gets down the chimney. He brought me a nice doll, two sets of dishes, a book, and some candy and nuts. I have two little brothers.

Yours, with love,

NORMA.

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and I do wish I had the volume that was published in December. I look it. It will be ten years old on the 15th of this month (January). I go to Miss T.'s school, and have a good time, though we have had a vacation since the week before Christmas. I had a delightful Christmas. I received thirty-six presents and twenty-four cards. One of my presents was a diamond ring, and another was a watch. I would like to publish so long a letter. I wish it would grow cold soon, for I have a new pair of skates, and I want to skate before Christmas. I have one pet now, a bird. My dog was so old he died, though I think papa will soon get me another.

With love,

FLORENCE O.

BRICK CREEK, NEW JERSEY.

MY DARLING POSTMISTRESS.—I am too little to write, so papa is writing for me. The reason I am writing to you is because you make me think of my mother and mamma. She dies so often, and if you have a mamma, you don't know how much you miss one. Papa is the next darlinest thing to mamma, then my kiddy, and then grandma—I mean grandma. I hope you will excuse papa's mistakes, because I am telling him just what to say, and it's I who makes the mistakes, not he, so please don't blame him. He said he thought you would like this letter if I made it up all myself.

Your loving friend,

LULU.

I see many girls and boys tell what stories they like best, and I will do so too. I like all Howard Pyle's stories best, and the Post-office Box comes next. For pets I have two cats and two dogs and a parrot. One of the dogs is named "Brownie" and his name is "Glem." The other is jet black, with long curly hair, and speaking brown eyes. He is, properly speaking, sister Emma's dog, but I take a little care of him. I wrote this letter because I have found out one of the answers to one of the puzzles. It is to the second one. The answer for the first I find out a great many, but I never can get time to send them. I am in the third grade of the Grammar School. We study history, grammar, spelling, and geography. I go every day, and I am now, as it is getting very late. EULALIA C.

I saved last year's numbers, and mamma had them bound for one of my Christmas presents. If there is any little girl of about my age who likes to write, I will be glad to be obliged to her if she will correspond with me. I am thirteen years old. Christmas is almost all went to church. The little took soap pieces, and of course old Santa Claus paid us, and distributed small gifts to the members of the Sunday-school. I have no pets except one sister and one brother. My sister Emma is eight years old, and she has a dog named "Glem." It was cold at all this winter; it is just like spring all the time. Well, I must stop now; but I hope some little girl twelve or thirteen years old will write to me soon, and I will answer promptly.

MARY DEAN.

CAMP OF M. C. F. DEAN, WASHINGTON C. H., Ohio.

KANAS CITY, MISSOURI.

Kansas City has a good many hills. My school-house is on a high hill; the name of it is Morse. I study spelling, intellectual and practical arithmetic, grammar, geography, music, and composition. I am in the Fifth Reader. I like "The Ice Queen" in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have a dog named "Glem," and a cat named "Downy," and that is a cunary-bird named Downy. Do you think it is a pretty name for a bird? He is a great pet too. I had him before he was all feathered. I am twelve years of age old.

Your constant reader,

IDA L. A.

POUGHKEEPSIE, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—A pretty catch-all may be made thus: Take a cocoanut shell, cut the top off, and add a quarter of an ounce of red wax, then rub the other piece smooth with sand paper, and gold. Bore three holes high up with a small gimlet, and put zellied wire—twisted would be pretty—through each of the holes. Tie a bow at the top, and the catch-all is complete.

A nice little spectacle-wiper may be made in this way by almost any little girl: Cut two round pieces of chambrass, and sew both sides whole stitches all round on both. Make a small hole in the top, and put a narrow ribbon through of the same color, in which you work the edges—cardinal red is pretty.

We have only two horses now and four cows, and a calf named Clover. She is quite tame, and she likes to be petted. I have a cow named Tom and Eva, and they are both nice, especially Eva, which is gentler than a kitten.

Our cows are Doré, Fanny, Abbie, and Buttercup. We had a nice old horse, named Polly, which my brother and sister Bessie and Ted and myself used to drive down to my uncle's every other Saturday, but one morning, to our great grief, he was killed by a cow he found dead in his stall. He was almost forty years old, and was still good to use, as he had always been kindly treated, and never had to work hard. One of my horses is being bridged as a keepsake. He was a mustang, or Indian pony, of the color of a mouse. My favorite books are The Wide, Wide World, My Favorite Story, and Red Rover. My favorite story is "The Story of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE are 'Roll House' and 'Wakulla.'" I will close now.

G. C. W. (11 years old).

BOHISEA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a girl ten years of age. I go to school, and like my teacher very much. My papa made me a present of a little pup for a Christmas present. You think you have nice ones? I have weeks old. Will you please give me a name for him? He is very mischievous. I got eight books for a Christmas present, and several other presents.

Tricky would do, I think, for a name.

GENEVA, NEBRASKA.

As I have never seen a letter from this country, I thought I would write and tell you something about it. There is no river near this place, but there is a large pond about a mile south, which in winter is very nice to skate on. I am getting up a cabinet, and if any of the readers of the Post-office Box have nice curiosities to sell, I would like to get them in exchange for other articles. I have never written to the Postmistress before. I like to write letters, and would like some correspondents both in the United States and in foreign lands; the latter especially desired. I am not going to school now, but will begin next Monday, January 12th, with French, arithmetic, geometry, book-keeping, algebra, and physical geography. I am one of your older readers, being fifteen years old. Wishing you a happy new year and much love.

WEST SALEM, OHIO.

I am a little girl nine years old, born on the Fourth of July, 1876, and we live in West Salem, Ohio. Our little town located on the X, P., and C. R. Our town is noted principally for the high character of its schools. We have a very fine school building, containing seven rooms, to give you an idea. The campus surrounding the school building is nicely ornamented with evergreens—a beautiful place indeed. I go to school in the second room. We have kind teachers, and a very good geography, arithmetic, and arithmetic. I have a bird from my aunt Kate; it was given to me for a present. His name is Dicky. I have a great many birds, but none brown Cochon chickens. Mamma and I took a trip to Sedalia, Missouri. We stopped at St. Louis with my uncle. We crossed the Mississippi River on the great iron bridge, and in this letter I can not tell you all the wonderful things I saw while I was gone. I have eleven dolls; one is Bessie, one is Ellie, one is Molly, one is Carrie, and so on. I had a number of Christmas presents sent to me, one of which was a gold pen, with which I write to you. I received a Christmas card from papa, and a book entitled From Greenland's Icy Mountains, beautifully illustrated, a present from my uncle Henry. I have two sisters and three brothers and papa and mamma. My brother is in law school, and has HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE'S A Christmas present. My name is Pearl C. H. The letter C stands for Centena, because I am a Centennial girl, as you can see by the date of my birth.

PEARL.

SOUTH WINDSOR, CONNECTICUT.

I have never seen a letter from this place in the Post-office Box, and so I thought I would write one. I like to read the letters, but I don't like to write them. I have another brother; his name is Wallace.

BESSIE LOUISE A. (age nine years).

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am very glad that a new story is to be published for girls by Mrs. Lillie. My cousin Stewart is writing this letter with me. He likes the story of "Two Arrows" very much. Stewart spent his Christmas holidays in the country, and had a grand time. He brought home two beautiful white chickens; one is named Tom, and the other Betty, after the gentleman and lady who gave them. I am very fond of fairs, and I am now making a crazy quilt and a pincushion. We have a dear little baby cousin, just beginning to talk; he is called Retta, and she is very sweet. We will look anxiously for our letter in the next number.

EM AND STEWART.

LEWIS, MASSACHUSETTS.

I belong to the Warren Street Baptist children's church. We had a pleasing Christmas service last Sunday. One of the songs was furnished by HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and the music was by Harrison Millard, formerly one of the chapel boys. A very interesting story, entitled "Rick's Christmas," was read from HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE by one of the chapel girls. Disagreeable plays were recited by members of the different classes.

LOUISE S.

I am glad you wrote about this delightful entertainment.

PLANTVILLE, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have read this paper for a year, and like it very much. My brother and I like to read a Christmas present. I like "Roll House" the best of all the stories. I have one pet, a little Maltese kitty; he is one of the best I have ever had. I had a dog named a bird, and a neighbor's cat killed it New Year's morning, so I had a sad instead of a happy New Year. I go to school, and study arithmetic, geography, reading, and spelling. Among other things, I have enjoyed reading the letters from the children.

LUCY E. C.

HULLSBORO, ILLINOIS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My papa got me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present, but gave it to me before Christmas, because he thought I would want to read it. I have no sisters and no brother, who would give me a gift. His name is Roy. He is just as glad as I am when YOUNG PEOPLE comes, and we can hardly wait until Wednesday evenings, when papa brings it home. We both go to school; I am in Room No. 4, and Roy is in No. 1. I would like to tell you more, but fear my letter would be longer than you would wish to insert. Wishing you a happy new year, I am your little friend.

ANNA M. (eight years old).

QUEBEC, CANADA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am seven years old. I live in Quebec, and I have lots of interesting snow-balls and sliding. I have never written to the Post-office Box before. I have three sisters and one brother. Good-by.

ETHEL S.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I go to school, and study reading, geography, spelling, grammar, arithmetic, writing, composition, geography, and drawing. Of all my studies, I like arithmetic best. I have no pets except a pair of canaries. We had fourteen birds, but ten of them died. For my Christmas gifts I received a number of presents, besides a game of Twenty-Nights, a pocket-book, and more candy, nuts, cakes, etc., than I could eat.

BELLEN A.

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.

I have never written you a letter before, because I did not begin to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE till Christmas. I used to take the bound volumes from the Public Library, and I was so much interested in the letters that I began to write the paper I would write to you too. My mamma knew how much I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, so she gave it to me for a Christmas present. I think it is the best present I had, and I hope I shall always take it. We have had a vacation, and I went out to Oxford, twelve miles from here, to visit my aunt Carrie. She lives on the summit of a hill. The name of their place is Huguenot Farm, and it is the loveliest place I ever saw. The hill is called Fort Hill, because in 1675 the Indians built about two hundred years ago by the French for protection against the Indians. They have erected a monument close by the fort. My father is a teacher, and I am going to study in the Conservatory of Music, in Boston. I am afraid my letter is so long, it will not be printed. Next time I will tell you about Ned, my little sister, and my dog, and the other horses, and Ned and Deck, the dogs.

JONNIE J. M.

CHARLESTON, MISSISSIPPI.

We are two school-mates, and both take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and love it dearly. We thought "Roll House" was splendid, and were sorry when it ended. Will you please tell me where Louis M. Abbott lives. We are very anxious to see our letter in print, as it is the first we have ever written. We will close, with much love to you.

LEILA M. S. and GRACE M. S.

SEAR GROVE, ILLINOIS.

I have begun quite a good many letters, but never have sent them to you. I go to school, and study arithmetic, reading, spelling, and drawing, and other things. For pets I have a large shepherd-dog named Sheep. He knows many tricks. He will shake hands, kneel down, and do other things. I have six kittens; their names are General Grant, Firefly, Fannie, Millie, Sara, and Cora. The last four names were after school-mates of mine. There is a creek near our house; we skate in the winter, and wade in the summer. My birthday comes this month. I have one brother and two sisters.

MILLIE I.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I dare say you have been expecting a letter. I was very lazy not to write, for I often think of you, and wonder how you are and what you are doing. I am going to have the paper bound soon—expect on my birthday. I like it more and more every time I see it, especially the progress of natural history. I have a splendid specimen of a saw of a saw-fish, which has thirty teeth on one side and twenty-nine on the other, one being broken off. I have also two crockers of large dimensions, caught at Tyngsmouth, Devon, and a locust, caught in India.

And now, dear Postmistress, I must tell you about my school. It was a large school-house, but there were only twenty-one boys when I first went there. It is forty-two and a half miles from London to Helycon. The sports they had there were chiefly cricket and football, and they had a gymnasium and a swing. I had to leave school before the end of the term, as they had scurried away very badly in the village.

FRED P.

FRANCES B.: The Postmistress prefers not to give an opinion about the matter referred to in your letter. Your aunt is the proper person to decide for you in the case. While you are so young, dear, my impression, as an old-fashioned person, is that the less of that special form of entertainment you enjoy, the better it will be for your advancement in study. Maudie A. James, M. B., Julius F., and Susie R.: Thanks for your letters.—A Firm Friend of "Harper's Young People": Will you not kindly send your name when you next write?

DRAWING ON HIS IMAGINATION.

MAMMA. "What is it, Claude?"
 CLAUDE. "Why, don't you see? It's a picture of a dog chasing a cat. That's the cat's tail sticking out from behind the barrel."
 MAMMA. "But where's the dog?"
 CLAUDE. "Oh, he hasn't come round the corner yet."

MAN AND MULL.

SAID an old maiden lady named Ann,
 As she toyed with her mirror and fan:
 "Too long have I tarried;
 It's time I was married;
 I'm off to the Island of Man."
 But the men in the Island of Man,
 They did not agree with her plan,
 For in spite of her grace,
 The sight of her face
 Was not an attraction in Man.

So this poor maiden lady grew dull,
 And retired to the Island of Mull;
 And I don't think you'll trace
 A more suitable place
 For maids unsuccessful than Mull.

But it chanced that one evening in June
 She was seen by the Man in the Moon;

At once he proposed,
 And the bargain was closed:
 She married the Man in the Moon.

But the last time I saw that old man,
 I inquired for the health of Aunt
 Ann.

He winked his left eye,
 And said, with a sigh,
 "They were wise in the Island of Man."

SONG-BIRDS AS POETS.

AUGUST is the dullest month in the year for song. Nearly all the birds, being "sore in moult," hide away in damp, shady places. Mr. Davy has put the song of most birds into words. He repeated the words of a thrush's song, and I found by carefully listening that the bird does actually sing the following words:

Knee deep, knee deep, knee deep,
 Cherry du, cherry du, cherry du,
 White hat, white hat
 Pretty Joey, pretty Joey, pretty Joey.

My readers should learn these words by heart, and listen to a thrush singing. They will find the thrush pronounces the above words as nearly as possible.

Repeat them all, even when no bird is present, rapidly, in a bird-like manner, and see the effect. It is very difficult to word a blackbird's song. Mr. Davy can imitate a blackbird's song so well that he can bring Mr. Blackbird up to him to be caught, but he can not put his song into words.

Having got on to the language of birds, Mr. Davy gave us some more examples. I give his rendering of the song of the nightingale. The song is commenced in "wheeting and kurring," which may thus be written,

Wheet, wheet, kurr, k-u-u-r-r-r.

The song after that continues, as follows:

Sweet, sweet, sweet, sweet,
 Jug, jug, jug, jug, jug,
 Swot, swot, swot, swotty.

They keep on these notes a long time, finishing up with "swotting and kurring." The song must be pronounced with great inflections—crescendo-diminuendo, I think the lady pianists call it; especially modify the "sweet, sweet," and pronounce it in a plaintive manner. The "jug, jug, jug" is quick, like a dog barking.

The wagtails have different calls. The call of the black-and-white wagtail is "Physic, physic, physic," quickly repeated, and with a whistle Davy can make them come close up. Listen to the first wagtail you hear, and you will find he invokes the aid of the medical profession.

THE LACE-MAKERS.

BY LILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON.

DOWN among the hawthorn-bordered lanes of some of England's loveliest counties, Buckinghamshire and Devonshire in particular, there are nesting scores of the most wonderful little cottages, such as you see in pictures, with thatch-covered roofs and diamond-paned windows almost smothered in a tangle of roses and honeysuckle and clematis and ivy. If you crept up to one of the sweet, shady porches on a summer's afternoon, or peeped in at the little low casement when the winter skies were heavy and gray, you would find all the women and girls the cottage contained busy over a most mysterious and fascinating work.

On the lap of each, or on a curious light frame of wood before her, would be laid a strangely shaped cushion, stuck full of the minutest fine pins, sometimes with colored sealing-wax heads, and sometimes with only their heads of unadorned wire. You would notice with wonder that everybody's hands were moving over her cushion so rapidly that your eyes could scarcely follow them; yet by-and-by as you watched, you would understand that there was an order and a method in the movements that seemed at first so wild; and then, looking closer, you would see that from each of those countless lit-the pins there hung a thread, fine as a spider's best web, with a funny little wooden stick at the end, and that those flying hands were tossing to and fro these sticks, or bobbins, on which the delicate threads were wound, and pausing now and then to raise a pin, twist the threads about it, and stick it into the cushion once more.

Then while you looked and wondered, behold! your eye would fall upon the space where these flying threads had been dancing the fastest, and you would see, stretched flat and even between the rows of sentinel pins, a pattern of lace so fine and so exquisite that you would rub your eyes with all your might before you could believe it was not the work of Jack Frost on a winter's morning.

And then you would exclaim, perhaps, "Oh, I see now! I know what they are doing; they are making lace."

Yes, you have guessed it. These are the free maids who weave their web with bone, the pillow-lace makers of England, who earn their bread by manufacturing one of the most exquisite and artistic materials in the world, and whose work is the most fascinating kind of play.

There are two kinds of lace—point lace and pillow (or cushion) lace. That is to say, of real lace, for the lace that is made by machinery is only an imitation, and though often very beautiful in its way, is far inferior to hand-made lace in loveliness, delicacy, and value. Point lace is the name for all lace that is worked with a needle, and wonderful, indeed, are some of the old laces that have come down to us from the busy and skilful fingers that were cold and still centuries before we saw the light. But most of the hand-made lace of to-day is pillow-woven, and the two great English laces, Buckingham and Honiton, employ hundreds and hundreds of women and girls in their exquisite manufacture.

Long before a tiny daughter of the lace-makers has learned to read she can wind bobbins on the curious little bobbin-winder that looks somewhat like a spinning-wheel; and when she is just able to hold a tiny pillow on her knee she is sent every morning to the "lace school," where, seated on low wooden three-legged stools, a whole crowd of wee children learn to plait their threads and stick their pins from the old woman who sits in the middle of the group, and teaches and scolds, and sometimes makes use of the stick which rests against the back of her rush-bottomed chair.

By-and-by, as the children grow older, they can be trusted alone, without fear of soiling their threads or tangling their bobbins, and then comes the glory of the time when they learn for themselves to "read patterns"—not such reading as you are doing now, for the patterns are not written, or even sketched, but pricked in holes on stout brown card-board, and the "reading" is tracing out the proper places for the pins, and knowing where they must go to form the pattern.

The two kinds of English pillow lace are very unlike both in appearance and in the way of making. Buckingham lace, which is very like a kind of foreign lace called Maltese, is thick and close, made on a long pillow like a roly-poly pudding, with pins whose heads are gayly colored, and bobbins weighted with heavy beads of colored glass and china. Honiton or Devonshire lace is far finer and more exquisite, so like a spider's web that it has never been imitated by machinery; it is worked on a flat round cushion like a dumpling, with pins as fine as hairs, and threads that one can scarcely see. All the pillows are stuffed almost as hard as bricks, and prettily covered with linen cloths, edged with bright-colored borders; and sometimes the bobbins are named after different friends, and have their initials burned into the soft wood. I knew one poor Buckinghamshire woman who called her prettiest bobbin by the name of a little child she had lost. "And," she said, "whenever the bobbin comes under my hand, I think of my blessed baby safe with the angels."

A simple and an innocent folk are the lace-makers, with few wants and few ambitions beyond the need of making their daily bread, and the desire to "read out" a pattern more difficult or elaborate than those hitherto worked in the hamlet. It is not a trade at which people grow rich, for the work is so fine that it is not rapidly executed; and though hundreds and even thousands of dollars are sometimes paid for large and handsome pieces, the traders, or "middle-men," as they are called, get most of the profits, and the poor lace-makers are paid at a rate that seems to us absurdly small. Beautifully finished little sprigs in Honiton lace generally bring only about one shilling (or twenty-five cents in American money) a dozen; and I once found a poor woman working her hardest to finish and send off a gross of them "because, miss, they tell me the price 's rose to thirteence, and one must take the market while it's up, you know."

Still, good workers are so skilful and so quick in their work that even with such small pay they manage to earn enough to help on the household, and even sometimes to support themselves. Early in this century the Honiton lace trade had sunk into a very wretched thing. Nobody bought the lace, and the poor lace-makers would work day and night without being able to earn their bread. Then the young Princess Victoria came to the throne, and when she heard the story of the poor Devonshire lace folk, her heart was stirred with pity and sorrow.

"English people should wear English lace," she said. "I will try to make them see how beautiful it is."

And so the young Queen's coronation robes were trimmed with the snowy fibn-like lace; and by-and-by her bridal gown. And years afterward, as each royal princess gave her hand and her heart at the altar to some prince of her choice, the lovely Honiton was still the only adornment of her wedding dress.

And never was there lace more fitting for royal wear, or more capable of being worked in every cunning and exquisite device. All the leaves of the field and every flower that grows, the birds and the butterflies and the ferns, all lend their graceful forms for its designs, which hints at them, but does not try to copy. Clever lace-makers can weave their own names into the scroll of a pattern or the tracery of a leaf, and no one who did not know the secret could even guess where it was till it was pointed out. Then one can draw one's own designs, and prick them out, and so a thousand different combinations can be made, each one more wonderful than the last.

Of late lace-making has become fashionable work in English drawing-rooms. One sees cushions covered with embroidered cloths and ivory bobbins inlaid with glittering gold and silver, and certainly there was never a daintier employment for delicate fingers nor a more charming occupation than the tossing to and fro of the rattling "bones," and seeing the fairy-like texture grow beneath one's hands.

But, after all, even drawing-room surroundings can never be prettier or more fascinating than the scenes where it first came into the world, and down among the valleys of Buckinghamshire or along the Devon coast the lace trade is a series of pictures that, once seen, can never be forgotten. Sometimes it is a steep cliff-side, where the children bring their pillows on a summer's evening, and sit and chatter and laugh together over their work, after the manner of children all the world over; sometimes it is a deep, low cottage porch, where the sunbeams fall broken and scattered through the wild, straggling branches of eleanatis, and the blackbird sings in its quaint wicker cage hanging overhead; and sometimes it is by the winter fire, when the wild winds rage round the old stone cottage walls, and the waves break loud and long on the black rocks below, and the group within draw closer together with their cushions, and the old mother shudders as a fiercer blast comes in the gale, and lays her hand with a touch that is like a caress on the well-worn bobbin that bears the name of her sailor boy away out on the stormy sea. Winter or summer, storm or shine, the bobbins fly to and fro, and the threads weave, and the wondrous fabric grows, silent and sure, and spreads, white as the Alpine snow-drifts, over the mysterious pattern pricked below.

SAILING ON SKATES.

BY CHARLES LEDYARD NORTON.

ONE day when Laurie and Dick were out as usual sailing the Whiffle, and racing everything in the way of an ice-yacht that gave them a chance, they came to grief. They were going at a great pace, with the wind abeam, when the rudder picked up a loose stick on the ice, lost its grip, and soon the Whiffle, at a speed of twenty miles an hour, tried to run down the State of New Jersey. The boys were not hurt, but the Whiffle was a total wreck. She was laboriously towed home, but nothing could be done in the way of repairs till some new castings could be supplied, so the boys had recourse to skating instead.

FIG. 1.—PLAN OF SAIL.

"I say, Laurie," said Dick, as they went home to dinner, "let's try skate-sailing. I've always wanted to, but could never get anybody to join me."

"Skate-sailing! What's that?" asked Dick.

"Why, you rig a sail on a light spar, and turn yourself into an ice-boat. Mr. Kinney, our minister, knows about it. He used to live in some place up on Lake Erie where they used to do it."

In the evening the boys went to Mr. Kinney's, who entered into their plans at once, and after giving them the benefit of his personal experience, lent them a lot of drawings and descriptions, which they sat up late to study. The patterns were quite numerous. One of them had a topsail that could be furled or used according to necessity; another consisted of two square sails on a single spar; another had a mast which was stepped in a socket strapped to the leg below the knee.

After going over the whole assortment, they made up their minds that a certain pattern which Mr. Kinney recommended as the Cape Vincent sail was the best and simplest; at any rate, the easiest made. Next morning right after breakfast they went to town and bought seven yards of heavy twilled sheeting two yards wide, and taking it home, went to work in earnest. Dick had some experience in sail-making for canoes, and Maggie, his sister, catching the skate-sailing fever, offered to help with the sewing-machine.

The sheeting was carefully cut—allowing enough material for a wide hem—in the shape shown in Fig. 1. When ready for stitching, it was ten feet on the longest side, the head of the sail, and five feet on each of the shorter sides.

When the two sails were hemmed, all hands took hold and sewed loops of stout twine at the corners, and eyelets at intervals of six inches along the head of each sail. For this they used the eyes of common hooks and eyes, which Dick said were not at all ship-shape, but were easier to do than grommets. By noon the sails were done, and an adjournment was called to the workshop to get out the spars.

These were, first, the yard, ten feet six inches long and one and a half thick in the middle; it tapered to about five-eighths of an inch at the ends, through which holes were drilled large enough to receive the lashings for the sail. Secondly, the sprit, or spreader, a shorter and lighter stick five feet six inches long, an inch wide, and five-eighths thick. These dimensions are given as the largest likely to be available. The sprit should not be longer than the distance from the nape of the skater's neck to his ankles. A sail that is too large, however, may be reefed by rolling it on the yard, and lashing it wherever needed. The sprit was slightly tapered toward the lower end, through which a hole was bored for lashings. The upper end was provided with a crotch to fit under the yard, and a bit of cord was attached so that two or three turns could be taken around the yard to keep the spreader in position when the sail was set. (See Fig. 1.)

By mid-day one set of spars was ready, for the boys were both good carpenters. Then a sail was lashed to the yard, the spreader was inserted, and the corner which they agreed to call the "clew" was hauled out taut, bending the yard a little like a bow, so that everything was stretched as flat as possible.

The boys sensibly agreed not even to test the first sail until both were done, so they hurried back to the shop after dinner, when it took but a short time to turn out the second set in better shape, if possible, than the first, and ten minutes later the boys were on the ice, with Maggie on her skates as an interested spectator. A strong wind was blowing across the river, nearly a mile wide at this point, and the boys had to get under way from a lee shore. Laurie was first to put on his skates, and kneeling on the ice, set his spreader, lashed it fast, and was on the point of rising, when a puff of wind slid under the sail as it lay on the ice, whisked it up like a flash against Laurie,

ON THE PORT TACK

ON THE STARBOARD TACK.

who, being totally unprepared, was upset in a twinkling, while the sail turned a somersault, and then lay down quietly on the ice again.

Laurie sat up and scratched his head. "Is that what you call jibbing, Dick?"

Dick could hardly answer for laughing, but managed to say, "No; that's being taken flat aback."

"You're right. Moral: always get to windward of your sail when you're setting it."

When the boys were fairly on their feet, with their sails in hand, they found themselves nearly helpless, and went ashore in spite of all they could do. At length, on Maggie's suggestion, they furled their sails and skated to windward across the river, where, under the lee of the shore, they again made ready, and came back like race-horses on the homestretch. In the excitement Dick had not thought to try the wind abeam, but as they again skated across, he determined to put his helm to starboard and try a run down-stream. In a few minutes they were again gliding before the wind so swiftly that they hardly felt its pressure against the sail at their backs, when Dick sung out, "Good-by; I'm going to try her on the wind."

Suiting the action to the word, he changed direction to the left, keeping the sail at right angles to the wind, but the pressure became so tremendous that he could not stand up against it. However, his sailor instinct came to the rescue. "Too much head-sail," he reflected: and then he canted the peak aloft, and allowed the wind to strike the sail at an angle. Instantly he shot away down the river at a speed that nearly took away his breath. He heard Laurie's shouts growing faint behind him, and, before he knew it, found himself approaching an embankment at a pace the like of which he had never before experienced on anything short of an ice-boat.

"I wonder how they put the helm alee on these things anyhow?" he thought: and with that he tried to come up into the wind, failed, was twisted off his feet by a flaw, let go everything, and went ashore in spite of himself.

No harm was done, and with the wind across channel he could lay his course up stream as well as down. In a very few minutes he covered the two miles to his starting-point, and thus the boys were introduced to a sport that is in some respects superior to ice-yachting, in that the equipment is so simple and inexpensive, and can often be used when the ice is unfit for larger craft.

It takes some perseverance to learn all the tricks of tacking and working to windward, but the initial steps of running free and sailing back and forth with the wind abeam are fun enough in themselves to pay fifty times over for the trouble of making the outfit—which, by-the-way, cannot be purchased ready made anywhere. The only possible way of learning is to begin as these boys did and pick it up by experience. The sail is always carried to windward, and may sometimes be more effectively worked by means of a light stick attached by means of a hook or croch to the end of the spreader. This enables the sailor to hold his sail at a better angle, but is not necessary. The sail will work very well without it.

Steering is done by instinct: any good skater who knows how to sail a boat will steer himself naturally when sailing on skates. It is hardly necessary to add that no one but a confident and easy skater can hope to manage himself when under sail.

A SAD TALE OF THE SCARECROW.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

IT was not a very handsome object, with its long, straight arms, its "shocking bad hat," and great square-tailed coat, which flapped lonesomely in the breeze, as if it missed the sturdy limbs and generous girth of Farmer Wiggins, and was ashamed of the gaunt figure it at present encased—an oaken pole stuffed around with some bundles of straw.

Yet Farmer Wiggins was not displeased with his handiwork, and as he put the finishing touches upon the effigy, and made the battered old hat sit more firmly upon the top of the pole by jamming in a few handfuls of straw, he remarked to his boy: "There, now, that 'll keep the black rascals away from the wheat, and if it does, it 'll be a profitable ending for the old coat, and a good coat it was in its day, too. Fine cloth. I paid thirty dollars for it the year I was married—thirty-two years ago. Dear me, how time does fly! But we'll all be coming to it some day;" with which sage reflection, and a final glance of pride at his work, he walked back to the barn, leaving the boy in uncertainty as to exactly what we will all be coming to, but with a dim notion that, according to Farmer Wiggins's theory, people, like coats, would be utilized as scarecrows when they grew old, and as yet he was too young to know how many persist in making scarecrows of themselves while they are yet young.

He too gazed in admiration at the figure, which he regarded as a work of art, and followed the farmer. The scarecrow was set on guard, and left alone to do its duty. Alone? No, for up in a tree in the neighboring hedge were three interested spectators, who had been watching the farmer's proceedings, and muttering their opinions in subdued caws.

Jack, Jim, and Jerry were three of the liveliest crows in the county. Now most people can't distinguish the difference in crows, and think they are all alike mischievous, but this is a great mistake. Crows are like boys—some are mischievous, others are more so, and others are still more so, and Jim, Jerry, and Jack were of the last variety, as the poor scarecrow found out to his sorrow.

"What do you suppose that old fellow is doing?"

queried Jack, after having watched Farmer Wiggins's operations for some time.

"What are they doing? you mean," corrected Jerry. "There are three of 'em."

"That's what puzzles me," said Jim, with his head cocked quizzically on one side. "Only two came out there, and now there are three."

"And a hard-looking old chap that third one is, too," remarked Jack.

"Some old tramp. Why, they are going off to leave him here. Perhaps they have hired him to keep us out of the wheat!" exclaimed Jim; and the three flew off to the other end of the field, cawing in disgust at Farmer Wiggins's meanness.

And now the poor Scarecrow was left quite alone and not at all happy.

"I wonder how long he's going to leave me out here?" complained the Coat, who had been considered quite a fashionable person in his day, and could never quite get over his habit of putting on airs.

"All night, maybe," replied the Hat, cheerfully.

"And in such company, too!" sniffed the Coat, carefully drawing its collar as far away from the plebeian Hat as possible. The Oaken Stick, well wrapped in the straw and enveloped in the long-tailed coat, only chuckled. It had been used for the same purpose before, and knew the probable result.

All summer long the poor Scarecrow stood and stretched out its long, gaunt arms threateningly, and shook its coat tails vigorously at the crows. Some of them staid away, more went and ate their fill at the other end of the field, while Jim, Jack, and Jerry took an especial delight in flying close to the Scarecrow and making sad havoc in the wheat under its very shadow. The Coat would tremble in impotent rage, and taunt the Oak-stick on account of his inactivity. The Hat regarded the whole proceeding with the greatest good-nature.

"Perhaps he has forgotten us," he would say; "and if we can't keep the crows away, why, there's an end of it."

But the wheat was gathered in, and the poor old Scarecrow still stood in the field. Only one incident occurred during the whole season to relieve the monotony. A very near-sighted young man, who was attentive to Farmer Wiggins's pretty daughter, had doffed his hat one evening and tried to enter into conversation with it. After making several more or less brilliant remarks and receiving no reply, he went off in disgust, and Jerry, who was sitting on a branch near by, avers that he growled, "I don't see what makes the old man so sulky all of a sudden." This incident pleased the Coat greatly, and for two or three days it would not speak to the Hat.

At last the winter came, and one morning the Scarecrow was covered with snow. The Coat, with all his fine airs, was sadly tattered, and the Hat had been blown about by the winds until it hung on the top of the pole in a most rakish manner.

"Just look at the tramp!" exclaimed Jerry, shaking the flakes of snow from his glossy black wings with a saucy flirt.

"I'm going down to see him," remarked Jim, in a tone of sarcastic sympathy.

"Be careful," urged Jerry; but it was of no use. Jim was off, and a moment later was seated on the snow-covered shoulder.

"Pooh! he's quiet enough," he cawed to his brothers, who were standing on a snow-bank at the foot of the Scarecrow.

"Why, he must be dead," said Jerry, still a little afraid.

"Well, I don't care; I am not afraid of him any more;" and with a caw of derision and a vicious peck at the Hat, he flapped off to a neighboring barn-yard for his breakfast. The poor old Coat was too tattered and worn out to feel any resentment at the indignity, and the Hat only laughed, whereas the hole in the crown gaped still larger, and the wisp of straw protruded the more prominently. Successive days of storm and snow followed, and one morning found the old Scarecrow almost blown down, and the Hat lying in the snow not far away.

"Only an old stick, after all," cawed Jerry, in disgust.

"And look at this miserable old hat," cried Jack and Jim; and forthwith began to tear it up in revenge for the part it had played in frightening them all summer.

"This only shows us," said Jerry, sagely, from his perch on the shoulder of the Scarecrow, "how apt we are to overestimate the power of things we don't understand."

"It will teach me that perhaps the best thing, after all, is to do our duty, and think more of what we are going to do, and be, and less of what we have been," murmured the Coat, humbly.

"Pretty good morals both," said the Oak Stick. "If you can't be useful as a Sunday coat, you can at least make a good scarecrow; and it is no sign of courage in the crows not to be afraid of you now. They will be again next season. It is not the terrors of the coat, it is the ignorance of the crows, which makes the real scarecrow," with which wise reflection the Oak Stick relapsed into a silence which has never been broken to this day.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

FAITH could scarcely remember how she told Jo the story—the old and ever new one. The blossoms in the fire-place before them stirred softly from time to time as the faint summer wind came through the open doors, and outside there was the sound now and then on the road of some footfall going or coming. But otherwise no movement; nothing to break the peaceful stillness but Faith's voice, always a clear and sweet one, as she went on, leading Jo's mind carefully from Bethlehem to Gethsemane, from the scourging pillar, by that strange and awful road, to Calvary.

With the simplest words, dwelling on such points as would attract and hold the girl's untutored mind, Faith went on, and at last drifted into something sweet and gentle about Jo's own relation to her Saviour.

The girl had listened. How far it reached below the surface of her heart it was hard to tell, but that at least was stirred, and with Jo no feeling could be very light. Much of it Faith knew she understood, and at last she raised her eyes and said, gravely:

"Fer me, you say, Miss Emerson? He did it fer me? There was a queer mixture of gratitude and incredulity in her tone.

"For you and all of us," said Faith, quietly. "Now, Jo, try and ask Him to help you. You see, He sent me because you need a friend. Perhaps, Jo, if you had known of Him sooner, and if I had been near you, you would not have thought of taking that fishing-tackle last year."

A burning wave of color swept across the girl's face; it almost seemed to enter into her very eyes. "I had to take it," she said, looking down.

"Had to, Jo—what was not yours?—what some one had left on the bench? That was stealing."

"Grandfather made me," she said, shortly.

Here was a key to much the girl was accused of doing, and it produced a new resolve in Miss Emerson's mind. Jo, she determined, should be her special charge, until at least old influences were forgotten in such new ones as she could bring into the girl's life.

There succeeded to this Sunday three or four of the scorching days which sometimes seem to blight the fresh loveliness of June, and Miss Emerson was confined to the house by a severe headache for two days. On the third a thunder-shower came up, one of those swift gales that shock the atmosphere completely before they cool it; and upon this followed a rain, heavy and drenching, so that in-doors Miss Grace had wood fires lighted and curtains drawn.

Faith had been thinking much of Jo and Sandy, fearful that the alteration of Sunday might end in something worse. She felt sorry to have seen nothing of her new charge, and wondered Jo had not appeared as she had promised to do; but could she have seen sailors Row at that moment her heart would have been very full.

Wind and rain were nothing to the inhabitants of that forlorn district. Sunshine, unless it meant heat, was welcome enough, though not regarded from any sentimental point of view, and except in cases of violent storm, they cared little for wet weather. The usual number of loungers about the tavern was rather increased by the excuse of a wet evening, and Jo's grandfather, although among them, did not see a little eager figure as it sped swiftly by the brilliantly lighted doorway, drawing a shawl closer about the head and shoulders, almost screening the thin, feverish face out of which Jo's eyes looked unnaturally large and bright.

* Begun in No. 334, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

For Jo had been ill. For almost the first time in her life the girl had been too ill to move about or work, or even romp on the beach, and tossing and turning on her little attic bed she had thought of Faith, of the cool, white hands, the soft, cheerful voice, with a longing to be near their owner once again. It never occurred to her to send for Miss Emerson, nor did it seem unusual to go out in the storm. All she waited for was to make sure of her grandfather's departure for the tavern, and then putting her "best" clothes on, she hurried out of the cottage and darted up the Row, heedless of everything but the attainment of her end.

It grew hard work toward the last, but the girl liked to feel the rain on her head and the wind across her hot cheeks, and the lights of the large house as she drew near it looked friendly to the poor child, who erept in by the side gate, and made her way around to the kitchen door.

Faith was sitting dreamily over the wood fire in the library, now and then answering some remark of her aunt's, or stooping to take from the brass wood basket a small log to rekindle the cheerful blaze, and give her fancies a fresh impetus. Everything about her was significant of warmth and comfort and luxurious content, and the young lady herself looked the impersonation of charming, happy, prosperous girlhood. The room, with its well-lined shelves, pictures, soft hangings, and dainty bric-à-brac, seemed in keeping with her, as she with it, and the sudden appearance of Jo on the threshold of this inviting place was like a strong note of discord in the midst of harmony.

"Goodness!" ejaculated Miss Grace.

Peters, the careful butler, was just behind Jo, explaining, "She would come in herself, miss!"

But Faith did not even hear him. She went swiftly forward and held her hands out to Jo with a charming smile.

Jo had never seen Miss Emerson at home in this way. The beautiful room, with its candles and fire-light, its many luxuries, bewildered her, and Faith coming forward in a soft white wool gown, with jewels flashing in a cross at her neck and in her ears, dazzled the girl so that she could not believe it was the same young lady who had talked to her on Sunday. But the eyes, the voice, the comforting white hands—these were the same. Jo lifted her haggard face pitifully to Faith's, and said nothing; but Faith had already noted that the little brown hands in hers were burning hot, and that the girl was ill.

"Jo," said Miss Emerson, "I am glad to see you. Come with me, my dear. I don't think you feel well."

Heedless of everything else, Faith drew Jo along the hall to a little room with a matted floor and half-worn old-fashioned furniture, where long ago Mr. Emerson's book-loving daughter had sat with him while he made his accounts or attended to farm business.

Peters followed respectfully and lighted the gas, while Faith bade Jo sit down in a great easy-chair, and then drink the cup of warm tea which she ordered Peters to bring, and which the child took with trembling fingers, trying to answer Faith's questions as to how she felt.

Long afterward Jo Markham remembered telling Faith that she had been ill; that her grandfather had been beating her; that it was hot and stifling and full of noises down in Sailors' Row ever since Sunday. She remembered seeing the objects of the room grow more and more obscure before her eyes, until all that riveted her glance was the shining cross at Miss Emerson's throat. The stones seemed to flash out queer colors as poor Jo watched them. At last she ceased to see or think, and it seemed to her that for a time she forgot everything.

CHAPTER VII.

WHETHER it was one day, or two, or three, or a week, Jo never knew, that it seemed to her she was in a comfortable cool bed in a half-darkened room. She was sure that Faith was near her from time to time; she had pleasant things to drink, and some one turned her pillows and bathed her head, and a tall gentleman bent over her and held her wrist; perhaps she talked a little, and answered questions or asked them, but of this she could not be sure. At all events, later, one still afternoon, she felt sure she was not in Sailors' Row. She opened her eyes and looked about her with real interest, though with very little energy.

The room had windows on two sides, draped with pretty muslins; there was matting of red and white on the floor, and a bright rug by the side of Jo's bed. Pictures hung upon the walls. There were the usual furnishings of a simple pretty bedroom, but to Jo's eyes it all seemed like something in a wonderful dream.

And the bed! The girl stroked the soft linen sheet with her hand, touched, half fearfully, the white counterpane and the quilt of bright-hued cretonne thrown over her knees.

What had happened to her, Jo Markham, of Sailors' Row? Her thoughts were growing confused, when she saw the door open on Miss Emerson's figure.

It was rather queer. Jo didn't know why she said it, but her first question was, "Where's the cross you had on?"

Faith smiled with pleasure and went away, returning in a moment with the little shining cross in her hand.

"You may keep it by you if you like, Jo," she said, cheerily. "I am so glad you are better."

Then the young lady told her she had been quite ill for a few days, and she meant to keep her in North Street until she was strong and well.

Days, perhaps weeks, drifted by in Jo's life. Sickness, weakness, rest, are great purifiers where there is tender care, and some strong heart and loving one to lean upon, so that, although she did not know it, those weeks did more for Jo Markham than a year of sermonizing and "reforming" by more active means would have done. The room where she was ill was in the top of the large, old-fashioned house, and there was a wide hall outside, with windows at either end, in which, as her strength came, she walked about or sat down, sometimes alone, sometimes with Jane (Miss Faith's maid) sewing near her, and very often with Miss Emerson herself. Jo never guessed the opposition that had been made to Faith's keeping her in the house during this illness, but the young lady knew it was her surest way toward Jo's salvation. Bertie "aided and abetted," and fortunately a well filled purse came in very good requisition in such a case as this; with all that money could command, Miss Emerson had been able to contrive that Jo's illness away upstairs should trouble no one.

Company came and went as usual; if Miss Grace and Mrs. Keith deplored Faith's folly in half whispers to each other, it made no difference in the lively little lady's visits, nor in her encouraging Faith in various summer gayeties in which the "Buds" took happy part. Sounds of this other life down-stairs often reached Jo—music, singing, gay voices, the ripple of sweet laughter—but it all belonged to so entirely a different world from anything she knew about that the girl heeded it but little. Somehow she grew to feeling a delightful sense of possession in her room, in the wide, cool hall, in the comfortable chair placed in one of the windows, and the little low table where Jane put her tea for her, and where she had her books and some sewing. Faith was teaching her again, and she sewed from time to time on some garment for herself which Jane cut out.

The girl did not ask herself how long this charmed life was to go on. Perhaps if she had been stronger, the craving for out-of-door freedom would have overcome the quiet, happy content of these days; so it was merciful that her weakness lasted long enough to give Faith the chance she so earnestly desired. Meanwhile Bertie and Miss Emerson had been making changes in Jo's old home at Sailors' Row. It was impossible to induce old Markham to leave there, but he permitted them to thoroughly clean and to a certain extent refurnish the miserable dwelling. Jo's attic they made really comfortable with touches of decoration by some colored pictures from illustrated papers, with a hanging book shelf, a nice little mirror and shelf below it, and strips of pretty carpeting on the floors. The windows were mended, curtaining put up, and all the various holes and cracks in the wall and sloping ceiling repaired.

"SHE SAW THE DOOR OPEN ON MISS EMERSON'S FIGURE."

Jo had been two months at North Street before Faith talked to her of going home. She had grown so much stronger, physically and mentally, during this time, that she was ready for the change, although it cost her a fit of terrible crying to think of leaving Miss Emerson and her happy room and hallway, but Faith assured her she should come there whenever and however she liked.

"We will always call them yours, Jo," said Miss Emerson, during their last talk in the deep hall window.

I think it was that evening that Faith noted many changes in the girl. There were tones of the old defiant look now and then, but the sullenness had vanished; the eyes softer and brighter, the lines about the mouth and chin indicative of her new-found peace and contentment.

Altogether, it was a very different Jo Markham who returned to Sailors' Row from the wild little anguished being who had rushed away that stormy night in June. Old Markham had been in a way by Faith and Bertie "bound over to keep the peace." He was to be allowed two dollars and a half a week "for Jo's board" as long as he treated her decently and allowed her to come to school and to Miss Emerson when she wished. Faith's little half-weekly day-school stopped when the regular public schools opened, but she had three afternoons for talks and sewing, and early in the autumn she was to begin a cooking class.

In this she had interested Jo keenly, intending to give her a position of trust as soon as it began.

Jo entered the altered house in the Row with a feeling of positive awe. The tidy kitchen, the rows of new pots and pans shining on a little oak-wood dresser, the stove, and new deal table and cane-bottom chairs, fresh white-wash, and a nice easy-chair for old Markham—all these wonders fairly transfixed her between surprise and delight. And upstairs her own room! why, it was just next best to the one at Miss Emerson's; and as in the dullest mind is some instinct for home, these new-found joys delighted Jo the more in that they were in the only place she had ever called her own.

"Now, Jo," said Faith, "all I ask of you is to keep it tidy. And you know for the next two weeks you must come up every other day to Mary, so that you will be ready to help me in my cooking class."

I think Jo prayed that night from a very full heart.

REGGIE, OUT WITH HIS SLEIGH TANDER, HUNTS A HARE.—DRAWN BY GRAY-PARKER.

THE GAME OF SKELETONS.

BY GATH BRITTLE.

THE little game I propose to explain to you is, as Mrs. Malaprop might say, not only amusing, but instructing. This is the way we play it: that is, the boys and girls of our family, and the boys and girls of many other families who sometimes join us, to say nothing of children of a larger growth, who take as much interest in the game as the youngsters do:

We are supplied with a silica blackboard four feet long and three feet wide, and a box of good chalk crayons. The blackboard is movable, and rests upon pegs which are set in the uprights of a light easel. Then each player has before him a slate or a slip of paper to practise upon. We usually begin the game an hour or so after the evening meal, and continue it until it is time for the boys and girls to prepare for bed.

The first thing we do as we take seats around the table in the dining-room, with the blackboard so placed as to be in full view of all, is to choose a chairman—some one to act as leader, umpire, and justice of the peace for the evening. At our last meeting, Aunt Kate was unanimously chosen. She briefly explained the game for the benefit of those who had not yet played it, and after pleasantly warning us, young and old, that there should be no whispering, no prompting, and, above all, no quarrelling, on pain of her most signal displeasure, she took a crayon, and, going to the board, thus illustrated her explanation.

"Now," said she, "I write upon the board what we call the skeleton of a word, thus: G + o + g + . This you copy upon your slates or not, just as you choose. I call upon some one of the class to substitute a letter for one of the little crosses. Harry, you being the youngest, will give me a letter for the first cross."

"E," was Harry's prompt response; and Aunt Kate rubbed out the first cross and inserted Harry's letter, so that the skeleton was now Geo + g + .

"Ella, give me a letter for the second place."

"The letter R," said Ella, and that was entered.

"Now," said Aunt Kate, "let Anna supply the missing letter."

Anna suggested E, and the word now stood out in full form—George.

The members of the class who had never before seen the game played felt as well qualified to take part in it as though they had been experts at it for half a century.

Aunt Kate next gave us something not quite so easy. "This time," she said, "I will fill the odd spaces with crosses." So she wrote: + a + o + .

"This is not a proper name," she observed, "and I want no blind guess-work. Each one of you must settle upon some word of five letters, the second of which shall be a, the fourth o. When one is ready he will raise his hand."

Little Bertha's hand was up first.

"Take the chalk, Bertie," said Aunt Kate, "and supply the first letter."

Bertie stepped to the board, and after some labor, left in place of the first cross a very fat "D."

"Oh!" said Emma, "that spoils my word."

"It spoils mine too," said Jennie.

Then Aunt Kate called upon the next in the class to insert the second missing letter; but No. 2 shook his head, after much study of the board, and gave it up. No. 3 acknowledged herself at a loss; No. 4 said he was all at sea unless Aunt Kate would allow him to help build up a man's name; No. 5 made an effort to fix upon a letter that would fit, but retired; No. 6 surrendered unconditionally, and the rest did likewise.

"Now, Bertie," said Aunt Kate, "as all have given up, it remains for you to complete the word."

Whereupon Miss Bertie, with flashing eyes and smiling lips, applied the crayon again, and after a good long tussle, in which she bestowed more of the chalk upon her dainty little fingers than upon the board, she presented us with the word "Dapot."

"What does that spell?" said Aunt Kate.

"Why, dépot, of course," said Miss Bertie, with some dignity.

"Oh!" cried one and then another of the class: "that's wrong. Bertie has a mark."

And poor Bertie, somewhat taken aback, was shown the nature of her error, a mark was scored against her, and the game went on.

"We'll keep the same skeleton," said Aunt Kate; "because a mistake has been made. Jennie may supply the first letter."

Jennie wrote "F" in the place of the first cross, for she had selected fagot; but Harry, having taken canon, was bothered, and passed the chalk to Emma, who, having set her mind upon favor, wrote v for the second missing letter, leaving r to be supplied by Dick.

The same skeleton was used several times, and although the disasters were many, the youngsters had the satisfaction of knowing that they had fixed the orthography of a number of useful words in their minds, and enjoyed lots of fun besides. Here is the list of words they built up on what Harry called Aunt Kate's skeleton:

| Favor
Manor | Tabor
Canoe | Fagot
Mason | Nabob
Labor | Canon
Talon |
|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|
|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|----------------|

I see that I have neglected to mention that there is always a prize for the most successful competitor, that is, for the one who receives the fewest marks. I must also inform my readers that any member of the class is privileged to ask the meaning of any word presented by another member. If he cannot define it he receives a mark, as Uncle Joe did when he sought to fool us with nabob.

We have a great deal of fun at this little game, and I hope that I have made it so plain that any of you can start it. Here are a few skeletons to practise upon:

| | |
|-----------|-------------|
| +o+a+o | P+t+i+i+i |
| T+r+s+o+d | C+p+o+r+r |
| +y+t+r | +y+t+m |
| S+t+s+y | C+t+r+h |
| +i+u | +a+a+t |
| P+p+l+r | A+s+s+i+a+e |
| +y+i+i | +l+c+r+c |
| | L+c+r+c |

The game need not be always played in the same way. It may be changed to suit the players. The character of the skeletons, too, may be indefinitely changed. You may, for example, present such combinations as these:

| | |
|-----------|-------------|
| M+n+u+r | U+n+l |
| +y+d+ca+e | A+u+e+arian |
| +o+c+u+r | +b+t+m+ous |
| M+skn+l+n | F+c+i+i+o+s |

Or you may sometimes use two or three crosses together, as in these skeletons:

| | |
|--------------|---------|
| +z+ff+tl+ble | +i+h+en |
| V+c+abl+ | +hl+c+n |

Of course, when you are engaged in this game, you must have a dictionary at hand to settle any disputes that may arise. The dictionary is a good book to consult even when no game is going on. Open Webster's or Worcester's at any page, and you will be sure to find something you did not know before, something interesting, odd, or funny, but always worth knowing. If you receive no other benefit, it at least teaches you how the words of your language are made up.

Hints.—Take turns at leadership, giving even the youngest a chance to exercise control.

To avoid unnecessary delay, let the leader always be furnished with the word you propose to build.

The first missing letter should always be supplied by some one other than the person who prepares the skeleton.

If you have no blackboard, see that each member is furnished with slate or paper to practise on.

In many cases the letter supplied, while not the letter needed for the word chosen by the first player, is correct for another word whose skeleton is the same. In such case the player who supplies such letter can claim his right to use it on making his word known to the leader. It remains for the other players to finish the word, as though No. 2 and not No. 1 had started it. Thus the skeleton is +a+1+e, proposed by No. 1, whose word is battle. No. 2 writes e for the first missing letter; and should No. 1 object, No. 2 shows his word (cattle) to the leader, and claims the right to "set the pace." The claim allowed, the game goes on, No. 1 having to meet the requirements just as though he had not proposed a word at all.

"PUNK" ON THE RESERVATION.

BY WILLIAM G. STODDARD.

THE band of Kiowas commanded by the great war chief Kicking Mule had kept away from the Reservation just as long as it could, but the time had come for it to go there. The United States government had set apart for it lands enough, and had provided many good things upon them, including an "Agent" to distribute rations and presents, but the great chief and his warriors and their squaws preferred to run wild. They had refused to go until convinced by good reasons that it was necessary. Sixty good reasons on foot, in nice blue uniforms, were now marching along with them, and forty more on horseback were riding behind them. These were there to look out for any Kiowas who might lag behind, and there was need of them, for the nearer any Kiowa knew himself to be to the Agency in the centre of the Reservation, the more he wanted to get away.

Kicking Mule's band was neither small nor poor, and it made a very long procession. There were about one hundred warriors, two hundred squaws, four hundred boys and girls, eight hundred ponies, and about sixteen hundred papooses and dogs. That is, it seemed so to any man who set out to count the dogs, for they were everywhere. Each dog hated any other dog that was going to a Reservation, and so there was a vast amount of snarling and quarrelling.

The less any one knows about an evil that is said to be coming, the more he is afraid of it, and as the boys of the band knew less than the warriors and squaws, they were in more trouble of mind. As for the girls, no well-taught Kiowa girl presumes to have a mind of her own.

It was well understood by all the boys that henceforth if one of them should be caught further off from the Agency than he could ride a pony in three days, he would be tied up and sent home. It was to be a dreadful bondage, and no less. There was no wonder that every Kiowa boy should feel his heart swell in him rebelliously when the word was passed along the straggling procession that the houses of the Agency were just beyond the crest of the next hill. One boy, near the cavalry end of the band, stood stock-still and looked about him, as if he were half inclined to break away and run for it rather than see any such houses.

He was a stout, squarely built boy of fourteen or fifteen, and he was well clad in a piece of deer-skin, which was tied around him just above his hips, and reached away down to within six or eight inches of his knees. He carried a bow and arrows, and they were less of a load to him than more clothes would have been.

Nobody could have guessed closely whether there were eleven dogs or twenty-seven that stood still when the boy did. Some of them sat down, but they all snarled at each other, and their general behavior was disorderly.

"Hallo, Punk, get along. You'll all be there pretty soon, and my job will be over."

The young Kiowa turned his fat brown face to the left and looked up, but he said nothing. He did not feel fond of white men just then, and he felt less affection for those two fine-looking men on horse-back than for any other pale-faces he could think of. One was the Major commanding the military force, and the other was the terrible "Agent" of the Kiowa Reservation.

"There, Dr. Prouty, didn't I tell you so? The most complete specimen of a wild boy you ever saw. He can talk English, too. Just the color of punk, with a shade of red. He'll get darker as he grows older, but the name'll stick to him till he kills somebody and wins another."

The Major was a tall, gray-headed soldier, with a twist of grim fun in his face, but the Agent was short and fat, and his blue eyes were twinkling merrily as he studied the sulky countenance Punk turned toward him.

"Major Voorbees," said he, "I'll try it on as soon as there's a chance after we get in. He is raw material."

The Major turned at once in his saddle, and shouted to two men who were riding a little behind them.

"Orderly, mark that boy. Joe, would you know him again?"

"Anywhere this side of the mountains," replied a man who was not in uniform, but the other man, who was in uniform, only touched his hat, and remarked, "Yes, sir."

They all rode forward as if they had business at the front, and Punk sent a barefooted kick toward the nearest dog. He had heard and he had understood, and it made him feel reckless, but he walked along. He felt quite sure that he was the only boy in the band of Kicking Mule who had been singled out and spoken to. He felt proud of it, and was not unwilling to be called Punk, but he felt bitter too. All the wild blood in him was in a disturbed condition, and now he felt an even greater trouble coming. His curiosity had got on fire, and he was suddenly anxious to see all that might be seen from the top of the hill. There would be something new for everybody, and he had not more than a small glimmer of how much would be new to him. He had heard the Major say to Dr. Prouty, as they rode away:

"Kicking Mule has five sons. This is the youngest and ugliest."

"Just the specimen I'm after. It won't offend anybody."

"Offend? No; but there's no telling how you'll tame him."

Punk was thinking about it, and one of the words used he did not understand, and he exclaimed:

"Ugh! Tame Punk? What that mean?"

In a few moments more he was again standing still and saying, "Ugh!" but every dog was running forward. He could see the buildings of the Agency in and around the stockade of what had once been a pretty strong fort, and the dogs may have received news that some bones were there. It was safe to say that all bones would quickly be found. The Kiowa warriors and squaws were not thinking of bones, but knew that there would be a distribution of presents. The boys and girls felt pretty sure that none of the presents would get down to them, but they were all like Punk in being curious about those pale-face "lodges" and the new kind of life before them. The very idea of being fastened down in one spot was stunning and perplexing. They had never lived anywhere in particular.

On poured the cavalcade, and Punk found himself moving faster and faster, until he and a swarm of dogs were away ahead of the foot-soldiers. He and some other boys very much like him reached the Agency in advance of anybody, red or white, who had any dignity. Kicking Mule was too great a chief to show a sign of interest in what was going on, and his braves were also very great Indians, and ready to say so. They all preserved their dignity, and their squaws were afraid to go too fast.

"THE MOST COMPLETE SPECIMEN OF A WILD BOY YOU EVER SAW."

Punk saw a great deal in a very short time, but there were soldiers guarding every house except one. It was built of wood, in two stories, and the Kiowa boy went over it from top to bottom. He opened and shut doors for the first time in his life, and looked through glass windows, and wondered at the stairs. The dogs that went in with him found no bones there, and went out again; but Punk sat down in the fire-place and looked about him and felt that he was in a new country. Everything was strange and foreign to him. He did not belong in such a house as that. He had been born in a lodge of skins, and brought up on horseback. He had rarely walked so far as he had walked that day as a punishment for straggling from the line of march.

There are many ideas in the mind of even an Indian boy, but Punk felt as if all the ideas he was accustomed to were leaving him. They were being crowded out by the pale-face ideas in that empty house, and he longed to get up and run away.

"Catch him. Tie him up. No. Ugh!" he muttered, discontentedly. "Go look all over. See fort."

Several army officers and soldiers were busily at work pointing out to the Kiowa warriors the limits of their first camping ground. No great "talk" or giving of presents was to be until things were in order, and that might require two or three days. Dr. Prouty and his assistants had work on their hands, and Punk was entirely forgotten until the next morning. He knew, and nobody else cared to know, that as soon as the great drove of horses, mules, and ponies that made the band a rich one were "corralled," he had gone to the corral as the only spot he could think of where he might feel at home. He knew that there would be plenty to eat, and he ventured back to his father's lodge, as soon as it was set up, and got some supper. The great chief was to have one of the best houses, but the ceremony of giving it to him was yet to be performed.

Punk slept among the ponies as contentedly as if he had been a colt, and a particularly untamed one, but he was astir by daylight in the morning. The corral was on the bank of the little river running through the Reservation, and Punk's first performance was to take a good swim, and come ashore a reasonably clean young Kiowa. When he was once more clothed in his piece of deer-skin, he looked around in all directions, and concluded to go to the lodge for breakfast.

There was to be an attempt to civilize as well as "corner" that band of wild red men. The Reservation itself was as large as several pale-face counties, and was of good lands, bad lands, mountains, and valleys. Farming was to be taught at the Agency, and mechanics were to be made out of Kiowas, and it was said that several kinds of missionaries were coming. Punk had but a faint idea of what that might be, but he was growing more courageous, and his curiosity helped him face the wonders before him. He almost felt sure that he would not be afraid of a missionary.

The breakfast at the lodge of Kicking Mule was cooked for him first and his older sons, but Punk's turn came at last. His father and brothers had heard the name given him by the Major, and they did not let go of it.

"Ugh!" said Kicking Mule. "Great war chief say Punk. Kiowa say so. Good medicine."

Hardly had Punk finished eating the first piece of cold boiled salt pork that he had ever tasted, before he had a tremendous sensation. He had been sent for by Major Voorhees and Dr. Prouty, and here were the "orderly" and the "scout" from head-quarters.

Punk obeyed in silence until he stood in front of the great white men, and heard his father ask, "What for want boy?"

"Dress him up," said Dr. Prouty. "Make young pale-face of him. Handsome boy. Young chief."

"He'll know a heap, then," said Major Voorhees, gravely; and Punk was almost in dread of what he might know if all the things he saw before him should be put upon him.

A very brilliant old red "polo" cap came first, and it changed his whole appearance in a moment. So did a red flannel shirt that followed, but Punk put on a pair of bright blue trousers with a shudder. It was fine, but it was awful, and the orderly had to help him get on some very gay cotton stockings and a loose pair of shoes. Then the orderly tied a green and white neck-tie under the rolling collar of the flannel shirt, and Punk was "up and dressed" for the first time in his life.

"He ought to be able to read now, doctor," said Major Voorhees, "according to your theory. Give him a pocket-handkerchief and a pair of gloves, and he ought to write and cipher."

"He knows some things already that he never knew before," said the fun-loving Agent, but neither of them laughed until Kicking Mule himself did. That was when Punk tried to strut around in those shoes. The shoes themselves were uncomfortable enough, but added to them were the trousers.

"Put your coat on now," said the Major, holding out a jacket with gilt buttons and braid upon it, that must have been made for some kind of a drummer-boy.

Punk's pride of dress was fully aroused, and he put the jacket on with a face full of determination to walk. He was the first of all young Kiowas to be rigged up in that way, but the Indian boy was not living anywhere who could do well with his first trial of shoes and stockings.

He was on the Reservation; he was at the Agency; he had begun right off to be a white man, and one of these days he might feel at home in a house. Just now it came strongly upon him that he wished himself back in the corral or in the river, for all the red and white men around him gave up being dignified and began to laugh.

"Dr. Prouty," exclaimed Major Voorhees, "you will be on good terms with your Indians. It's the best thing you can have done. Let him take off all but the cap, and be easy."

"PUNK WAS 'UP AND DRESSED' FOR THE FIRST TIME IN HIS LIFE."

"He'll come to them by degrees," chuckled the Agent; but he made Punk understand that all that finery was to be his, piece by piece, thereafter, as fast as he should prove himself "a good Indian."

It was hard to take off anything except the shoes, but every dog in camp barked or yelped and ran when he saw Punk coming toward him with that red cap on.

"Some pale-face," said he, as he stood before his mother, proudly, and she also laughed as she replied:

"Head little bit pale-face. Rest all Kiowa. Heap Punk!"

THE SKIPPER AND HIS CRAFT.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

If the dear children who write to me would like to please me very, very much, let me tell them how they may do so. Perhaps they will laugh when I say that a really good letter for the Post-office Box should have no beginning and no end—it should begin in the middle. In other words, you may leave out all the excuses and apologies, all the little bits of explanation, and instead of saying that you are sorry, having no time else to do today, you would write to the Postmistress, or that, as so many other children are writing, you have decided to do so too; just let all that be taken for granted. Think of some pleasant sight you have seen, or of some treat you have had—a journey or a visit, a play or a party or a new book—and describe it for all the little readers. Do not mind saying anything about your writing; I am sure you always write your very best. If possible, avoid using the word got. Whenever you are about to use that word, stop a minute and see if there is any other which will express your meaning as well; it is never an elegant word. Write on one side of the paper only. Never use a pen that always runs down the middle. The Postmistress likes to know what your name is, and where you live; she might desire some day to send you a letter of your very own, and how could she do so if you left out any part of the address? When you have said all you can think of, don't wrinkle up your brows and puzzle your wits in the effort to think of something else, but just stop. If it sounds a little abrupt, never mind. The very best letters in the world are those which tell something in simple, plain language, like the conversation of friends, and which break off the moment their story is told.

A kind mamma sends all the way from London the letter, or story, like follows:

WHAT DID IT ALL MEAN?

They were two little American girls, although they had passed some years of their young lives in France, and were now living in England.

Besides being American by birth and parentage, they had been told about many of the customs and plays of American children. Up to the time of this adventure of theirs they firmly believed in Santa Claus, and that he came down the chimney to fill stockings with all things good for the happiness of children.

Now, unfortunately, their belief in the existence of this dear old friend was sadly shaken, and I will tell you how it all happened.

The mother of little Emma and Sophy had told them that when they were in France Santa Claus always wrote a letter to Santa Claus every year, telling him what she wanted. Then she used to give this letter to her father to mail, and Santa Claus always brought exactly what she had asked for.

So Emma and Sophy, during the years they spent in France always wanted, not what they wanted, and after their father had mailed the letter, they too found that Santa Claus brought the coveted gifts exactly as he used to do for their mother every year.

In France they told this wonderful circumstance to their bonne and little playmates, but were always laughed at, because in France Santa Claus is not the patron saint of good boys and girls at Christmas-time. It is the "good child Jesus" who brings presents to French children, and at Christmas-Eve they are filled with sole, or little wooden shoes. These are filled with toys, if they have been good children, but if naughty or mis-doing, there is for them only the much-dreaded cepe, or switch.

Now this peculiar year of which I am telling you, Emma and Sophy were living in England, and just before Christmas they wrote the usual letter of requests to Santa Claus in London. And, unfortunately they conceived the independent idea of mailing this letter themselves. Emma was nine years old now, and Sophy seven, and they thought it was a very good idea to put this important letter in the pillar-box. They did so, and were ever so happy over this little act of independence, and it few days had passed. Then, about one evening the postman brought a letter to the home of these little girls, and it was addressed to one of them, but it had no stamp on it, only the office stamp of "Her Majesty's General Post-office."

The letter was opened at the supper table, and the appetites of Emma and Sophy were sadly spoiled when they saw the mysterious envelope fell their two neatly written letters to Santa Claus. Was it not admirable; and who could have found out what the Santa Claus and mamma had been thinking before, and if the Post-office people had opened the letters, it was a most rude and unheard-of proceeding on their part.

Now the father and Sophy's father told them to put the letters in another envelope, and he would direct and mail this one himself. This was agreeable to the little maidens, and strange to say, this letter never came back to them.

However, their faith in the existence of Santa Claus was sadly shaken, and they did not expect what they had asked for, so soon after, and with rather a grievous look on their dear little faces, just as grown-up people have when "hope is quite dead in their hearts." The next day Emma and Sophy laid a deep, deep plot to find out for themselves if there really were a Santa Claus who came down the spare-room chimney. And this was the plot. They decided to go to bed very early on Christmas-Eve, even earlier than mamma wished; then they were to go directly to Emma's room, and lay a good deal of a mystical hour of midnight. Emma was to wake herself up, if possible, and then awaken Sophy. Together they would go to the spare room, open softly the door, and see Santa Claus.

Their plot worked beautifully. They went to bed most amiably; Sophy took her nap, but poor Emma was ever so close to her door, and the necessary winking of them. A long time after she had heard papa and mamma go to their room, and when all was silent, she slipped out of bed, which she did to the "witching hour." Hurriedly awakening poor, startled Sophy, together they trotted to the spare-room door, and when all was silent, they slipped out, and "eased" out of their wits" at the sight of an old man standing looking at their stockings, and laughing heartily at quite a large hole where some stockings were hanging down. From one of his pockets he was just drawing two sack-bow dolls. Oh! it was all too dreadful. "Look for little sister's hand, leading her away to mamma's room." Into this they dashed, half mad with fear.

Now begins the strange part of this adventure. Mamma soothed the frightened darlings, but papa did not say a word, did not even seem to be disturbed; and why? Well, because he was not the "darning" kind, and only gave a few explanations of his absence, but Emma knew that she had heard his voice when he went to his bed.

Mamma led them gently back to their room, and the next morning he said to Emma, "I had half dared she would have gone out back to the spare room to examine Santa Claus a little nearer."

The next morning the children found all the gifts they had asked for, and they also found Papa at breakfast as usual.

Now the girls have two great mysteries which their heads are not capable of unravelling; first, papa's unexplained absence at midnight, and his early return; next, why it was that the Santa Claus who came down the chimney was not the same, but was no taller nor stouter than their own papa.

ANNIE F. HYATT.

NORMAL PARKLAND, TEXAS.

I go to the Cook County Normal school, and study reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography. There is a workshop connected with the school, in which I have made a small pump out of wood, and a bill paper was made, and a hat that half a foot in length. We have at school a library, containing three thousand readable volumes. I am making an alphabet for my class.

ALICE.

ARVAL, COBER, COUNTY DOWN, IRELAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little girl eleven years old, and have been getting HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time. I have never written to you before, but I would like to sometimes. I live in the country, and have three brothers, two older and one younger than myself. I have ponies and pets of different kinds. I have a dog named Rover, and my own dwelling-house; I had it all returned this Christmas. I have holidays now, and enjoy them very much. My two oldest brothers have each got a donkey, and I have, but James, my youngest brother, and myself have lessons at a grammar school.

ELIZA MONTGOMERY A.

EGGWOOD, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl almost twelve years of age, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a long time. I enjoy it very much. I live near Pittsburgh, and we have natural gas, and use it instead of coal. A little friend who lives beside me and myself each has a donkey to ride, and one is named Jack and one named Jill. I have been to Europe, and took my own dog, a little called Baby Bunting, with me. She is a good traveller, and I carried her up Vesuvius, and let her look down into the boiling crater; she attracted a good deal of attention among the children in every place we went, and in Italy they called her a "bambino" and in Switzerland, a "puppo." I have only one brother, and as he has gone on a trip to Florida, I am a little lonesome. I am so glad there is to be another story by Mrs. Lillie soon. I hope my letter is not too long, and will be published.

ANNIE D. C.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I suppose you may think it foolish for a boy eleven years old to read fairy tales, but I do think Howard Pyle writes the nicest and most interesting stories I ever read. I am a member of the Young Men's Association, and the day on which I get my paper. I think if I could not take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE any more I should feel as if I had lost a good friend.

BENNIE N. F.

I am a great deal older than you, my boy, and I am very fond of fairy stories, so that I am not surprised at your liking them.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I write to you to describe the Christmas Club which I am a member, and which held its annual dinner last Monday in the National Rifle's Armory in this city. The object of the club is to give a good dinner to the children who cannot afford to buy one for themselves. Every member has to wear a badge with the initials C. C. C. At the appointed hour a line of children, ages from four to sixteen, were directed to Ninth Street, half a block away, waiting to gain admittance to the spacious hall, where the great banquet was laid out for the six hundred or more children on hand. At eight o'clock the policemen in charge, the whole line began to pour into the hall, which soon was full. The hungry children were seated at long tables, and when a large Christmas tree was waiting, loaded with gifts for the children. As the children marched to the Marine Band, which was playing a beautiful music. After a magician had pleased them with magic and a "Punch and Judy" show, the girls were given out by a man dressed up as Santa Claus. Then the children were dismissed. The Christmas Club is a regular organization, and this is the third year of its existence. Our president is Mollie V., and vice-president, Charlie S. The initials C. C. C. on the badge stand for Children's Christmas Club.

Your little friend and reader, FELLIX M.

AUBURN, NEW YORK.

We are three little girls, and all take this charming paper, and take great pleasure in reading the Post-office Box. For one of us has a cat, and the other two have a dog each. Do you think Nigger is a queer name for a pet? We named him Nigger because he is black. Do we pay to put in an exchange? With love,

MARY, MARY, AND MARY.

There is no charge for the publication of an exchange. Suppose you change the black kitty's name to Sable or Noir; I do not like the name you have given him.

RAYNESWOOD, LONG ISLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a girl twelve years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and like it very much indeed. Miss Abbott, Mrs. Lillie, and Sophie Sweet are my favorite authors. I am an only child, and live in a city. I have a dog named Rover, and a cat. One of my dogs is a fine pointer, and a year old, and a half old, all white except a yellow spot on the top of his head and a little on his ears. The fringe on his legs and tail is black. His name is Sport. He takes one of the cats in his mouth, and runs around with her; she is not a bit afraid of him. The other dog's name is Jip; he is black and white. He stands on his hind legs one day about five years ago, and for three years he would not let any one touch him, and even now he will not let me touch him. He is very smart, and he will wag his tail, and the cat will not stand bird: she will go up to him and stand on his tail and bite it. He does not mind her. She is white, with yellow eyes; her name is Daisy. I had three birds; their names were Cherie, Bijou, and Ruby. One day a mouse-stroke and all three were found dead in their cages. I enjoy Dickens very much. I have just read A Tale of Two Cities; I like it very much. I have also read Walter Scott's Waverley, and like it very much too. I also like Elsie Venner and Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish." FLORENCE OGDEN H.

VALLEJO, CALIFORNIA.
I have a parrot and my sister has a dog. My parrot is very cute; he is a very young bird, and when he is a little older he will say a great many funny things. My sister has a dog, a great many words. My parrot is named Billy, and the dog is named Ginger. Isn't that a funny name for a dog? I have lived in California all my life, and I never have been in any other State. Were you ever in California? It is a very beautiful place. I would like very much to go to New York and see you. My papa is a naval officer, and he takes me aboard-ship, and I have very nice times. The ship he is on now is at Oakland, and he took me there on Monday and Tuesday days. I had a nice time too. It is very cold now. My school opened to-day. I received a great many presents Christmas; did you? I have many books, and I like them very much. I don't believe I could go without them. Did you play with dolls when you were a little girl?

MEL B.
Shall I tell you a droll story I read the other day about a parrot? A prize had been offered for the parrot which should utter the most intelligent speech on the spur of the moment. A gentleman drilled his bird in one sentence until it could speak it with great fluency, and when the day of the competition arrived, he took his pet to the appointed place after the others and had it brought in and put in place. Uncovering his cage, Polly looked about knowingly, held his head on one side, and exclaimed, "What a lot of parrots!" Polly took the prize. Now I have no time to answer all your little questions, so please fancy my replies for yourself.

A SEA-SIDE ADVENTURE.

"Come on, Archie, and let's gather some shells on the beach," said Fred Dalton to his brother one sunny day.
Archie fished down the book he was reading, and eagerly followed his brother, for he was very fond of the brightly colored shells, of which numbers were to be found.

When they reached the beach they found that the shells were very scarce, so they went to collect a great many shells, which were safely deposited in the basket they had brought with them.

Whilst Archie was busily engaged in reaching a large bright shell, Fred suddenly called out: "Oh, Archie, look at that beautiful cluster over by that rock! Do let us waste across and get them."
Archie agreeing, they took off their shoes and stockings, and were soon busily engaged picking and sorting the shells.

When they had as many as they could possibly carry, they turned to go back again. But what was their dismay to see the rock they were gaily rising higher and higher, and their boots, which they left on the other side, gradually becoming covered with water, until nothing was to be seen of them!

"Shout for help, Archie!—shout!" cried Fred, whilst he, in a hoarse voice, shouted "I'm drownded," "Help! Help!"

"I want to go home, Fred, oh, do let me go home," said Archie, crying bitterly.
He was comforted, as best he could, and then, hastily taking out his handkerchief, and snatching off Archie's pinafore, he tied them on a stick that happened to be lying near, and waded it through the head-showering water, to help the white. After doing this for some time without success, he flung down the stick in despair.

"Come here, Archie, I'll help you," said Fred, he cried, whilst Archie burst into tears again.

"That you sha'n't, me 'arties, whilst I'm afloat," said his very young brother, Fred, felt as if he could have hugged the speaker as he recognized old Tim the fisherman, an old friend of Archie's and his, as he wished now to get out of the water on his skiff, the Adeline, a strong, weather-beaten craft.

In a few seconds Fred and Archie, with the help of the fisherman, were being rowed ashore home.
"The little 'arties 'as 'ad an adventure, mum," said old Tim, as he placed the children in Mrs. Dalton's arms, and she relieved them of their wet clothes as they had been told to him by Fred.

"I shall never know how to reward you, Tim," she said when he had finished, as she slipped a half-a-crown into his horny palm.
"Lor bless you, mum, I 'on'y did as any body wud 'a 'ad 'uman natur in 'em woud 'a done." he said, as he slipped the money into his pocket and, with a "thankie, mum," departed.

For two weeks Archie was laid up in bed with fever, the result of being in the water, but under the skilful treatment of the doctor and the patient, loving care of his mother, he was recovered, and was soon bright and well as ever.

Fred never looks at his new boots now without thinking of his and Archie's adventure.
SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND. HARRY C. (AGE 12).

MILFORD CENTRE, OHIO.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and am enjoying it. I go to school in the winter I skate there; the distance is about one mile and a half. I have a shepherd dog, a cat, and a squirrel. The dog is trained to get my ball when I throw it away, and he will carry a basket at my side. When I hide my hat and tell him to get it, he will go and hunt, and when he finds it he will bring it to me. I have a dog that will carry wood too. I would like to correspond with some boy of my age. I am thirteen years old.

This is a very good letter, dear.

SOUTH BACON, NEW JERSEY.

I live with my cousins on a dog farm, where we raise great quantities of apries, peaches, and other fruits. A great many years ago, when this country was in the sole possession of the Eshkian Indians, they had quite a large village on one end of our farm. The spot where the village stood can be seen yet, for it stands on a little hill, and the ground around it is a great deal blacker than the surrounding ground. My uncle told me it is caused by the Indians having emptied their dyes and face paints and left the ashes of their camp fires lying open to the ground, and the blackness is still there, for the ground is very rich. I helped plough and harrow that field last year and the year before, and we boys picked up every thing that we could find, and we got a great plenty of them. Sometimes we would each come in at noon with a pocketful or two. In that way we have collected a large number of shells, some of gray flint. As we boys do not care to keep all of them, and can find more, I will send one to any reader of the Post-office box who cares to send a two-cent stamp to pay for the postage. I have a cousin who is a beautiful penman, and he is giving me lessons, but I am afraid I don't improve very fast.
Your young farmer reader, A. QUICK.

Thanks for the arrow-head you were good enough to send to the Postmistress, who gave it in turn to one of her boy friends to add to his collection.

GAY HEAD, NEW YORK.

I attended a Christmas tree, and had a very nice time. The recitations and songs were charming. I received a gold ring, some candy, and went to school and saw my old friends and teachers and history, and our teacher teaches us physiology. I have three sisters, named Katie, Della, and Orma. Forgets we have a dog named Tom, and a cat named Tommy, and we have a little kitten named Mattie. My favorite books are Six Girls, Swiss Family Robinson, Verlynn, How to Read, and How to Live. I am very fond of my school, and they look very grand, in both summer and winter. I am fourteen years old. I am very much pleased to think that the new year is here. I am corresponding with a girl who lives in Minnesota; I receive very interesting letters from her.

I am a little boy ten years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, reading, spelling, writing, geography, hygiene, and drawing. I did not miss one day of school for four months. I was in the B class three months, and in that time I was at the head of the roll of honor. I had a walnut tree that had given me a walnut case, a gold ring, a book, an inkstand, and a scrap-book. I have a little sister, whose name is Lovell. My mother has a dog named Tom, and a cat named Mattie, and a very little kitten, who very often tries to kill the bird.
FRED D. B.

Dear Postmistress,—I am a boy twelve years of age and live in the country. Although I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, this is the first time I have ever written you a letter. I would like very much to correspond with a boy reader of this issue of my own age. Please publish this, as it is the first. With much love, Maud V. P. W.: With 80 more years, you must be kept busy.—Lillie R., Annie O., Frank H. S., Bessie H., and Maudie M., you are each and all. We are indebted to Christine (age 8) for the following receipt for vinegar only: Two cups of brown sugar, a half-cup of water, four tablespoons of vinegar, and a little butter. Christine and her sister Ada are little house-keepers already, and are quite famous in the family for their candy, which Harry and Janice help them eat. Polly (age 12) is still learning to knit, and pulls.—Jessie Louise F. has plenty to do at school for a girl only nine years old. Poor child, she was ill in bed when she wrote to me. I hope she is quite well again now.—Several little stories are waiting until we can find room to place them in the Post-office Box, and the youthful authors must be patient, as, indeed, I think they are.—Wilfred and Erneuaerge are brother and sister, and they attend the same school. I think —do not you?—that Erneuaerge ought always to have an attendant on her way to and from school, in the person of Wilfred, and that he ought to be ready at any time to carry her books, and perform any other service which a lady may expect from a gentleman. I should not like to see Wilfred if I supposed that he ever, for one moment, kept his hat on his head in the house, in the presence of Erneuaerge or his mother. The place for a boy's hat, when ladies are in his company anywhere in-doors, is in his hand or on the table, never on his head. I heard a little fellow not long ago remark, "I carry a hat for a lady's expression." It was not a very dreadful word, though it was not a polite one, and my little champion said "—sh,—sh! ladies are present." I was pleased to observe his deference to ladies, but I thought, too, that a truly gentlemanly boy owes it to himself never to use a word for which in any company he would find it necessary to apologize.

“LITTLE BLUE RIBBONS.”

“LITTLE Blue Ribbons!” We call her that
 From the ribbons she wears in her favorite hat;
 For may not a person be only five,
 And yet have the neatest of taste alive?
 As a matter of fact, this one has views
 Of the strictest sort as to frocks and shoes;
 And we never object to a sash or bow
 When “Little Blue Ribbons” prefers it so.

“Little Blue Ribbons” has eyes of blue,
 And an arch little mouth, when the teeth peep through;
 And her primitive look is wise and grave,
 With a sense of the weight of the word “behave”;

And I know that she fully expects to meet
 With a lion or wolf in Regent Street.
 We may smile and deny as we like. But, no;
 For “Little Blue Ribbons” still dreams it so.

Dear “Little Blue Ribbons!” She tells us all
 That she never intends to be “great” and “tall”
 (For how could she ever contrive to sit
 In her “own, own chair,” if she grew one bit!);
 And, further, she says, she intends to stay
 In her “darling home” till she gets “quite gray”;
 Alas! we are gray; and we doubt, you know,
 But “Little Blue Ribbons” will have it so.
 —ATSTIN DORSON, “At the Sign of the Lyre.”

1. What is this, anyhow?

4. There's always something queer about these imported toys.

8. Just as I suspected—nothing but sawdust.

2. Come off that, will you?

5. But I'll take good care he don't play any of his tricks this time.

9. But I'm bound to see this thing through; so here goes.

3. Ki-yi! Why, he actually hit me.

6. Hello! What's happened?

10. Won't somebody please help me out?

"CALLED BACK"—FROM A PAINTING BY CLINTON PETERS.

THE PASSENGER IN THE GRAY CLOAK.

BY DAVID KER.

"WHEN I was a young fellow," said Mr. Thomas Bullion, of the well-known London firm of Bullion, Silverley, & Co. "I was the most positive man alive—never let anybody else say a word when once I'd made up my mind about anything. If I'd heard Nelson talk about sea fights or Soyer about cooking, I'd have been sure to contradict them, and make out I knew more about it than they did. Somebody said once to my poor brother Jack, the lawyer—who was rather a dictatorial sort of a chap himself—that he did well to lay down the law, for he certainly hadn't gained much by taking it up. But I was every bit as bad as he was, and worse too."

Mr. Bullion brought out this last confession with that self complacent emphasis wherewith an Englishman will sometimes own himself guilty of things which, if laid to his charge by any other man, would probably impel him to punch that other man's head on the spot.

"You remember that story," he proceeded, "about the argumentative man who, hearing a watchman calling out under his window one bitter January night, 'Past one o'clock, and a fine starlight morning?' jumped out of bed, rushed to the window, threw it up, and bawled out to him, 'Yes, but is it past one o'clock?' Well, sir, that's just the sort of fellow that I was when I first started; but I've had a lesson about contradicting and being positive that will last me all my life.

"This was how it happened. One cold morning in the early spring (I don't exactly remember what year it was, but anyway more years ago than I'd particularly care to count now), I was going into the City as usual by omnibus. There were four or five other men in the same line of business as myself, who generally went in about the same time as I did; and when I got into the 'bus that morning, I found the whole lot of 'em together. The only man there that I didn't know was a queer-looking chap who sat in the far corner, with his hat so pulled down over his eyes, and the collar of his gray cloak so turned up round his neck, that his face could hardly be seen at all; and he kept so still that I made sure he must be asleep, and thought no more about him.

"Well, we all began talking, and somehow or other we came round to the battle of Waterloo, and there got up a dispute about whether the gate of Hougoumont had really been shut against the French by one man or not. Sam Lockitt, of Lockitt & Redwood (he's dead now, poor fellow!), stuck out that it had, and I, of course, contradicted him flat, and said that it was all bosh, and that no one man could be strong enough to do it.

"Ah, we all know your ways, Tom," says Sam; "you'd say black was white, if anybody else said it wasn't. Did you happen to be engaged at Waterloo yourself without knowing it?"

"Never you mind," says I; "if I wasn't, I've known them that were, or that have met others who were, which is the same thing."

"Of course it is," says Sam, winking at the rest. "Why, Tom, you're as good as that countryman in the story, who, when they asked him if he'd ever seen the King, replied, 'Noa, I niver saw the King, but I've got a cousin as once coom very nigh sein' the Dook o' Wellington.'"

"Well, then I got quite savage, for in those days I could never abide being laughed at; but before I could break out, one of the other fellows struck in suddenly:

"Look here; we're just three to three—Sam and we two against Tom and you two. This gentleman here" (pointing to the man in the gray cloak) "has the casting vote. Beg pardon, sir; which way do you say it was?"

"The gray-cloaked man turned his head slowly round, just like that moving wax figure in Madame Tussaud's, and said, in a sharp, chopping kind of voice, as if he were giving orders to cut somebody's head off: 'One man shut the gate. It was Colonel McDonnell.'

"Oh, indeed," says I. "You don't happen to be a friend of Colonel McDonnell, do you? or perhaps you're Colonel McDonnell himself, and we're to take your own word that you did it, I suppose? What do you know about Waterloo, I should like to know?"

"The man never answered a word, but just turned down the collar of his cloak, lifted his hat about an inch off his head, and looked me full in the face.

"Talk of being hit by a thunder-bolt! If half a dozen thunder-bolts had gone down my throat, one after the other, I couldn't have been more utterly floored. This man whom I'd been contradicting, and bullying, and asking what he knew about Waterloo, was the Duke of Wellington himself!

"I've never been positive since that day, and, what's more, I don't think I ever shall again."

HOW AUNT PATIENCE KILLED THE PANTHER.

BY EMILY BAILEY.

READING one day a story called "How Grandmother killed the Bear" reminded me of my grandmother and the stories she used to tell—dear grandma! with her white hair, her soft dim blue eyes, and her gentle smile!

Years ago, she said (one cold winter night when the wind whistled noisily down the chimney, and we gathered cozily around the fire)—years ago, before I was born, Uncle John and Aunt Patience came from England to find a home in the wilderness here. They made a clearing, and built a little log house with only one room, warm and comfortable in winter, pleasant and airy in summer. I say they, for Aunt Patience helped with her hands as well as with her heart. In those days the chimney was nearly half the size of the house, and in the cold weather, when the stone hearth was piled high with the big logs cut from the many trees that grew around their home, and the flames roared and crackled up the wide mouth of the huge chimney, Aunt Patience thought nothing could be more cheerful and home-like; and in the summer the cool breeze swept down from the tree-tops, "singing and sighing like a voice from home," she said.

Aunt Patience was very, very lonely sometimes, when Uncle John would go to mill, and she could not hear the strokes of his axe all day long. The nearest mill was many miles away, and one bright summer morning Uncle John started with the bags of grain securely fastened to the back of the old horse, and with his gun on his shoulder, for it was not safe to ride through the woods without it.

"Good-by, little woman," he said; "don't be lonely or frightened. When it begins to be dark, fasten the door and window, and I will be home before morning."

Aunt Patience watched him spring to his horse's back, and ride away in the sweet dewy June morning, with a strange dull sinking at her heart, then went about her daily tasks, making the house bright and clean, and when night came she milked their cow Daisy, and locked her up in the little lean-to back of the house, for fear of the Indians, some of whom were impudent and thievish. Still, Aunt Patience had no great fear of them, and when all was done, and the gloomy night settled down, she saw all was safe, and took her work, sat down by the one light, and tried to wait quietly for the welcome sound of the old horse's footsteps coming through the wood.

Nine! ten! said the little clock they had brought from their home over the sea. No sound outside but the whip-poor-will's plaintive call and the sighing of the night wind.

No sound? Hark! Was that a footstep, soft and stealthy? Indians, thought the poor woman, listening, expecting to hear a harsh whisper at the key-hole, "White squaw no there?" Again, round and round the house, two of them, she thought. It seemed like two pair of creeping feet, then a scratching sound, and a low deep growl from over her head. Looking suddenly up the wide chimney, she saw the lithe waving body and fiery eyes of a huge panther crouching just ready to spring down.

What could she do? Open the door and dash away to the woods? Certain death! for then she would be an easy prey to the panther. Another deep growl, louder and more angry. Then, remembering the fear such creatures have of fire, quick as thought she snatched the straw bed from the bedstead in the corner, tore open the cover, and emptied all the straw upon the few embers that still remained on the hearth.

In a moment there was a blaze, a fierce heat, and with the blaze and heat pouring into his face, the panther gave loud cries of rage and slunk off into the wood.

But Aunt Patience knew too well it was only for a short time. Soon the fire would burn itself all out, and back he would come. Oh for the sound of the trot, trot, trot through the clearing! Alas! no horse, no Uncle John. Again the stealthy footsteps around the house, stealing softly, softly, and her heart grew faint with fear.

Ah! the old musket over the door, kept to frighten crows from the corn field and hawks from the chickens. Quickly it was taken down, as quickly loaded; then scratch! scratch! more cautiously than before, and once more Aunt Patience heard the blood-chilling growl, the fiery eyes looked down, and the huge yellow body swayed to and fro in the dim light. She knelt down, raised the gun to her shoulder, and with one quick prayer, fired.

There was a scream of rage and pain, a great bound, a mighty crash, and Aunt Patience sprang up in time to miss the terrible panther falling down the chimney and rolling over and over on the floor in his death agony. Even then he was dangerous, for his mighty claws tore up great slivers of the wood, and his huge body, as it struggled and rolled from side to side, broke everything in its way.

Aunt Patience climbed on the high bedstead and crouched in one corner, trembling and fearing that her danger was not over yet. At last, with one drawing up and straightening of the great limbs, and one tremendous struggle, the monstrous body quivered once and was still.

Then the brave little woman stepped down from her place of safety, crept cautiously across the floor, expecting the great red eyes to open and the dreadful claws to snatch at her, till she reached the door, when in a moment the fastenings were undone, and she rushed out into the fragrant night air. As she did so the welcome sound of old Whitefoot's trot came faintly to her ear, then nearer, nearer, and soon she saw horse and rider appear through the gloom. Oh, how glad she was, and how thankful Uncle John! What could he say when he saw the great beast lying dead on the floor of their home, and thought that but for her bravery and courage his dear wife might have been torn in pieces long before his?

Aunt Patience never staid alone in the house again at night; and though she had many other adventures while living in the wilderness before a village grew up around him, she never forgot that one terrible night when she killed the panther.

HOW TO MAKE A TELEPHONE.

BY R. B. WILLIAMS.

THE telephone which I am about to describe has been a source of great pleasure to me, and as I think it too good to keep, I will give my readers the plans for its construction:

The materials you will require are two pine boards ten by thirteen inches, and half an inch thick, two fresh beef bladders, one box of four-ounce tacks, two large gutta-percha overcoat buttons, some strips of thin leather one-quarter of an inch wide, and lastly, some flexible wire. The best wire for the purpose is that used in book binding machines, but if that cannot be obtained, any soft flexible wire will do.

Prepare the bladders first by blowing them uptightly, and leaving them so for a day or two until they are thoroughly stretched, but do not let them become dry and hard. While the bladders are stretching you can obtain the other materials. To begin, take one of the boards, and having brought it to the required dimensions, draw a circle in its centre eight inches in diameter, which saw out, taking care to keep on the line, for if the opening is not round and even, the instrument will not work satisfactorily.

Next take one of the bladders, and after cutting the neck off, cut away about one-third of it from end to end; then soak it in warm water, but not too hot, until it becomes white and soft; after which stretch it loosely but evenly over the opening, letting the inside of the bladder be on top, and tack temporarily all around one inch from the edge of the opening.

Now test it by pushing the centre with your finger; if it stretches smoothly and without wrinkles, it will do; but if it does not, you must change its position until it does so. Next take a strip of the leather and tack completely around the edge of the opening, putting the tacks closely together, and taking care to keep the bladder stretched evenly while doing so. When you have it tacked properly, take your knife and cut away that part of the bladder on the outside strip. (Fig. 1.)

This done, break off three feet of the wire, and after attaching it to one of the buttons (Fig. 2), pass the free end through the centre of the bladder until the button rests on its surface. Then fasten a weight of eight pounds to the end of the wire, and set in the sun two hours or more until thoroughly dry. (Fig. 3.)

Proceed with the other materials in a like manner, and when you have both drums well dried, place one at each end of the line, and connect the button wires with the main wire by loops, and stretch it as tightly as possible. The course of the main wire should be as straight as possible, and with few sharp angles.

Wherever a support is needed, make a loop.

FIG. 1.

FIG. 2.

FIG. 3.

To call up, strike the button with a lead pencil, and the one called will respond in a like manner.

This is no toy, but a good serviceable telephone, and will work from five yards to five miles.

THE CALF'S STORY

BY R. K. MCKNITTRECK.

I AM only a little baby calf four weeks old; but in my brief life I have seen and gone through as much as a great big cow. I was born just over the hill yonder during a snow-storm, and another calf who is somewhat older than myself tells me that after a while the snow goes away and all the earth turns green. I am told that when the earth is green everything in nature is more harmonious and pleasant; but I cannot for the four weeks' life of me see why it should be pleasanter green than white, or blue, or yellow, for that matter. And then suppose one should be color-blind, what good would the green do one?

I don't believe all I hear, anyhow, especially what I am told by these frolicsome calves who are a month or so my seniors. They delight in telling me all sorts of things, and I never can tell what to believe until I have repeated their stories to mamma. Poor mamma! I haven't seen her now for some time, by-the-way, because I was taken from her and sent over here as a present. She used to sing me a little song about the cow jumping over the moon, and I liked it very much, but wondered if the cow hurt herself when she came down.

I am leading a very strange sort of existence, and no mistake. The other day one of the boys poked a corn husk at me, and tried to make me eat it; the more I backed off, the more he thrust it at me. He might have known by my polite refusal that I appreciated his kindness and gracious courtesy, for I would have you understand that I am a refined calf, with great family pride. On my mother's side I am all Jersey, and on my father's I am a thorough-bred Durham, my great-great-grandfather being the original Duke of Durham.

Then the boys said they would teach me to drink. This was one day just after the butcher had left. They had called him in to see if he would buy me, but they couldn't agree on a price. They wanted a dollar more for me than the butcher was willing to give; so I still live. It makes me shudder still when I reflect on the barbarous manner in which they spoke of me. I was simply divided up into every possible dish I could make. They spoke of me as though I were a restaurant, and not a barn-yard animal. I cannot get it through my brains (which they speak of frying and serving with tomato sauce) what they mean by filling me with horror in so unnecessary a manner. The idea of suggesting to each other what good mock-turtle soup, calf's head à la two or three different things, and veal pot-pies I would make! And then to speak of the beautiful calf-skin boots that could be made of my hide! Ah, gentle reader, if I could only plant a well-merited kick on the anatomy of any one of my tormentors, that person would conclude, on recovering consciousness, that I would make about the toughest and hardest kicking boots to be found in this or any other country.

So they brought out a large pail of milk after the butcher had gone, and said they were going to teach me to drink. I naturally held back, under the impression that they were about to play some cruel and ingenious joke on me, such as holding my head down in the milk, so I held back by planting my fore-feet in the ground. After I got braced, they grasped me by the head and hauled me up to the pail, and got my nose in the milk. I felt very much like upsetting the pail, and letting my hind-legs fly into the crowd, but just then I thought of my gentle blood, and refrained from such an uncouth expedient. So I drank, much more to my own delight than theirs, for after they had started me by putting their hands in my mouth from under the surface of the milk to satisfy me that everything was all right, I could have removed their fingers with the nicety of a hay-cutter if I had been an evil-minded calf.

"THEY SAID THEY WERE GOING TO TEACH ME TO DRINK."

"He'll kill himself, drinking so much," said one of the boys.

"You'd better hold the handle of the pail, or he'll swallow that too," remarked another.

As I turned to see what they meant by such conduct, they all roared with laughter, because my face was snow-white with milk. I couldn't see anything particularly funny in that, but it seems it was funny just the same. And then the boy who had hold of my tail drove me around the barn-yard in that ludicrous manner, and called it playing circus. I did my best to turn suddenly and throw him, but couldn't. Then they said I was spotted like a circus pony, and might be beautiful if I were not all legs. They asked me where I put my legs when I went to sleep, and inquired if I thought I should be crushed by the distance of the fall if something should knock me suddenly off my feet. This suggested to their vulgar minds the unpoetic title of Legsy—a name by which I shall probably always be known while whole and undivided into rounds, steaks, and roasting pieces.

But look out for yourselves, my boys. Remember that time brings about curious changes. The bird cannot fly until he has wings, and the bull cannot buck until he has horns. Some of these fine days I shall be most happy to extend you my tail in the hope that you will grasp it, and then I shall proceed to mar the symmetrical beauty of your raiment, for I shall toss you in the air, and catch you as you come down, and you won't touch the ground until I tire of the novelty. Yes, soon I shall have a great pair of horns. Until then, take me—oh! take me back into my mamma, who at this moment is probably dreaming of her poor little baby boy in the little barn just over yonder hill.

A VALENTINE.—By MARGARET JOHNSON.

THE February skies are cold,
And wear a look of snowing;
The frozen fields are brown and old;
The sullen winds are blowing.

What is there in this wintry air
To make me think of you, dear?—
You with the sunshine in your hair,
And eyes of heaven's own blue, dear—

You with the breezes' airy grace,
And cheeks like any blossom,
The summer's brightness in your face,
Her sweetness in your bosom!

The darkness gathers 'closer round,
The sunset dimly dying;
The wind has but a dreary sound
Against the casement sighing.

If valentines were sent in May,
Or rosy, laughing June, dear,
I'd sing a blither roundelay
Set to a sweeter tune, dear.

But since my rhymes must woven be
In frosty February,
Ah! then the more, dear, come to me,
And teach me to be merry.

Come, let me learn some happy art
Of heavy hours beguiling—
Come, make my doubtful day, sweetheart,
The brighter with your smiling.

I shall not care, though dark the skies,
Nor sun nor stars may shine, dear,
If you, with summer in your eyes,
Will be my Valentine, dear.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROSE HOBBS," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

I WISH I could tell you all the story of that autumn and winter. It was a happy period for Faith Emerson. Happier still for Jo, whose mind, naturally active and eager, seized upon the new life with avidity; and if she failed many times in keeping her good resolutions, her temper, or her patience over her work, still the result was largely in her favor; as Faith said to Bertie one winter's day, the credit side was far, far ahead for Jo.

The school did well, and Jo had a real talent for cooking. She enjoyed it, and having learned to read, was delighted by Faith's present of various cooking-books, which she studied with excellent results; really, as Faith told Miss Grace, showing common-sense, and uncommon aptitude for the work.

"And wouldn't it be worth while to make a first-class cook of her?" said Faith. "In these days, when so many girls starve in factories, or wear out in shops, or district school-teaching, I think to train up a cook in the way she should go would be delightful."

Sailors' Row thoroughly approved of Jo Markham's launching out in this direction. Many times her services were called into requisition in the neighborhood where there was sickness or trouble, and some tired mother was glad to have help in her kitchen, especially after Jo's good cooking had once been demonstrated.

It pleased her. The springs of self-respect were touched at last, and Jo had an ideal, a standard—something she was trying to be or to do, which Faith knew was the greatest gain of all. "She could no longer say 'Who cares?' or, 'I don't care;' or, 'It's nobody's business what Jo Markham does.'" Faith, slowly leading her to know that one greater than all others always cares, that she must care, and that Jo Markham was a responsible being who had something real to do, encouraged her in trying to make the very best of herself to herself. For we talk about being humble, and hiding our light, and not letting one hand know the other's deed, yet this is often misinterpreted or exaggerated.

It is a great help to know that we are doing right, to feel that we are "growing," and all of this can be encouraged without any fear that our right hand shall know too well the deeds of the left.

And at home things were better for Jo. Instead of blows and angry words, the worst she had to hear were the taunts and sarcasms of her grandfather when she came back from her frequent visits to North Street. He upbraided her for making so little "out of" Miss Emerson.

"Anybody else 'd be gettin' all your poor old grandfather wants," he would say, sitting in his chimney-corner and smoking the tobacco Miss Emerson supplied him with. At such times Jo's eyes would flash fire, and if she was at work, the pots and pans would be rattled ominously.

With all the strength of her crude yet really deep nature Jo loved and revered Faith. It had taken months to bring her to this point of solemn devotion; but now the girl had reached a period where she could look back, and, even though vaguely, trace results back to their cause. She was beginning to know what Miss Emerson had done for her.

"Jo," said Miss Emerson, one morning, "why don't you grow taller? You are such a strong girl, too. You ought to be ashamed of being so little;" and as Jo by this time had learned to understand Miss Emerson's way of joking, she laughed merrily in answer.

"I know it, Miss Faith," she answered; "I wish I could grow tall."

They were standing in a side corridor back of the store closets. It was a sort of passage-way leading out on one side of the house, to the main hall by one door and to the kitchen department by another. Shelves ran along one side of it, where Faith kept various jars of herbs and dried leaves, and such articles which, in her grandmother's day, had constituted a genuine "still-room." At the lower end of the little passage was quite a large window overlooking a terrace. It was a sunny place in spring or summer, so that there Faith cultivated her first spring flowers.

Jo stood in the window looking down upon the June blossoms, and beyond them to the tree under which she and Miss Emerson had had their first talk.

How long ago it seemed to the girl! Perhaps Jo was, all unconsciously, "counting time by heart-throbs," as a famous poet once wrote, for until this year everything had drifted on with so little purpose in her life that months and years meant nothing, and in this one year she had grown as much in heart and mind and soul as many others would in ten.

And Faith looked at her with supreme content. Yes, she thought Bertie had been right—Jo Markham was "worth while."

"Miss Faith," said Jo, suddenly, "do you see what a loose fastening there is on this window?" She pulled it up and down as she spoke.

Faith scarcely heard the words, for at that moment the cook appeared with some inquiry about a dinner party Miss Emerson was to give that day. The cook's ears, however, were keener, especially as Jo was no very great favorite with her, she, in company with the coachman, having decided that Miss Emerson wasted a great deal too much time and trouble on that "Sailors' Row lot," as they called Faith's humble pensioners.

"Yes, indeed, it's loose," said the cook, in an aggrieved way. "It'll have to be looked to."

And Faith remembered later that in a vague way she turned and watched Jo slide the window up and down.

That day Miss Emerson allowed Jo to remain and help in certain preparations for the dinner party. It was quite a special occasion, being given in honor of Bertie's graduating from the Ashfield Academy, where he had come off with flying colors. Faith wanted to make as much of the event as possible; she looked forward to Bertie's distinguishing himself, and at least felt sure he would always do his friends and relations credit; but this day was, as it were, the beginning of that future, and she wanted the lad to remember how kindly and hopefully all had wished him good-speed.

Jo enjoyed being in the beautiful dining-room with Faith, helping her to arrange the flowers, to train vines about the sideboard and above the pictures in the room, and to make a perfect bower of the doorways leading into the library. How beautiful it all looked, thought Jo, enjoying the pleasure which came from her newly awakened sense of refinement. Long afterward she recalled the last few moments she remained that day with Miss Emerson. A half-uttered wish to see the young lady in her dinner dress was enough to make Faith desire her to stay, and so the final impression was a happy one, of Faith in her dress of creamy white mull and laces standing in the square hallway, where as yet no candle-light was needed; but even in the half-dusk Jo could see the flash of Faith's little shining cross, could see how fair and beautiful and tender was the face she had grown to love so dearly then.

"Jo," said Miss Emerson, with a bright smile, "you must come back early to-morrow and help me again, and I'll tell you a grand new secret I have for you."

The girl went away feeling as though it was worth something, worth anything, to try and be good and do all that she was bidden. Not a very brilliant mind was little

* Begun in No. 324, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Jo's, but it had its own keen and responsive corners, and all sorts of new impressions had been made there. She walked along the twilight streets happy and contented. Sailors' Row could never be inviting, but somehow she had learned to make the best of it, and she had a real interest in her own little housekeeping. The sunset had died out before Jo neared home, but there was light enough for her to see the kitchen windows plainly, and, as she approached the house, to observe that within her grandfather had company. One of the windows was open, the summer breeze had caught the bit of muslin curtain and swept it outward, giving Jo, as she stood still a moment, a clearer view of the interior.

At a table in the centre of the room sat Job Martin, Sandy's father, and near him were two men whom Jo knew well—knew as her grandfather's worst associates. A low-toned though eager discussion seemed to be going on, the old man in his chimney-corner smoking and nodding his head from time to time with silent though evident approval.

Jo stood still with a sudden pang, a fear of what she could not say at her heart.

CHAPTER IX.

SOMETHING was going to happen—that the girl felt instinctively—but what it might or might not be she could not tell. Accustomed to the ways, the tones, the looks, of the people in her own life as was Miss Emerson to those in her class, Jo knew in an instant that some evil was brewing; she read in Job Martin's small black eyes, in Bob Tucker's satisfied leer, and young Ryerson's excited, flushed face, that a plot was being made which meant harm somewhere for some one.

Every one of the trio had been in jail time and again. Any more disreputable set of men could hardly have been gathered together, even in Sailors' Row; but of late, as Jo had been thankful to know, they had kept away at least from her grandfather's home. This made their present gathering there in force all the more significant.

The girl outside the window stood still, as I say, not knowing what to do, unable to catch the meaning of what they said, and yet the general drift reached her within a few moments. A plan was on foot for some enterprise that night. The men moved, their voices were lowered, they were going away.

Quick as a flash Jo sped around to the other side of the house, waited until the shuffling, miserable-looking figures had gone down the hill, and then quietly presented herself at the door of the kitchen.

Old Markham looked up with the sort of growl which was his usual salutation to Jo.

"Been up with your fine friends, I suppose?" he said, sarcastically.

Jo was standing very still by the table, brushing off some bits of tobacco in a mechanical way, while she strove to feel composed enough to speak.

"Yes," she said at last, and looking squarely at the old man, "I have been helping Miss Emerson; she has a big party to-night."

The old man gave a chuckle.

"Dear, oh dear!" he said, slowly shaking his head; "what a good thing it is for you to have such a kind friend! Plenty of money and jewelry and silver and everything, hasn't she, Jo?"

Jo was raking the fire before making tea, and at this she flashed one of her old angry looks at her grandfather.

"What if she has?" she exclaimed, passionately; "who has a better right to them, I'd like to know? Who gives more to poor people, and—and everything?" concluded Jo, breaking down in her excitement.

"Dear me! dear me!" repeated the old man, in a tantalizing way, as he refilled his pipe.

Jo clattered about, setting the cups and saucers and plates down on the table with unusual vigor. She felt uneasy, perplexed, and troubled.

"Grandfather," she said, suddenly, and again facing the old man with a determined air, "why did you have Martin and his friends in here? You know they're bad men, and always up to some sort of mischief."

Old Markham stared at Jo for a moment in silence. The fact was that he did not know exactly what to say. Jo, standing defiant, erect, and full of a righteous wrath, was a different person from anything he remembered to have seen her. He hardly knew whether to be afraid of his granddaughter or not. Perhaps it would be as well to conciliate her a little.

"I dunno as they're such a bad lot," he said; and added, in a whining tone, "I should think you'd be ashamed, Josephine, to complain of your poor old grandfather's havin' a little company now and then."

"Company?" echoed Jo, with infinite scorn; "why, grandfather, what sort of company's that crowd?"

But as the old man had relapsed into his most dejected and whining manner, Jo knew that further discussion was useless. She tried to eat her meal, but the uncomfortable, restless feeling which the sight of those men and their chance words had produced still lingered, making it almost impossible for her to keep quiet or swallow a morsel of the bread and molasses which was her regular supper.

As soon as she had cleared the table and put the kitchen to rights, Jo rushed up to her little attic to sit and think what she had better do.

The words "To-night's the best for the game" had filled her with uneasiness; all her old knowledge of the ways and means of such men came back to her, and she felt certain that some bad deed was being planned. But of what use would it be to go to any one and report them? She could prove nothing; she could not even assert positively what she had heard them say.

Jo sat on the floor in her window, watching the darkness gather and the stars come out solemnly and peacefully in the summer sky. Looking up at those sentinels of God's gateway, a prayer grew in her heart, and found some sort of slow but earnest utterance upon her lips. She asked in her own crude though fervent way for help, for guidance, for something to do.

She longed to go up to Faith with this new anxiety, and yet she knew that she could not disturb the dinner festivity; that none of the servants would allow her even to send a message to their young mistress at such an hour; meanwhile, as time went on and the evening was nearly spent, her dread began to lessen. It was ten o'clock before Jo made any effort to leave the window; all was silent below, although, as she knew, her grandfather had not left the kitchen.

Tired out with much thinking and with anxiety, Jo was about to move away from the window when suddenly down the slope at the back of the house came three figures—Martin, Ryerson, and Tucker. She knew them only too well.

They came along softly, and keeping close to the wall of the house, reached the doorway and went in. Jo rose to her feet with absolute control of herself, for she felt that there was something ahead of her which might require all her self-command.

The men's voices, low-toned though excited, reached her. She crept out to the narrow staircase, and crouching down, tried to hear what was said.

Not fearing Jo in any way, they had left the kitchen door partly open. Through it came the husky tones; words now and then struck her ear, but the sense of what was being said was difficult to catch. Jo waited motionless and almost holding her breath.

"One o'clock's time enough," she heard in a deliberate tone from Martin, "and we can lay low here until then."

"GRANDFATHER," SHE SAID, SUDDENLY, "WHY DID YOU HAVE MARTIN AND HIS FRIENDS HERE?"

One o'clock! It was not eleven yet. What did they mean to do? Where were they going?

"She knows the house well enough," came next from Ryerson; and then old Markham's broken voice, saying,

"No, no, boys, she wouldn't help ye! don't you believe it."

"Where is she now?" Martin asked.

"Sound asleep, I guess; but I'll go an' see."

And as Jo heard her grandfather's chair creak she fled wildly back to her room, and into the little bed in the corner, where, drawing the counterpane close to her chin, she closed her eyes, and tried to stop the quick breathing that terror and her sudden movement had produced.

The old man came up the stairs with a candle in his hand. Jo was motionless. He stood in the doorway a moment, but came no further, evidently satisfied that she was sound asleep, for an instant later she heard his slow, heavy step on the staircase, and then the voices sounded below.

She might have done something at once, but that suddenly one of the dizzy, faint turns which now and then came over the girl to remind her of her long illness at North Street forced her to keep still—to close her eyes, almost losing consciousness; and how long it lasted Jo could not tell. She came back, as it were, to her old vigor, roused by stealthy sounds below. The men were moving; they were going. Jo sat up and gazed about her in a bewildered way. There was no moon that night, but the starlight seemed singularly clear, and Jo could see some of the objects in her attic plainly. When she found her way to the still open window she saw that the three men were already outside the house.

For just one instant Jo hesitated. Then her resolve was taken, and stealing softly down the stairs she opened the old door, and with her eyes fixed on the dark figures moving ahead of her up the Row, she crept slowly after them; now hiding for an instant in the shadow of that doorway, now standing motionless when their footsteps lagged, but always with her gaze riveted upon them, and with no sign of dread or hesitation in her slow and cautious steps. She believed she knew where they were going, and she could at least follow them.

THE SPIRIT OF THE MARSHALLS.

BY MARGARET EMMA DITTO.

I.

"DO look here, Davenport: there has not been a living creature on the street for three hours, and here is Old Reuben plunging through it all—the latest thing out. See, he is turning into our yard now with something on his back. It looks like a lumber-yard. I dare say it is a cord of kindlings, wood-house and all. Bless his old heart!"

The boy to whom this was addressed sprang up, gave a quick look out of the window, dashed his book on the sofa, and rushed out of the room and through the house, leaving a wake of open doors behind him, through which the gusts of whirling snow came sifting in, while the boy stood at the wood-shed door, shouting through the storm:

"Hello, Uncle Reub! This way, old Sand-blind! You are a pretty old snow-flake, ain't you? Blow in—blow in with the rest of 'em, quick too, or all out doors will be in upon us. What you got there—a cellar door or a board overcoat? Come on. Dump yourself and bang off the snow. I declare, it is a sled!"

A. B. Frost
1885

"HE LOITERED ON THE HILLSIDE AND WATCHED THE GOASTERS WITH BEAMING FACE."

"It is a sled, Marse Port, an' it's yours; an' I made dat sled myself; an' I'll tell you all about it when I gets my breff o' life agin." The darky said this quite solemnly and slowly, for he was breathless from his struggles.

"Whew!" whistled the boy. "Well, I should say you did make it yourself. It's a big one! it's a stunner! it's two sleds! it's boss! That will hold four easy, and six on a squeeze. Why, there isn't a sled like that in Haddam!"

"Ob co'se dey ain't, Marse Port. It's low dey ain't no such sled nowhar," said the old man, with an air of deep conviction.

"Oh, it is altogether fearful and wonderful, Uncle Reuben," said Mrs. Marshall, peering out into the little woodshed and shivering with the cold. "We can barricade with it in the winter, and make a back porch of it in the summer, or keep house in it, perhaps, if the annuity fails and we have to."

Uncle Reub gave a searching look at the lady, and an expression of distrust flitted over his face. This was two-edged admiration, and simple old Reuben felt that it cut two ways at once. It was only for an instant, though, for the lady came close up to him. She took his black, hardened hand in the warm clasp of both her pink and slender ones; her voice was sincere and her look was true.

"You are a chunk of solid old gold, Uncle Reuben," she said, looking up at him, while her eyes flashed an instant of tears through their merry sparkles. "To think of your making that sled for my Port, with your old rheumatic hands! You are a blessed old providence. I've heard of dark providences. Oh dear! and you are one of them. I wish I was as white and shining as you are in the inside. Come in and get comfortable. Stay through the storm."

"Oh no, Mis' Marshall," said the old darky, much moved; "I's 'lowed to go home to-night. It's jest come ober to bring de sled."

"Oh, no, no, never; you won't go out in this storm—you sha'n't," cried the lady, putting in the negatives with great energy. "You and the sled will stay here to-night, and have a shake-down made up in the kitchen, and you'll sleep there and keep up the fires, and dig us out of the drifts when the storm is over. Take off your snowy things, Uncle Reuben."

"Peel for quarters!" seconded Port, beginning to pull off the tattered overcoat from the old man. "You jest bunk here to-night. Come in, I say."

"Bring in the sled, too," cried Mrs. Marshall, for she saw Reuben give a lingering look back at his treasure. "This shakly old wood-house is fluttering like a ribbon; the wind may fillip it off any minute, and then the sled would be gone too."

"The sled is too big to go into the kitchen," said Port, measuring the space with his eye.

"Then we will put the kitchen into the sled," replied his mother, with spirit. "It is about six of sled to half a dozen of kitchen."

"Toss up, mother; that is the only way to settle a drawn game. Toss up!"

"Not I. Never; and don't you, Port, as long as you have more head to you than a copper cent has," she cried, merrily dodging the tall invader that was boarding her small kitchen hand over hand like a pirate. The great monster, with its seven feet of reach-board, carried everything before it like an autocat. It made the chairs and tables stand around lively, the flour barrel itself yielded the right of way in heavy silence, the wood-box crouched up to the chimney like a whipped cur, and the clothes-horse had not a leg to stand on. Then the bobs stretched themselves out full length on one side of the room, and gave show of valuable staying qualities.

"It seems like having a gallery in your kitchen, or a sidewalk, or a platform like the politicians, or a balcony seat at the opera, or—yes, isn't it just like having an Oriental divan running around your room?" said Mrs. Marshall, seating herself with an air of state upon the pine couch.

"It seems like having a fine old pair of bobs for coasting as soon as this storm is over. It isn't built for speed—not entirely," said Port, critically examining the cut of the runners. "It is as strong as a horse; but the boys have got sleds that will run faster than this."

"Co'se dey hab," said Reuben, tranquilly. "Dis yer sled yent no time-serber. Ye see, Marse Port, dere yent no special reason fo' gettin' to de bottom ob dat hill. I reckons de bottom ob dat ole East Hill will las' till dis sled gets dar ebery time—dat bottom yent gwine to fall out. Dat a reg'lar Yankee trick to go jim-jammin' down dat hill, knockin' ober eberything on de road, and gittin' dar befo' eberybody else. Why, Marse Port, dis sled wa'n't made on dat idee. Dis is a gen'man's sled, goes easy and wars glubs—takes up de neighbors and de little chilens, and bows to de folks on de road. It looks sort o' new and rash, though," he added, regretfully—"kind o' sudden and s'prisin'."

"It smells nice and piney," said the lady, stroking the smooth board with her hand; "like the woods up on the mountains and the saw-mills."

"It looks right and smells right, and the steering-gear is right," said Port; "and it is heavy enough to knock out anything that runs into it."

"Das so," said the old man. "Still, I's ob de opinion dat dat sled 'ud feel better, out among de odder sleds, ef it had a coat ob brown paint on to it."

"Why, yes, Uncle Reuben, that is what it wants," laughed Mrs. Marshall. "It is just pining for it. I've got brown ochre in the house. I'll wet it up and make a stain, and you and Port can rub it on with sponges."

The old man chuckled and beamed with delight while he and Port tilted the sled up first on one side, then on the other, with newspapers under it, and slopped and splashed and mopped till the sled was entirely done brown.

"It looks kind o' grand and 'spectable," said Reuben, eying his work of art critically, with his head on one side. "It looks like it was gwine to its own funeral. I reckon more'n likely dat sled 'ud chirk up a bit ef it jess had its name printed on to it. Eh, Marse Port? Ask your mother what she tink 'bout dat, eh?"

"Why, I think just as you do, Uncle Reuben," replied the lady, with nice tact, for she had missed the thread of the discourse.

"De name ob dat sled is 'Ole Kentucky Shore.' It mout be put on wid reg'lar spellin' ob de alphabet into it—spellin' is bery good for dem dat's goin' to colleges, and gets prizes in de schools, and has it put on circwise—so, wid a red rose sproutin' out o' de top o' it. Or it might be painted on, wid de old Kentuck Riber itself, an' de sho'. Sho' nuff, and de boat a-rockin' dat I's go fishin' in, and de trees on de sho' all shakin' deir heads in de sky. Eh, Marse Port? Ask your mother what she tink 'bout dat."

"Oh, I'd rather try the printing," said Mrs. Marshall. "And you'll have to tilt the sled up on end, and tell me just how it is to be done."

Mrs. Marshall had been a Washington belle in her earlier youth, but she never did a more graceful bit of entertaining than this charming "at home" to old Reuben. He would have been awkward in the parlor. So she settled very promptly that the kitchen was the warmest place for the coldest night; her little rocking-chair was brought out, a rug to keep her feet warm, the parlor lamp, with a bit of bright drapery to keep it company, burned beside her, and a screen kept off the draughts. So she knitted and rocked and laughed the evening away, while the boys—old Reuben and young Port—roasted the apples, and popped the corn, and cracked nuts, and came in on the chorus of the old home songs.

For these three, making their own cheer about them, were exiles from the land they loved most. Mrs. Marshall had come North to educate her only son. She was a young widow with an impoverished estate that was eating itself up in a discouraged section of country.

"Resources? Yes, we have just two of them, Davenport," she said to her boy, then twelve. "One is you, and the other me. The old place will have to stagger along under its debts and taxes, and hold up its own old fences, until you are educated and make money enough to put things in shape again."

Well she knew, this clear-minded woman, the power of disciplined mind and definite purpose in this race for life, and that not an hour should be wasted on poor schools and teachers, such as her section afforded. So she had come to this little New England village, where living was cheap and learning to be had for the taking, and established her little home.

Thither too had come old Reuben. He was the last remainer of a once large retinue of slaves. In the spirit of love and service he took up the staff of his pilgrimage and shambled his way toward the polestar of his affections. Here in Haddam Lower Landing he had made himself quite comfortable in a little shanty of his own, and earned his living by doing odd jobs in the white-washing or house-cleaning line.

It cost his faithful old heart many pangs to see the reduced state of his beloved mistress. He gloried in her elegance and high spirits, which even poverty and close living seemed to brighten and bring out. He used to hover about the little home, and treat himself to all the bits of menial work he could find to do. It was with an aching heart he saw young Marse Port, a little shabby as to clothes, actually cutting his own wood and bringing in the water, like any poor white trash.

"I jess cum roum' wid dis ole cantankerous saw ob mine, Marse Port; dis saw too powerful sharp. I work by de day for dese Yankees roum' here, an' I's ob de opinion dat I's berrer be sharp myself, an' not keep de saw so sharp. I saw all las' week dat dis saw saws mo' saw dan it ought to saw for de money dat I saw, eh? I reckon I'll borrow de sawin' ob some ob dem ole hard knots ob you, jess to take de go-ahead out ob my ole saw, eh?"

"Dere's some mighty queer 'spensations o' Providence," he said one day. "Some dem 'spensations I feel 'strained to pray agin' 'em. It's powerful queer dat Mis' Mary don't hab no kerridge nor no black horses like de ole times, an' dat Marse Port he don't hab no pony nor no bicycle like dem Yankee boys is promulgatin' theirselves wid. He don't hab nothin' but hisself."

The night when Port took the second prize for declamation, old Reuben went into an ecstasy of delight.

"It's de speerit ob de Marshalls!" he said, waylaying the boy on his way home in the moonlight; "that's what's done it. Why, all de dry lan' on sho' couldn't bury it, nor all de water in de sea couldn't drown it. De speerit ob dem dead-an'-gone Marshalls, all deir grave-stones couldn't keep it under, nor de Gen'ral's mummynment! Das what makes you so masterful, Marse Port—de speerit ob de Marshalls. Das what makes you kick a log w'en you go 'long, like you was too full ob youself; das what make you cap'n w' ob de base-ball, eh?"

"Bah! I worked harder than the rest; I meant to get ahead; I did it myself," replied the boy.

"Where you done got yo'self from?—de stuff dat's in you—das from de Marshall family!" the old man exclaimed, triumphantly. "Why, Marse Port, when I sees you roum' 'mong dem odder boys, wid you head up an'-step-pin' high, like one ob dem blue-grass horses, an' makin' out dat you like to saw wood, an' dat you don't want no pony nor no bicycle, like you own de country, an' was bossin' it kin' o' easy an' nat'ral like, why, I says to myself, 'Das de Marshall ob him!'"

"I don't 'make out,' as you call it, Uncle Reuben, nor pretend, and I don't know that I boss any. It is nothing but common-sense. I know how things are with us, and I don't want what I can't have, because I just hold on to myself, and I won't want it; that is all."

"Ob co'se, das all!' burst out the old man. "Das de whole wur; das de earth what de meek inherit, not want in' what dey can't hab, eh? Why, dat man is bigger dan him own self; he de boss ob eberyting!"

A wonderful day it was when the "Old Kentucky Shore" took its place on the top of East Hill, and its young master tendered its hospitalities to all the sledless boys on the hill. Old Reuben was out keeping holiday. The day was keen; he buttoned on his old coat, and strode on with the heart of a king. He shouldered his axe to make it look as if he was going to work, but in truth it was purely a pleasure promenade in which he indulged himself. He took his way through the straggling village street; he loitered on the hill-side, and watched the coasters with beaming face. The new sled was warming to its work; it carried a full load every time, and made a straight tack, and was altogether the most distinguished turn out on the hill. Old Reuben's soul was filled with joy as he watched it go careering gayly along with young Port braced back to the steering so straight and masterful, and he beamed with joy and pride as he went shambling along, and dropped into the village store quite ready to talk on his favorite topic.

THE ARGONAUT AND THE PEARLY NAUTILUS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

I.—THE ARGONAUT.

THE Argonaut, or paper nautilus, is regarded as one of the most beautiful objects in the ocean. Who would have thought of finding a celebrated beauty in the same family with the disagreeable octopus? The charm must certainly be due to that lovely white shell, which is prettily ribbed and fluted, and so transparent as to show the varying silver and rose tints of the body underneath.

Notwithstanding these attractions, your eyes, I believe, are now sufficiently trained to find in the argonaut many resemblances to the octopus. There are the unmistakable suckers on the arms, the great wide-awake eyes, and the curious funnel projecting beyond the shell just below them.

In addition to these there are many new points of interest. You will please notice in the upper figure of this beautiful picture that the two hinder arms are spread out into flat, sail-like membranes, which here only partly cover the shell. They may, however, be extended so as to cover it entirely. Indeed, the shell has been secreted by these broad membranes, and if it is broken in any way, the parts are soon repaired by new shelly matter deposited just where it is needed.

Although the argonaut lives in this shell, its body is nowhere fastened to it, neither does it fit the shell and fill it up; as other mollusks do. It merely sits in the graceful shell as in a boat, and holds on by its webbed arms.

Romantic stories have been told of the argonauts, and persons were led to believe that they sailed over the waves with their webbed arms held aloft as sails to catch the breeze, and that their straight arms were used as oars. So far from sailing in this fantastic fashion, the argonaut rarely comes to the surface, but passes its days in deep water or upon the bottom of the ocean. Here it crawls head downward, with its shell over its back, using its arms in place of feet, as in the left-hand lower figure.

In reality the argonaut swims just as its relatives do, by squirting itself backward. Gathering the arms together in a straight line, as shown in the upper figure, it takes in sea-water under the mantle, and forcibly expels it from the funnel.

How saugly the right lower one in the picture has tucked itself away in the shell! Still it has an eye for all that goes on around it.

The charming part of our story is yet to be told, for you must know that these dainty shells are merely nests, with which the females are provided to protect themselves and the bunches of eggs which they carry. The young ones are hatched in this lovely floating cradle, and are thus shielded from many dangers to which they would be exposed in the open sea.

PAPER NAUTILUS.

The male argonaut is very unlike the female. Not being more than an inch in length, and having no shell, it was not recognized until quite recently as the mate of the handsome paper nautilus.

These animals live in tropical seas, but their shells have sometimes been washed on our own shores. It is impossible to know the habits of these deep-sea dwellers, since their haunts are completely hidden from our view.

Argonauts have interested thoughtful men from a very ancient date. Their presence on the water was welcomed as an indication of fine weather, and one of the Greek poets long ago wrote, "O fish justly dear to navigators, thy presence announces winds soft and friendly; thou bringest the calm, and thou art the sign of it."

II.—THE PEARLY NAUTILUS.

The most interesting of all the cephalopods is perhaps the pearly nautilus. Unlike other members of its class, this animal is supplied with a true external shell, which is divided into many chambers; hence it is often called the "chambered nautilus."

In its natural condition the outside of the shell resembles white porcelain streaked with reddish-brown stripes. The nautilus shells usually seen in cabinet collections have been polished; this outer striped coating has thus been removed, and nothing remains but the lustrous pearl underneath.

The shell is elegantly shaped and proportioned, but gives no hint of the curious arrangement inside until it is cut open. It is then found to contain many chambers, partitioned off by curved pearly plates, which you can readily see in the illustration. The animal always occupies the outer and larger chamber, as here represented, retiring from it in its turn, and walling it up as the shell increases in size to meet the needs of the growing body.

In this way each chamber has been successively the home of the nautilus, and has been resolutely abandoned when it ceased to be desirable.

"Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous ool;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more."

This is a curious tube, or "siphuncle," extending from the body through all the chambers to the end of the coil. Its use is not positively known, although it may be instrumental in compressing the gas with which the chambers are probably filled, thus affecting the weight of the shell, and enabling the animal to rise or sink in the water when it wishes.

Our beautiful nautilus has discovered no more graceful means of swimming than by expelling water from the funnel, as others of its family do, but it has not their peculiarity of squirting ink, inasmuch as it possesses no ink-bag.

It has many short arms, which are highly sensitive, but which have none of the suckers so remarkable in the cuttle-fish. The mantle is thickened into a leathery fold or hood over the head, which closes the shell when the animal retires within it.

The mouth is surrounded by a fleshy lip and several labial palpi; it opens into a cavity where the parrot's beak and the lingual ribbon are situated. The eyes are attached by short stalks to the sides of the head.

Although nautilus shells are quite common, only a few specimens of the animal have ever been obtained, from which fact it is inferred that the nautilus lives only at great depths in tropical regions of the Pacific and Indian oceans. Unfortunately we know almost nothing of its habits.

The nautilus is especially interesting, since it is the last member of a once numerous race of four-gilled cephalopods with external shells which formerly occupied the seas.

Entire families have ceased to exist, and are known to us only by fossil remains, which are very abundant in the rocks, more than 2000 species being known.

Among the most interesting of these are the ammonites, one of which is shown in the illustration. Their chambered shells are much like nautilus shells, but instead of having partitions with plain edges, the partitions are folded and crinkled, forming curious patterns on the outside of the shell. Ammonites evidently lived in the deep sea; they are found of all sizes, varying from an inch to more than a yard in diameter.

These ancient four-gilled forms have been succeeded by the two-gilled cephalopods, without shells, which now monopolize the ocean. The beautiful nautilus has gradually decreased in numbers, and will probably become extinct also, as the rest of its family have.

THE DOMESTIC LIFE OF MADAM STORK.—DRAWN BY DAN BEARD.

TWO VALENTINES.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

MY DEAR YOUNG PEOPLE.—A happy new year to you, one and all, and very many of them. Now that the bright holidays have passed, do you not want to give some of your thoughts to the little sick children who are in St. Mary's Free Hospital? Perhaps you are more especially interested to know how the cot endowed by you all is coming on. The little child who occupies it at present is named "Irene Golden." She is an orphan, very pretty and very bright, and in spite of the troubles she has, she is well enough to enjoy all the things sent to her by the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. She is very proud of a scrap-book which was sent her all the way from London by Mary Payne. If Mary reads this letter, she must make many thanks from Irene.

On Christmas Eve Santa Claus made a journey through all the wards of the hospital. He gave each child a horn, a cornucopia of candy, and an orange, also a toy or little gift of some kind. In the middle of the night, when the chicks were all in bed and asleep, he stole around again and put under each little pillow a Christmas card and a silver quarter. Just think how pleased the children must have been, when they awoke in the morning, to find they had grown rich during the night!

On Tuesday, the 29th of December, they had their Christmas tree. The tree was put up in the large back room on the ground floor. Opening out of this by folding doors is another large room, where the children were all brought, so that they might see the tree to good advantage. The tiny ones sat on very small chairs in the front rows, and the larger children in the back of the room. Some few of the children were ill, but they came to the wards; these had a tiny tree dressed especially for them, upstairs. One little girl refused to come down stairs at all; and another, named Katie, when she got laid up down, cried to be taken back "to her own house"; so back she went, and missed seeing the tree. When all was in readiness, the sliding doors were thrown open, disclosing to the longed-for tree. After carols had been sung, the gifts were distributed. On little tables placed around the base of the tree lay presents. There were dolls without number, games, books, toys, and everything which good old Santa Claus could imagine the children would care for. The decorations on the tree were very handsome, and the children's faces seemed fairly transfigured in the soft candle-light. Even the little ones who were suffering pain seemed to forget their discomfort at the time. They each had three or more presents, besides baskets of candy, cornucopias, etc. After all was over, they were taken back to their wards, where they had lovely times playing with their new toys.

On New-Year's Day a young lady gave them a treat of ice-cream and cake, together with a pretty box, which contained some candy, a holly-apple, and a ten-cent piece.

On the 6th of January they had a Christmas tree for the deads, and this brought the holiday festivities to a close.

I wish you might one and all take a peep at the children as they run about or lie in bed in the bright sunny wards. They are all doing well in the hospital, and so well cared for by the good sisters, that they leave very unwillingly when they are cured and well enough to go back to their homes. The children send you their love and many thanks for all your kind thoughts for them. Good-bye, and all good luck to you, from

A FRIEND OF THE CHILDREN.

ENGLAND, NEW JERSEY.

I thought all the little readers of HARPER'S

YOUNG PEOPLE would like to hear of a sacrifice made by a bright little girl of nine years who lives in Monroe, North Carolina. Monroe is a very quiet little country town, and has until the last few months, been without a church service. It was a source of longing and sadness and regret to all of the mothers who had little children that there was no Sunday service, no minister, no Sunday school. To children living in country towns at the North it would seem strange, when Sunday came, to have none of these things, but they can surely appreciate the loss of it. One of these Monroe mothers at last made the determination that she would devote all of her time, energy, and slender means to build a little chapel for service. She reached out as far as she could to others, equally poor, in neighboring towns. Every device was thought of—fairs, tea parties, donations, and patchwork parties—until the modest sum of a very few hundreds was reached, and each woman and child had made some personal sacrifice to contribute to the fund. One little girl had thought of everything possible and impossible to do or give. Plan after plan came to naught. At last, one morning, she awoke up with an inspiration born, perhaps, of an angel's whisper. Combing out her long hair, that fell far below her waist, she drew to her mother, holding out the scissors. "Cut it for the church, mamma. It will sell for so much money!" Her mother could not find it in her heart to part with the mass of gold that had been the pride of her heart and the envy of every other mother in the town, but eagerly Fair looked up, pleading her cause so bravely, that, with tears running over on the brave little head, mamma cut the silken tresses, and they were sent to me, tied with a blue ribbon, for sale.

In that distant Southern town they are far from the busy world, and curious ideas of the wealth and generosity of New York people have become a faith in the minds of those innocent farming people. Poor little Fair believes that I shall realize a fortune for her hair. I spent one whole morning on Sixth Avenue going from place to place to the best hair dealers. They were all unanimous and enthusiastically in its color, weight, and quality, most of them declaring it could never have been cut from the head of a child, but it was declared useless, inasmuch as no hair in a thousand had just that color, and it must be sacrificed to be used, which would make it then of no more value than the ordinary hair for sale. I could not see that she could get no more than $3. My heart felt heavy with disappointment as I wrapped up the lovely hair and took it home. How would I send such a message to the little girl who waits each day the result of her noble sacrifice? I thought of the Post-office Box, which finds its way to thousands of homes where mothers have golden-haired darlings not worth of their gold. Her hair was cut by Fairfax Payne a little piece, which she may promptly believe she has cut. If any of the children who live in New York want to see this hair, and will let me know through the Post-office Box, I will put it where it can be seen; and in some rain time, if your young hearts will help me, I will begin the little fund with $1 and a prayer that I may be the means of sending a message of joy to this pretty Southern girl.

Yours truly, S. M. C. RAY.

UTICAH, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Please print this little story. I made it all myself, and I never had yet printed a story in any paper.

WHAT HAPPENED TO ME ONE DAY.

One afternoon I was lying on the grass in the shadow of a big chestnut tree, with a book in my hand. It was too hot even to read, and by-and-by I fell asleep. At once I was awakened by something striking against my face, and when I awoke, I saw a little bird perched on a rose-bush.

"Good-afternoon; how d'ye do?" it said.

"Thank you, sir, quite well. What is the matter?" I asked.

"Oh, nothing particular. I only came to ask if you would like to pay a visit to the Princess of the Woods." "What is the little bird?" I asked.

"Yes, please, I should like it very much," I answered.

"Very well; come along, then."

We went out of the garden gate, and far away into the fields, till we came to a wood, where I had never been before.

"Yes," said the little bird, as we stood before a big oak-tree. The bird opened a door, and we went down a very steep ladder. When we arrived at the bottom we knocked at an iron door, which was opened by a man with a long beard.

"Ha, captain, here are two more prisoners," he said.

"What in the world has happened here?" cried the little bird, that had changed into a young man, dressed like a prince, and he ran toward a white-robed maiden, such as I had seen among brown hair and beautiful dark eyes. "Tell me, darling, what has happened?" he said, stooping down to kiss her tenderly.

"I am taken prisoner by Bloodheart, our enemy, Richard dear," she said, weeping bitterly.

"That will never do," cried the Prince, and jumping up, he felt for his sword, but it was gone, and the captain said, sternly:

"If you move, your head shall be chopped right off. Go a little bit away; you must not speak with my sister. This little girl can stay with the Princess," he said, looking at me. "Then he went up to the young lady and said: 'If you will marry me, I will set free your brother and this little girl, but if you won't,' he added, threateningly, 'you shall be thrown all three into the river.' Well, what is your opinion?"

"Oh, my dear, I never married," said the Prince. "Drown me, but spare Richard and the little girl. Marry you I never could."

"Very well, then," and he signed to three men to come nearer. One of them came to me, with a rope with a slip-knot to put around my neck. I was terribly frightened, and screaming "Mamma! mamma! help me!—oh, do come, quick!" I fell on the floor.

"What is it, my darling?" I heard mother's sweet voice. I looked up, and I was in our own garden, and I was sitting on the grass, but rose and came to me when she saw how frightened I looked.

"Have you slept nicely, dear?" she asked, kindly.

Then, after all, I had not been in the wood, with the Prince and the Princess, and it was only a dream!

"Of course it is, dearie," said mamma, when I told her what had happened. "Get up, and don't read any more fairy stories; that's the only reason you dreamed of me, and why you read."

I indignantly refused to believe that to be the reason, but had no more opportunity to think about it, for papa came in, with one of my cousins, and he welcomed me to my new room, to stay all day with me. I often thought about my adventure, and how I believe mother was right. The old sister said I dreamed of me, and why you read your story-books. (Extract from a Dutch girl, aged 13).

ROBERT N.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a boy ten years old. I BUY HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every week, and like it very much. I wrote to you before, but as my letter was not published, I thought I would try again. I can read, and I can do some writing, spelling, geography, and arithmetic. I missed a part of "Two Arrows," but like the first part very much. I very much like the story named General and a cat named Maud. My brother and I are making a snow house, and have it nearly made.

ROBERT N.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have some pets—six rabbits and a pig. I have had me forty-four dozen rabbits, but we had to give away and sell part of them when we went to the country for the summer. I have twelve dolls—one Quaker, one boy, and one girl, and six dolls of the girls. Tell Helen W. that I am just her age, and hope to keep her company playing with dolls for a long time to come. I had a lovely French doll, in my opinion, named Dorothy, on my very first reading, my mother, who approves of dolls, says she will give me another on my twenty-fifth birthday if I want one.

E. B. C.

NEW YORK CTRY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a little girl almost 10 years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for nearly three years. This is my first letter to the Harper's Young People office, and it will be printed if I can speak French just as well as English, and am learning Spanish. I had a great many Christmas gifts, among them a baby-house with a lamp and furniture, a sofa with a bowl and pitcher set, a sofa, three lovely books, a pair of dolls, roller skates, two pretty Christmas cards, a pretty pen and a rubber ball. Papa gave me a beautiful musical box, that plays fifty tunes. I went to a Christmas tree, and had one myself, that had many pretty things on it. I helped mamma trim it. I had a gold watch. I had a gold watch to give me a gold watch. I am going to have a party. I have no pets, but I once had a canary that died. I do not go to school, but I have a visiting governess. My hobbies are spelling, reading, writing, geography, arithmetic, history, and poetry. I am learning to play the piano, and I practise half an hour every day. I hope my letter is not too long. I will say good-by.

EMILY L. I. B.

BRIDGE, ILLINOIS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am seven years old, and I have a sister, and she is eight years old. We went to Springfield, the capital of our State, vacation week, and saw Lincoln's monument, and saw where he used to live. My aunt told us a funny story while we were at his house. She said when Mr. Lincoln's boys were little, she was passing one day, and she saw one of the boys in a funny fix. They had some trees set out in front of the house, with some little fences built around them to keep anything from rubbing the trees, and they got his head in between two of the fences, and couldn't get it out again. He screamed and kicked, and the boys had a great time getting him out. There is a man at the top of the hill who has all about it. We saw the old and new State-house.

We have five pets, and the drooldest of them all is a parrot. It is named Polly. She is over twenty-five years old, and acts just like a young bird, and is very jolly, and if I were not afraid of making my letter too long would tell some more about her and the life of the little birds. I wish I want to hear of the funny things that Polly says and does. I will write and tell them; but next time, I guess, it will be my sister's turn to write. We like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much.

CORA OLIVER M.

LITCHFIELD, KANSAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a girl ten years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, reading, spelling, and geography. I have one doll. We have two birds; one is called Brownie, and the other Dick. Papa built us a nice brick house; it has six rooms, three upstairs and three downstairs. Papa built us a nice cave, and arched it on the top.

HORTIE F.

HARLEM, NEW YORK.

Our names are Andrew, Tessie, and Ansellia. When at home I live in Harlem. In the summer we used to go to Rockaway. I have the ones who used to go in bathing at C's. I have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and I find it to be very interesting.

ANDREW J. H.

NELSON, NEBRASKA.

I am twelve years old. I go to school in Nelson, about a mile from my home, which is in the country. We have only three rooms in the school; I am in the highest room, and read in the fifth reader. I have three sisters and one brother. I am the youngest. I have for pets two kittens and one old cat, a dog, a canary-bird, and several dolls, which I seldom play with. I would like to correspond with a girl in Florida, England, or some other place.

LINNIE CORBETT.

BATH, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I am a boy thirteen years old. I have taken three numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which my mother gave me. I like them very much, and I think it is the one, too. We have a toboggan slide here, on a hill near the river. You have to pass the entrance of the toboggan, and cross on the road to the toboggan slide.—Mr. Davenport who ran for Governor is the one I mean. I have only one pet, a little dog named Brownie. I wish I had a cat, but I can't find a doggie would like me. I don't like cats. I would like to correspond with a boy in some foreign country.

WILLMOT WEBB, Box 298.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have just read the beginning of "Jo's Opportunity"; I think it is a pretty story. I am a little girl ten years old. I thought I would write to you, and tell you how happy I was that grandma gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year. My brother and I are twins. My mother is dead. I live with my grandma. In my next letter I will tell you about our church and our school.

JANIE C.

CHENAGO, ILLINOIS.

I live in the country in summer, and have several pets—a lamb, a cat, and a dog. My sister has a bird and some gold fish. We have great fun with the lamb, for we play hide-and-peek with her, and she will let us hold her for us just like a child. My cat is an Angora, and he is almost as large as a small dog. We dress him up in a frock, and he really puts on a very nice dress like a doll. We spent last summer in the East, and were at Nantucket most of the time.

It is such a quiet, quaint old town. They have a town-crier, and he is one of the oldest characters of the place. I enjoyed the bathing so much, for I learned how to swim. I gathered a great many most interesting shells, and I had some long and delightful walks across the moor. I do not know which I like best, the sea-shore or the country, for they both have so many attractions.

ANNA P.

CLAYTON, ALABAMA.

I have just returned from a visit to my grandfather. My aunt takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me, and she sends me a new number every week. I saw it first. I am much pleased with it. I show it to my school-mates; they all want to take it, and I have to take care of them. I have one little girl will. I am twelve years old. I sure one brother.

M. E. C.

FETTERMAN, CALIFORNIA.

I saw a butterfly up to date, JANUARY 9, although there have been several heavy frosts for the last week or two. We had an earthquake the other day; it shook hard. I went duck-hunting with my brother yesterday, and we got out a lot of ducks. We went again to-day, with another boy, and we got eighteen ducks. There was a fish-pond about a mile and a half from our house. It was very heavy storm, and it broke over my banks, and I got twenty fish in the ditch below it. I have nine of them in the watering-trough. I have five volleys of shot, and I like to shoot very much. I am bound. I like "Two Arrows" very much. Tell Mr. Thompson that I want to hear about some more of his funny dreams. EDDIE MCG.

YOUNGBURG, OHIO.

I wish you a very happy new year. This is the first letter I have written to you, but I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and I like it very much. I like to read the little girls write in the Post-office Box. I used to live in Canada, but we came here in September. I liked Canada very much, and we had some good places, and we lived across the road from the school. It is very cold here, and the snow is very deep. I have two brothers and two sisters; their names are Raymond, Clara, Alma, and Cora. They are all between four and eleven years of age.

BESSIE O'N.

SEAFORD, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl ten years old. I went to New York while ago, and saw where this beautiful paper is published. My kind auntie has sent me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and I like it very much. I feel that I cannot do without it. Our house is situated on a hill, and we have a fine view of the Sound for many miles. I go to school nearly every day, and study arithmetic, reading, spelling, grammar, mental arithmetic, and geography.

FLORENCE A. S.

ROCKERS PARK, ILLINOIS.

I am ill with the mumps, so I cannot go to school, and I cannot talk much. I go to a graded school, and enjoy it very much. I want to get a good education, so that I can be a doctor. I am now up to. I live in a pretty village nine miles from Chicago, and half a mile from Lake Michigan. In the summer we have fine times playing on the beach. I enjoy reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I am always glad when Wednesday comes, for the paper comes on ten days. My brother and sister and myself had we would take some magazine. My brother takes Wide Awake, my sister Our Little Men and Women, and I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. We thought we would spend our money so we could have something that would be new all the year. We sent one dollar to an old lady, eight or four years old. Her birthday comes on Christmas.

JESSIE S.

GREENWICH, CONNECTICUT.

As I have never seen a Post-office Box from this place, I thought I would write. I am one of your older readers, and have taken this delightful paper a year. I have two sisters, one is named Cora and one is named Emma. We are all very anxious for Saturday to come, for then we receive this paper. I like the stories very much, especially "Boff Hound" and "The Boy's Christmas" are also very nice. I shall try some of those articles mentioned. I think "Jo's Opportunity" will be splendid.

CAMILLA B.

TOWNSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I will tell you how I spent Christmas. We had intended to spend the day at grandpa's, but the roads were very rough, so we all went to my aunt's, whose house is next to the school. We had a fine, jolly and beautiful presents. Sister Maggie recited "Willie's Prayer," and I "The Night Before Christmas." We then had our presents, and my mamma said "Merry Christmas." I received a ring, again the Christmas bells. I received a great many fine presents, and my uncle still sends me the dear HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I am glad to hear of your success, and really think you are getting well. I have a wheel chair, and you can imagine what a pleasure it must be to be able to move from room to room without assistance. I am making a collection of shells and zoological specimens, also what I call a "memorial scrap-book." But I must say good-by. With much love, HARRY F.

LANSFORD, ILLINOIS.

I have nine pets I call my own: three tame squirrels, all in one cage; three barn-cat chickens (the rooster I call Jerry, because he crows so, the two hens I call Beazy and Jane); I have a small rat-terrier dog I call Jack in the summer. I harness him to a little buggy; my cat I call Janie, because he came in June; my canary-bird I call Ruby; he is a beautiful singer; mamma has his cage in the window among her flowers. I have no brother living. My father is a doctor. He drives one horse; we call her Glide. We have two Jersey cows. I drive them to pasture in the summer. I enjoy the riding; I seldom walk when I take them away. My brother-in-law, who lives here, is a stock dealer. I often help him drive cattle. Papa, mamma, and I all love to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I take the Youth's Companion too.

GEORGE I. R.

NEW HAMPTON, IOWA.

My brother has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since 1880, and I like to read it better every year, especially the Post-office Box. I am thirteen years old. I was born in Pennsylvania, South India. My father and mother went out there as missionaries. I have four brothers, and one sister named Gracie. I can play very nicely for a girl of my age, and am now learning to play on the violin. I am studying French and Latin. I am very fond of French, which is a nice employment for a girl. Don't you think so? I have travelled a great deal, and have seen a great many wonderful things. I shall try and see you, dear Postmistress, when I go to the city again.

ALICE D.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—A little boy nine years old, threatened with pneumonia, was by order of the doctor, completely wrapped in a possum made of flaxseed and mustard, and the entry part of this week, owing to the sudden change in the weather, the house was not as warm as usual, and he asked mamma how the thermometer stood. Mamma said, "About sixty degrees." He said, "But one of the points on the thermometer and it will be up to about two hundred degrees by the time the doctor comes." I believe this is original.

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY IN PELTYVILLE.

IF NOT QUITE TRUE, IT OUGHT TO BE.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

VALENTINE'S DAY is on its way;
 'Twill be here very soon,
 For I heard sister Snc say so
 To Bell this afternoon.

There! that sounds very pretty, and
 I think that it will do.
 But 'pears to me it isn't quite Exactly truly true.
 But then it ought to be, and that's Almost, I think, the same,
 And so down in the corner here
 I'll sign a make-b-lieve name.

LOVE A BEGGING—SEE POEM ON PAGE 246.

LOVE AT PLAY.

BY MARGARET JOHNSON.

THE wind and storm came down amain;
 Rough voices sang a blithe refrain.
 A child came begging in the rain
 (Sing, O, the good Saint Valentine!);
 His face was fair as flowers in May,
 I could not send the boy away;
 It was the merry holiday
 Of good Saint Valentine.

I filled his little hands with bread;
 He turned aside his golden head,
 His sweet eyes dim with tears unshed
 (Sing, O, the good Saint Valentine!);
 I gave him gold, yet lifted he
 A look so piteous sweet to me,
 I marvelled what his prayer might be (Sing, O, Saint Valentine!).

I brought him all my gifts in vain;
 His tears fell fast as summer rain,
 My heart grew soft with tender pain
 (Sing, O, the good Saint Valentine!);
 "What would you, Sweet, with me?" I said,
 And stooped and kissed his shining head;
 Then, laughing, from my arms he fled
 (Sing, O, Saint Valentine!).

Ah! then I knew the youngster gay
 Had come to beg my heart away,
 Because it was the merry day
 We keep for good Saint Valentine.
 A tiny hand of scorn at me
 He pointed, wild with elfin glee,
 "I have what I would have," said he (Sing, O, Saint Valentine!).

The people sang their rude refrain;
 The boy flew, laughing, through the rain,
 I shall not leave my heart again
 (Sing, O, the good Saint Valentine!);
 For Love has begged it quite away,
 I will not have it if I may,
 Sing, O, the merry holiday
 Of good Saint Valentine!

CAUGHT BY A DESERT SAND-STORM.

AN ADVENTURE IN CENTRAL ASIA.

BY DAVID KER.

THERE are many deserts in Tartary, but none more grim and dreary than the great waste of "Kara Koum" (Black Sand), which stretches across the whole northwest of Central Asia. Day after day you go wearily on over the endless level, with your head aching and your skin dry and feverish, seeing nothing but the burning sky above and the burning sand below, where the only thing to show that you have not wandered from the right track is a stray mound of earth here and there, out of which peer the whitened bones of horses and camels, and sometimes even of men, who have died here before you.

But if you do happen to meet a man, you must be on your guard, for in these wild regions the old joke about "catching a Tartar" often comes true in grim earnest. When one of these flat-faced, bullet-headed fellows comes trotting up to you on his wiry little horse, looking cunningly at you from under the high cap of black sheep-skin that is slouched over his small, narrow, rat-like eyes, you had better keep your hand upon your revolver and your eye upon him until he has answered your challenge of, "Amaun ust?" (is it peace?) with, "Insh' Allah, amaun ust" (please God it is peace).

Why this pleasant place should be called "Black Sand" it is hard to say, for both it and its two great brothers, the "Ak Koum" (White Sand), to the east, and the "Kizil Koum" (Red Sand), to the south, are all of one color, and that color a pale yellow. But it can look "black" enough sometimes in another way. As I know to my cost. In the driest and loneliest part of it, just as the water is beginning to run low in your skin bag, you come upon a deep, winding furrow in the parched earth, which was a rushing river ages ago, and you think of the cool, clear water that the thirsty sands have drunk up, until you yourself grow thirstier and more dismal than ever.

We were just midway across the desert, and the red sun was sinking over the great waste of lifeless sand, when there suddenly arose between us and it what seemed at first sight like a cloud of withered leaves. But a second glance showed it to be a host of wide-winged living things, moving onward, swift and unswerving, in ranked order, like an army arrayed for battle. But for their amazing numbers one might have taken them for an ordinary flight of grasshoppers; but I had seen such a sight too often before not to recognize at once the destroying march of the locust.

Onward they went to lay waste the rich lands of the south, their vast shadow darkening half the sky, and the whir of their countless wings sounding amid the ghostly silence like the hissing and grinding of some mighty engine. Although thousands passed every moment, it was fully fifteen minutes before the last of the host had gone by.

Then my Tartar servant pointed his brown, bony hand after the shadowy mass, and said, solemnly, "Master, we shall have a storm."

"Why do you think so?" asked I, somewhat surprised, for the sky was clear and cloudless as ever.

"The locusts have gone by in their armies, even such as those that the Prophet Moussa Ben Amrahm" (Moses the son of Amram) "brought up against Egypt; and where they come, the blast of the desert is never far behind. Destruction always follows the destroyer."

The terrible emphasis of the man's tone and manner showed that he was thoroughly in earnest; and if he spoke truly, the thought of encountering a desert whirlwind in this perilous spot, where there was enough loose sand to bury a whole army, was anything but pleasant. But what could we do? To go back was as dangerous as to go forward, and to stand still was worse than either; so on we went.

Two hours passed, however, without any sign of danger, and I was just beginning to hope that the Tartar might have been mistaken after all, when the camels, which were harnessed three abreast to my light covered wagon,* suddenly stopped short, and began to snuff the air uneasily.

I saw a look of anxiety cloud the Tartar's stern face, instantly reflected upon that of our Kirghiz driver, whose sharp white teeth, hooked nose, and great black hollow eyes looked quite unearthly in the fitful moonlight.

The camels snuffed again, more quickly and restlessly than before, and then crouched down side by side, with their long necks laid flat on the ground.

"Tebbad!" (sand-storm) shouted the Kirghiz, throwing himself down behind them, and muffling his head in his sheep-skin cloak.

The words were hardly spoken, when a gray dimness rushed down suddenly over the whole sky, and my Tartar and I had barely time to fling ourselves down into the bottom of the wagon, when there came a rush and a roar, and all around was one whirl of flying sand and churning storm, which, closely as our shawls were pulled over our faces, seemed to deafen, blind, and strangle us all in one moment.

It seemed many hours to us (though in reality it was less than one) while we lay there, half stifled, but not daring to put forth our heads, listening to the howl of the storm and the sharp "prr, prr" of the whirling sand against the sides of our rocking wagon. But at last the hideous uproar died away, and we ventured to peep forth.

A strange sight awaited us. Far as the eye could reach, the smooth sand was billowed like the waves of a stormy sea. Our wagon looked as if steeped in lime, and the lower half of it was hidden altogether. Of the camels nothing could be seen but their humps; and as the Kirghiz started up, throwing off a whirlwind of dust on every side, he seemed to have risen bodily through the earth.

* In India camels are now used to draw not only wagons, but post-chaises and street cars as well.—D. K.

We ourselves had fared little better. In spite of all my wrappings, my skin was as gritty as a match-box from head to foot, and the Tartar's sallow visage looked like a half-washed potato. The warm, genial air had suddenly become chilly as a grave, for the Siberian hurricane had brought with it cold memories of frozen seas, and leagues of snowy moorland, and half-seen icebergs drifting wearily through the polar night; and the pale grayish yellow sand of the Kara Koutm, which by its very nature cannot absorb heat, is one of the coldest surfaces in the world.

How we had escaped being buried alive outright I was at first quite at a loss to imagine, but the explanation was simple enough. Most fortunately for ourselves, we had halted on the brow of a ridge where the sand lay thin and light, and where the sweep of the wind was too furious to let the drifts gather thickly round us. Had we met the storm in the hollows below, we should all have been dead men, and I still count that night's work one of the narrowest of my many escapes from death.

THE PET CANARY.

BY LILLIE E. BARR.

BOYS talk about their pet dogs, and enlarge upon their tricks and manners in italics and big O's. True, other animals find places as pets with them, but no other species is so universally acknowledged as the boy's pride and joy, his dear friend and companion, as his dog. And all that the dog is to the boy, the canary is to the girl, and a sweeter pet or more loving one cannot be found than these bits of animated feathers, with their sparkling eyes, their bonny plumage, winning ways, and passionate song.

If you have been so unfortunate as to buy a bird that is wild, the first thing to do is to tame it. This is best and soonest accomplished by placing the bird for a week or two in the small wooden cage in which they are usually kept in the stores. The cage must be kept on a table in the room where the family sit, and must be handled freely. If you are reading or sewing, keep it beside you, or even on your knee. Remember, however, that the little prisoner is full of fears, and now and then speak lovingly to him, often repeating your own name to him, and especially so when he calls.

Give him fresh water and seed with your own hands, and once in a while offer him a hemp seed; but do not drop it into the cage, as your aim is now to accustom your bird to the hand. At first he will fly about in great fear. But do not be discouraged. In a week or so he will have become used to having his cage handled; then place him in his proper cage, and go through the same course with him, as more room is apt to make him timid again, until you can lift the cage at any time or put your hand in it without causing fear. If the bird be very wild, take it frequently in the hand, and at such times always give it something to eat. Put a hemp seed, bit of apple or lettuce or cake, between the lips, and let it take it from your mouth, and soon it will associate its tidbit with the handling, and become fearless.

An excellent time to begin to handle or put your hand in the cage is right after the bird has taken its bath. If you have a pair—and male and female are happiest together—begin to handle the female first, as she is, as a rule, the more easily tamed. In catching the bird be perfectly fearless. Take it lightly but firmly in the hand, letting its claws cling to one of your fingers; this gives it a sense of security, and accustoms it to the finger as a perch.

The length of time it takes to tame your bird depends entirely upon the amount of time you devote to it and the regularity of your attention. To be very devoted one day and careless the next is a poor plan, and makes the taming process a very tedious one. Give the little prisoner as much time as you can, and never go into the room without speaking to him.

My birds have an especial call for every member of the family, and the sound is so like our names that we can easily distinguish whom they are calling. This was attained by each of us repeating our own name whenever we did anything for them, and as each had some particular thing to do every day, the birds soon associated us with that service for their comfort or pleasure. For example, it was Edith's duty to set the birds in the sunshine, and she would always say, "Shall Edith set Birdie and Millie in the sunshine?" In a short time they learned to associate her with the sunshine, and called her to set them out if she forgot to do it.

Bird-fanciers tell us that giving birds a variety of food spoils their song. I have never found it to be the case in a wide acquaintance with birds. I had a mocking-bird that came to the table with the family; he ate everything except butter, and would drink both tea and coffee. The neighbors thought his nightly songs a burden hard to bear. As a matter of course I did not agree with them, seeing that he was my bird. The birds I now have eat everything they wish to, coming on the table or our shoulders for what they want, and scolding in the most charming way if not served, and often I am compelled to scold Birdie to make him hush his song. I had an English robin which not only ate all we did, but also kept my house clear of Croton bugs, going in among the pipes under the sink and all through the presses; one of my canaries, called Fairy, taught him to go in and out of her cage, and would follow him wherever he went.

In winter I never keep my birds in their cages; the doors are opened in the morning, and they go where they choose in the room. But when summer comes, unless they are to build, they get one fly a day, and that is really all that is absolutely necessary for a cage-raised bird. Mine, even in winter, spend most of their time in their cages, seeming to prefer them to the larger room. They should, however, have one fly a day for health's sake, and the mistress should be the one to let them out of the cage. Leave the seed and water in the cage; they will soon learn the way in after it, and they seem to enjoy the power to go in and out at will.

In winter, birds should not be hung immediately in the window, unless there is no draught. Birds are so sensitive to draughts that they easily catch cold. What really seems to us to be hardly the suspicion of a draught is often very trying to a bird, and coming in through the crevices of the window causes colds, rheumatism, asthma, and consumption. Have the standards, if the birds are hung up, so placed as to bring the cage in the centre of the window, but not too close to the glass. They must have light; to hang a bird in a dark room or corner, or behind drawn blinds, is as cruel as to keep a cat in the same house with it; and it would be just as proper to keep a tiger in the house with a helpless babe as a cat with birds. Birds must have light; it is as necessary to them as air is to you. God made birds for the light, and at no time does their song pour forth so rapturously as when in a band of glorious sunshine; so hang the cage in the light, low down, where you can speak to the bird easily and it can see you without an effort.

If your bird has taken cold, there are many remedies to be sought, but I have more faith in home-made cures, perhaps because I have tried both, and always found the home-made ones most trustworthy. Take a fig and soak it overnight in olive oil; then scrape the seed and pulp into a saucer, and mix it thoroughly with finely pounded rock candy; work into a little ball, and fasten it between the cage bars or on the perch. This is an excellent cure for colds, sore throat, or hoarseness. Another excellent cure for cold is boiled bread and milk, with a little honey, say half a tea-spoonful, dropped in after it is almost cold. I used this with great success this winter when one of my birds had pneumonia. I blistered her chest with camphorated oil, fed her on bread, honey, and milk, with a few hemp seed pounded fine and boiled with the milk; the hemp acted like a narcotic. As soon as she began to mend I soaked her bread in port-wine, sprinkling sugar over the bread. On this and cold boiled hominy she quickly recovered her strength.

The camphorated oil is very good as a blister, but use it moderately, and only in extreme cases, as it is a cruel treatment for so tender a creature as a bird; apply it with the finger by gently parting the feathers, and rubbing it in on the chest or bowels—wherever the inflammation is. You can easily tell if the bird is suffering acute pain in the chest: the breathing will be short and hard, and evidently every breath causes distress; the head droops and the wings hang loosely, while the little creature scarcely seems able to stand up or be still. As soon as the blister is applied, be careful to place the bird in a darkened room that is warm, free from draughts and steam heat. For well birds steam is very bad; for sick ones it is almost death.

If your bird suffers with asthma—you can tell when this is the case by its breathing becoming heavy and difficult before damp or wet weather—give it the heads of the herb "everlasting" to pick, or "immortal" flowers are also good. Blistering for asthma does no good. Bryonia will help a little. One drop of bryonia in its water will be enough. For rheumatism, bryonia and colchicum, given in alternate doses, is a sure cure. I do not trust to their taking it in their water, if they are very ill, but give it by dropping a little into the mouth, if they will not take it, every two or three hours, from the spoon. Rheumatism usually attacks the feet, and is shown by swollen red joints.

Birds that are constantly kept in the cage sometimes suffer with paralysis of the legs. The quickest and best cure for this is to take the affected leg in your mouth and suck it until the foot and limb are in a glow and quite hot; then for a few days—if it is impossible to do so every day—let the bird have ten or fifteen minutes to fly about the room.

Birds are very grateful for attention when sick, and seem to understand the words of pity and love and the acts of help far better than many babies do (I say this with all due respect to babyhood); and certainly they never forget the love that nursed them back to health.

Talk to your bird, teach it to understand you by telling it what you are doing for it, and soon you will find that, brilliant as brother's dog is, he is not more loving, nor does he know more tricks than your bird does, for a bird that you make a companion of you can teach anything. All that is necessary is to have love and unbounded patience with it, and in a little while no love, no money, could buy your pet canary.

CURIOUS EFFECT OF ARCTIC COLD.

A PERSON who has never been in the polar regions can probably have no idea of what cold really is; but by reading the terrible experiences of arctic travelers in that icy region some notion can be formed of the extreme cold that prevails there.

When we have the temperature down to zero out-of-doors we think it bitterly cold, and if our houses were not as warm as, at least, sixty degrees above zero, we should begin to talk of freezing to death. Think, then, of living where the thermometer goes down to thirty-five degrees below zero in the house in spite of the stove.

Of course in such a case the fur garments are piled on until a man looks like a great bundle of skins.

Everybody smiles at the fib told by Baron Munchausen about the cold weather he experienced when he said he could not make a sound on his hunting-horn, because the sounds froze before they could get out; but that when he returned home and hung up his horn by the fire-place the warmth thawed out the sounds, and the horn played of its own accord all the tunes the Baron had blown into it. Of course the writer of the book was only trying to be as absurd as he could, and he was absurd enough; but, after all, some of the effects of cold are so extraordinary that there is no need to exaggerate.

Dr. Moss, of the English polar expedition of 1875 and 1876, among other odd things, tells of the effect of cold on a wax candle which he burned there. The temperature was thirty-five degrees below zero, and the Doctor must have been considerably discouraged when, upon looking at his candle, he discovered that the flame had all it could do to keep warm.

It was so cold that the flame could not melt all the wax of the candle, but was forced to eat its way down the candle, leaving a sort of skeleton of the candle standing. There was heat enough, however, to melt oddly shaped holes in the thin walls of wax, and the result was a beautiful lace-like cylinder of white, with a tongue of yellow flame burning inside it, and sending out into the darkness many streaks of light.

This is not only a curious effect of extreme cold, but it shows how difficult it must be to find anything like warmth in a place where even fire itself almost gets cold. The wonder is that any man can have the courage to willingly return to such a bitter region after having once got safely away from it, and yet the truth is that the spirit of adventure is so strong in some men that it is the very hardship and danger which attract them.

THE SPIRIT OF THE MARSHALLS.

BY MARGARET EMMA DITTO.

II.

"OLD Kentucky an' de Marshalls befo' de wah" was a text from which old Reuben could preach almost any kind of sermon. Upon this subject he was gifted with great freedom of speech and a wealth of statement which opened long vistas to the narrow-minded and unimaginative people among whom he sojourned. Amusements were scarce in Huddam Lower Landing, and the group at the village store often eked out their scanty rations by drawing out the old darky on his pet topic. This, being Washington's Birthday, was a whole holiday, and its tedious length of nothing to do and nothing particular to talk about was dragging heavily on at the store when Reuben arrived.

"Here is Kentucky itself coming down upon us," said Hiram Powell. "Shuffle yourself in, Uncle Reuben. We're glad to see you. Color isn't catching, and you're dyed in the wool, and won't rub off."

Hiram was the store clerk, an aspiring youth, who rose early and toiled late at his small puns and jokes, and always kept up heart wonderfully, though his wit, poor starveling, did not turn out as funny as he expected it to, and often drew blanks instead of laughter.

"Come up to the fire," he said, with a flourishing bow. "This stove draws like a popular preacher. It will draw in the highways and hedges, the county lines, and the Confederacy next. Gentlemen, let me introduce you to Mr. Marshall. Never heard your last name. But of course you was born a Marshall, and never got over it."

"Das so," said Uncle Reuben, smiling blandly round upon the group. "You's tole de troof once. De bigges' liars is apt to hit de troof sometimes, w'en it's as big as a farm, an' dey is stan'in' in de middle ob it, wid no range to deir gun—eh? Co'se 's bohn a Marshall; dey waun't no oder way to be bohn on dat plantation in de General's time. You'd a run some chance o' bein' a man yo'self ef you'd been bohn on dat plantation."

The laugh was against Hiram, but he rallied promptly. "They say you and the old General were like Siamese twins—hey? Now, Reuben, did not you once give me to understand that?"

"I neber gib you nothin' to un'erstan', Hiram: das too strainin' on you. I keeps a Sunday-school for weak min' grasshoppers in de summer-time now an' again, till dey can go up in de higher branches, but I neber eben ax you to come to dat, cos de win' ought to be temper' to de shorn lamb—eh?" And Uncle Reuben sat composedly down on a soap box, and gazed meekly about him, while Hiram had business on the other side of the store.

"I suppose," said one of the loungers, "that Washington's Birthday came three or four times a year down South. Didn't they, Reuben?"

"Dat got roim' to 'ble spy down dar. De years didn't break deirselves to pieces for it, but dey had to get out ob de way befo' it pretty libely, an' de fools didn't hab no gret chance to 'cumulate between-times, like dey does somewhars." Reuben replied, with a shrewd glance round the circle on the last sentence.

"Now see here, Uncle Reuben. If Washington was the father of his country, who was the mother of it?"

"Mudder Earth, ob co'se," said the old darky, promptly. "Das plain 'nuff. Fadder Washington go 'sleep in her buzzum dis long time. Mudder Earth she stay wide awake. She keep right on supportin' de fam'ly. Dat ole man yent much 'count 'longside ob de ole woman—eh? Dey don't neber keep her birthday, dough. Das queer."

"I tell you, Reuben, you'd strike a sudden acquaintance with the old lady if you'd try riding on a bicycle. I bet you'd make an impression, too—you're a solid man, you see. Now here is a fine instrument left for sale by Fred Styles. Don't you want to try it?"

"A VOLLEY OF BALLS CAME PELTING DOWN FROM THE POINT OF VANTAGE HELD BY THE BOYS."

"Oh, I yent in no hurry," said Reuben, easily. "You, all you uns, try it first, eh?"

"Oh, we've been trying it before you came in. The getting on is all the difficulty, and we will hold on to it till you are mounted."

"Well, hol' on, an' keep hol'in' on," said the old darky, maintaining his quiet pose on the soap box, as immovably as a statue of solid bronze. "You keep hol'in' on; it shows your kin' heart. Don't go for to be rash 'bout lettin' go, cos I yent gwine to be rash 'bout gettin' on, you see."

"Why not, Uncle Reub'?"

"Cos dere yent no right make-up to a bicycle; de bess an' de big'es' ob 'em yent got but two wheels to 'em, an' one ob dem is a little mean, skimpin' ting, made out ob de leabin's ob de big one, an' a-tailin' on behin' like a whipped dog."

"How can you know much about them? You never rode on one?"

"Das so; I neber rode on 'em; but, you see, I's 'flected on 'em, an' dat gots farder an' sees mo' dan ridin' on 'em, cos 'flections gow de inside track ebory time. Now, dem bicycles is stingy kin' o' lonesome tings. A fellow goes shyin' along all by himself, a splittin' de air wid his side face, an' he jess like Jim Neely's barber sign—dat slab man a-starin' at a razor-stop he yent see dis ten year. Why, dere yent no bowels or mercies to dat kin'; dey can't look you in de eye, nor no oder man, cos dey yent no humanity in a bicycle."

"Likewise dey yent noways ma'ed. De beeses has four foot; folks has two mos'tly, an' dey walks off on 'em; de fowls ob de air likewise, an' das all right. But dis ridin' afoot, as ef de earth wa'n't good enough for yo', an' de sky was jess to rub yer cheek agin, why, dat an' de allusion ob de adversary an' de conceitfulness ob riches."

"Likewise dey's proud an' lifted-up tings. Anybody wid a bicycle tink he got to promulgate heseif t'rough de town mos' promiscuous, like he was a trumpet wid a proclamation. Eberybody hab to see 'em, 'cep' de dead in de grave-yard."

A crowd of boys—Port Marshall and his friends, who had been making good use of Uncle Reuben's "Old Kentucky Shore"—now came storming into the store, stamping the snow from their heavy boots, elbowing and jangling one another, talking loud, and buying taffy and gum, and making so much noise that the harmony of the occasion was destroyed. The quiet interchange of thought and sentiment which had been going on between the men ceased, the group broke up, and one by one the village worthies took their leave.

Hiram Powell, extinguished for a moment, now re-lit his wit, and blazed forth with new radiance. It was a practical joke this time.

"Don't be in a hurry, Uncle Reuben," he said; "don't get up. Sit here till I go to dinner, and I will take you home with my team. I have just got to nail these mackerel easies, to be sent back to the city." He made a great show of driving the nails and pounding the covers in place as he talked. "I always liked that overcoat of yours, specially the button holes; there is something open and free-handed about them; they look as if you could step right in and out of them, with no latch-key, and no questions asked, nor no toll money—eh?"

Uncle Reuben sat in an attitude of deep repose, his legs crossed, arms folded, and his head sunk upon his breast, while an expression of fine scorn gathered subtle strength on his kind old face, but he made no reply.

"I tell you, though, that before the spring rain sets in you ought to have that coat reshingled. Do you hear?"

Here Hiram drove a nail through the old coat tail and fastened it to the soap box, with a shrewd wink at the one boy who stood where he could see him do it.

"I wouldn't mind contributing a few nails and any odd bits of boards we might have lying about here," he went on, driving home another nail on the other side.

"Let him alone, Hiram," said the boy. "Take those out; there's no fun in that kind of thing. Why don't you take a man's of your own size?"

"Hold on to your advice, Arthur Grinnell, till there is a rise in the market," said Hiram. "It is pretty well for a whipper-snapper like you to be telling me what to do in my own store."

"Your own store! Oh yes, that's a good one—that's good enough for me!" taunted Arthur in return, but he edged discreetly toward the door and got hold of the latch.

"Own store?" chimed in another boy. "Sweeps out and builds fire—twenty dollars a month. Oh yes!"

"Sorts old cod-fish and rotten potatoes, and makes Deacon Sterns stay outside and hold up his sign. Course it's his own store!"

"Clear out of this place, every one of you!" shouted Hiram, in a rage, brandishing his hammer and throwing a handful of nails at the boys, who had taken position near the door, and were measuring their chances.

"Give them back to him hot and heavy," cried they, pelting back the hail of nails at their enemy, who had now massed himself behind the counter.

"Give him iron," cried one. "It is strengthening."

"Keep your powder dry," called another.

"Walk yourselves out of that door, or the Deacon will prosecute you—every one of you," raged the clerk.

"The Deacon? Aha! who ever heard of the Deacon?" taunted the boys.

"Leave this store!" roared Hiram, fairly jumping up and down in his fury. "I say, leave this store!"

"We had reckoned on taking it with us, Mister Powell," said Port Marshall, drawing out the words with his easy Southern accent.

"If you give me another word out of your rebel mouth, I'll fire," shrieked Hiram.

"Fire, you coward; you daren't do it," cried Port, flinging himself out in front of the group, and standing there erect and defiant. "He look jess like a young glory-hallelujah a-flamin' out thar by hisself," old Reuben afterward described it.

There was a quick gleam of bright metal behind the counter, a whirl of flashing steel as Hiram flourished his pistol round and round his head by way of rousing his courage and getting good aim.

Bang! bang! bang! bang! Old Reuben shot up from that soap box as if it had been a torpedo; he flung himself, arms aloft, in front of his beloved boy; he clasped him in a wild embrace and crashed over with him, carrying all the adjacent boys with them. The outlying boys were dragged in by the heels or otherwise brought under, and they piled up boys upon boys—an accumulated mass of promiscuous boy such as the world has seldom seen. It was mixed but not mingled. No limbs being broken, and no centre of gravity to be maintained by anybody, each individual boy made a quadruped of himself, and kicked with all fours at once, squirming, yelling, and howling.

After a while every one got himself sorted out—he stood on his own legs and pulled himself together and took account of stock. Hiram had discreetly disappeared by this time. Old Reuben's treacherous coat skirts were found adhering to the soap box. The old darky grimly wrapped these detached members about his nether parts and set out for home, somewhat "curtailed," as Arthur Grinnell remarked.

Hiram, after all, had only fired blank cartridges, having prepared his pistol to startle old Reuben with. So, though nobody could prove any murderous intention on the part of the clerk, the feud between Hiram Powell and the boys was successfully inaugurated.

"This thing has only begun between us and Powell," said Arthur Grinnell; "and I am for fighting it out to the end. If any fellow wants to go over to the enemy, let him do it now. Hiram will give you candy and gum, and give you a hitch now and again. But that is not what I am after. He has no business bossing us out of that store. My voice is for open war."

"Hush up, then. Your voice is no better than anybody else's voice. We are all going to see this thing to the end," said another.

"We can snowball him whenever we see him—that is one thing we'll agree on."

"Yes, and give him regular good ones."

"And splash a good old sloppy wet snow-ball right into that best shirt bosom of his, when he is on his way to see Mary Ann Gowans—eh?"

"We will get ready for him. Let him show his face on East Hill this afternoon if he dares!"

Hiram not only showed his face at the desired rendezvous, but presented a fine open front for attack by driving in the Deacon's wagon-sleigh a spirited span of horses along the Valley road. He stood erect in the long open sleigh, and made a shining mark of himself, in full view of the coasters on the hill. Port Marshall threw the first ball, his clear voice ringing out with a defiant taunt,

"Fire! fire at me, will you, Mister Powell?"

"Fire away, boys! Let at him! Fire away! Never mind the fellows with him; they're traitors. Hit 'em!"

"Hurrah! that took him on the nose."

"Hit him again. Give it to 'em."

A volley of balls came pelting down from the point of vantage held by the boys. They smote the driver hip and thigh; they whacked him roundly under the ear; they hit the horses. There was where the mischief came in; for the horses broke into a mad gallop, and tore on through the town, sweeping everything before them, bringing up at their stable, two miles away, with the pieces of a broken sleigh strewn the road behind them, and one small boy yelling with a broken collar-bone.

Two hours after this, three boys were under arrest in Haddam Lower Landing. They were charged with disorderly conduct resulting in a runaway.

Would you like to know who the boys were, and how a young hero feels when he finds himself in the lock-up, and how much the judge fined them next morning?

You would have found that in the New York Herald the next morning if you had looked:

"Haddam Lower Landing.—Three boys, Davenport Marshall, Harry Smith, and Arthur Grinnell, were arrested yesterday for snowballing a team, which resulted in a runaway and much damage. Dismissed with a reprimand and $5 fine."

This item went into a chink in a great city paper; a hundred thousand people read it or skipped it. As far as I know, only one of the hundred thousand paid any attention to it. That one was an American gentleman taking his chop at a Paris café.

"Davenport Marshall! I shouldn't wonder if that is Mary's boy; she had one, and he'd be about old enough for this kind of stupidity. And he is named after me, too. Haddam Lower Landing—that must be in Connecticut. I'll try a letter. No, I'll try myself!"

And he took the next steamer for New York, and if he did not turn out to be the rich uncle of Mrs. Mary Marshall, as glad to find his relations as they were to find him, and a good deal more in need of them than they were of him—for all his money. Of course there was money enough after this, but, after all, Port Marshall had to make a man of himself.

Old Reuben had a new coat and a cottage of his own, and still lives to uphold the dignity of the family, whose newly found prosperity he attributes, in some unaccountable way, to the "Spirit of the Marshalls."

VIOLINS AND THEIR MAKERS.

BY LUCY C. LILLE.

GOING into the music-room of a charming country house the other day, I was surprised by hearing some delightful strains of an old-fashioned minuet played on a violin; still more so by observing that the musician was a little girl of twelve, my hostess's daughter, who, standing in front of her music stand, held the instrument with charming grace, drawing her bow deftly back and forth, while her teacher accompanied her on the piano. When we had listened to R——'s lesson with much interest we fell to talking of the instrument, and the surprising advance in its popularity among female musicians.

All over America and England to-day the violin, as an instrument for girls, is coming into vogue, and with deserved success, since it is more graceful and attractive even in feminine than in masculine hands, but, like the zither, it has only recently been regarded as a "womanly" sort of instrument to study. To learn the violin successfully, one should begin very young; still, good instructors have assured me that much can be done with it by pupils of advanced age, and it affords so delightful an addition to home music that I should like to interest all my readers in its history as well as in its study.

The story of the violin seems to me full of picturesque incident and tinged with a poetry all its own, since the makers of the first instruments were men who seemed ready to breathe their very hearts and lives into the wood they labored to perfect, the strings they wrought over seeming to produce the exquisite capacity for sound as though by magic, or by the influence of their genius, the spell of their musical inspiration. Far back as the foot-prints of tradition lead us, we hear of instruments which led to the violin, at least of something in wood with horse-hair stretched across it, vibrating when struck, and producing a weird and yet musical sound. The rebek and the crouth were instruments somewhat like the violin, and known since the ninth century, and one John Morgan, a Welshman, was noted about 1720 for his performances on the crouth, a box-shaped affair with strings on bridges, upon which he played to the great delight of his friends and many visitors to the island of Anglesea, where he lived and died.

The votta, another instrument of wood with strings, also prefigured the violin, and we know that viols were used every where in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; lutes were also in favor, and citharas had some resemblance to the violin.

In Italy came the final developments. The viol was an instrument which in the fifteenth century was manufactured in its perfection in Brescia, Venice, and Bologna, and in a mediaeval monastery in the latter town I have seen two fine specimens of viols made in 1504. They rested in niches at the end of a long corridor used as a sort of music-room, and seemed to me like guardian-spirits of the other instruments scattered about, all more modern and perhaps less dignified in character.

In Brescia lived one Gasparo di Salo, whose workshop for musical instruments was well known. Salo is supposed to have made the first violin on record, in or about 1566. One bearing his name with that date is still to be seen; a narrow, high-arched instrument, yellow-brown in hue, and with a rich tone, not so sweet as some which came later, but yet full of fine quality.

Jean Maggini was Salo's most famous pupil, and the few violins to be found to-day bearing his name are almost priceless, while those of the Marianis and other Brescia makers who clustered about Maggini show the elements of the fine qualities which belong to what is known all the world over as the famous Cremona school.

There is a tradition that while Maggini was at work in Brescia, a tall, dark-eyed, and melancholy-looking boy appeared one day in his workshop, and, looking on, offered certain suggestions in regard to the manufacture of the violins. Maggini at first scorned the youth's advice; but a day or two later the lad returned, and brought with him a piece of wood which he had been at work upon, seasoning, etc., and demonstrated clearly to Maggini the truth of his own theory. From time to time the boy worked on with the great violin-maker, but would say little of himself. He scarcely ever admitted how or where he lived, and in the Italy of the sixteenth century reserve of this kind was possible. The boy performed his duties, disappearing and reappearing at certain times, and no one felt the right to question who he was or whence he came. Later, when the name of Andrea Amati was known throughout the length and breadth of Italy as the founder of the great Cremona school, it is said that one of his fellow-workmen recognized in the famous violin-maker who wielded such a power the dark-eyed and sombre-visaged boy who had offered Maggini such valuable advice, and worked so patiently in his shop at Brescia.

Nicolo Amati, the grandson of Andrea, born in 1596, was the greatest genius of the family. When about ten years of age, it is said, he was left one stormy day in the upper chambers of his father's workshop, where he began amusing himself by working over some old violins left there for repairs. The result pleased the boy so much that he absented himself from his playmates the next day, and for many days following, rustling up to the garret, where he toiled in secret. One day the strains of an unusually fine violin reached the ears of the workmen below. Old Amati sent to see who was in the garret, and judge of his surprise when the messenger returned dragging after him the unwilling Nicolo, who expected a beating, no doubt, but was speedily taken into his father's special work room, and soon outvalued all others of his name. Two of the Nicolo Amati violins, the one belonging to Alard, the French violinist, the other to Count Cozio, an Italian gentleman, are examples of his skill, exquisitely graceful, and with a perfection of tone which up to 1668 had never been achieved.

At the same time, however, there was coming into prominence a pupil of Nicolo Amati, whose name actually seems to be synonymous with the term violin. I refer to the famous Stradivarius, in whose work is united all that makes perfection in tone, power, sweetness, and depth in the instrument he toiled over so many years.

It would seem when any art is nearing its perfection a great genius always arises ready to take up the materials so far as they have been worked into shape, and give the crowning touch of inspiration and skill which means perfection. One hundred years had elapsed since the first violin was made by Salo, and since that time, as you have seen, the Cremona school had arisen, paving the way for the genius of Stradivarius, and at the same time interest in the instrument had developed to such an extent that the world—especially the world of Italy—was ready for his great achievement. You know that during the same century orchestral music had been developing, and from the old time of lutes and viols there had come a need for just such an instrument as that which Stradivarius lived to perfect; so we find that in the history of any art all things seem to work together. Musical composition had taken the dramatic form which demanded fine orchestration, and the violin was ready at the moment of need.

The life of Stradivarius is, in fact, only the life of his violin. We know but little of the man save what is associated with his work; but during the twenty years which he devoted to the perfection of his work we have pictures of him which show us how entirely regardless he was of everything but the one end.

TICK TACK! TICK TACK!

The maple and the willow tree were studied by him in their every aspect; woods were cherished, seasoned, tempered, labored over, every fibre speaking to him of what it might do for his beloved instrument. And the whole of the world seemed to him responsive only as it suggested material for his workshop, or assistance in carrying out his plans. Night after night he would be heard listening to the wind sighing through the trees, and innumerable were his experiments. In the end he had a method used for his boys. Twenty years passed in this way, the domestic life of the man dried up, and he, headed by himself; he was never seen with the children of white leather; the working cap was always on his head. Tall and thin and grave of eye, though very gentle of speech, he lived among his instruments, quick only where their needs were concerned.

At last, in 1690, he produced what he considered a work of art, and for ten years continued to manufacture violins such as the world had never dreamed of, yet were only leading the way to the final instruments which from 1705 to 1725 were pronounced beyond rivalry.

To describe a Stradivarius is a difficult matter. Everything about it is the perfection of grace. There is nothing stiff; each curve is a line of beauty. Every smallest bit of wood, every smallest slip of block employed, is considered as carefully as though it were part of a delicate mosaic, and so thorough is the workmanship inside as well as without that the most successful forgeries were discovered in taking some well-known violin to pieces.

In the beginning of this century a supposed Stradivarius which had brought an enormous price needed a new bar, and accordingly it was taken apart. Judge of the owner's surprise when rough and careless inside finish was displayed! The violin lost caste at once, and was cast into obscurity as a worthless imitation, for investigation had invariably proved that the interior construction of all the old "lute-maker's" instruments excelled in delicacy that of the outside.

Stradivarius manufactured many other instruments during his long life. The leading musicians came to him for guitars, lutes, and viols, and his opinion was asked on every occasion when there was any question as to the comparative purity of tone in any celebrated musical instruments. Like almost all violin-makers, he lived to a great age, dying in 1737, at the age of ninety-two. During his last years, feeling that his hand had lost its cunning, and his eye its keenness, and his ear, no doubt, its delicacy of perception, he refused to label any of his violins; but he worked hard with his pupils, and two of them, Bergonzi and Guarnerius, did famous work.

There is a carpet warehouse in the Piazza S. Domenico in Cremona which was the old violin-maker's last residence. There for years was his workshop, where he had gathered about him violins and stringed instruments of all kinds, and where for years he labored and meditated, and where, during the latter part of his life, he received his friends with a sort of state, delighted to be known as the "Lute-maker of Cremona," and to feel that his pupils cherished his every word.

The boy Lulli, a reproduction of the statue of whom in his scullion's dress forms the illustration to this article, had a brilliant career as a musician. He was by birth an Italian, and received the rudiments of his musical education at the hands of an old Franciscan monk in his native city of Florence. He was taken to France as a young lad, and a position was found for him in the kitchen of the establishment of a grand lady in Paris. Here he was set to work at all the menial duties of the boy of all work to the cooks and kitchen maids of a great house, and it may easily be imagined that the clatter of pots and pans was very distasteful to one whose soul was filled with sweet harmonies. But he was a cheerful lad, and he bore his tiresome burden with light-heartedness, for he found his chief delight in his violin, his skill with which was so great that he was promoted from the kitchen to a place in his employer's private band, and soon after that to King Louis XIV.'s band. Thereafter his progress was rapid. He grew famous as a violinist, and still more renowned as a composer, for he produced no less than twenty operas, besides numerous other compositions of high artistic merit. It is sad to be obliged to add that the young musician grew up to be a very disagreeable man, impatient of all rivals, and tolerated only on account of his genius.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER X.

FAITH'S dinner party for Bertie and his young friends was a decided success. Miss Grace thoroughly approved of her niece's doing all she could to honor the lad's successful school examination, and the hilarity of the party of young people was in no degree checked by the presence of Aunt Justina and Mr. and Mrs. Benedict.

Faith was in radiant spirits. When the company adjourned to the long drawing-room, and an impromptu dance was suggested, she sat down to the piano, playing her gayest waltzes, and smiling approval at the boys and girls as they whirled past her.

"Won't you dance, Faith?" Bertie called out once, but Faith shook her head. She enjoyed seeing their amusement, and somehow, as she played the old airs she knew so well, she liked to think. The circumstances of her life had made Faith Emerson in some ways very old for her years at eighteen, and yet it was a child's heart in purity and simplicity that was beating that night in time to the joyousness and content about her. To-morrow her "children" were to have their first exhibition. She could fancy Jo's pleasure on hearing what was in store for her.

And then suddenly Roberts appeared with a note. Faith stood up at once and opened it, for Roberts said the messenger was waiting with a carriage. It was from Mrs. Barker. Kitty was very, very ill. "Would Faith come at once?"

The little company broke up rather sadly, for of course Faith did not hesitate a moment. Indeed, she waited only for wraps to be brought down to her, and in ten minutes was being whirled away in the starlight, thinking how singularly the happy and the sad parts of life seem to meet each other. Kitty had not been well for some days, but such a change was the farthest from the thoughts of any of them. As the carriage turned into the gateway, Faith saw lights shining in the upper and lower windows of the large house, of which Kitty was the only child. Could it be that merry, light-hearted, pleasure-loving and good-natured Kitty was on her way toward that valley "where none need walk alone"?

Faith was met in the hall by Mrs. Barker's sister, who explained that Kitty had been begging for hours to see Faith, but knowing of the little dinner, they had postponed sending for her; but now poor Mrs. Judson choked back her tears as she led Faith up the staircase softly into the sick girl's room. Whether the change that had come across Kitty's face were of death, or only suffering to be healed, Faith hardly knew, but a change was there, something that in all the girl's sixteen years of happy life no one had ever seen; it awoke Faith not a little. She sat down near the bedside and took Kitty's little burning hand in hers.

So it came about that when Jo Markham, with every nerve keen and every feeling roused, was following the men toward North Street, Faith was watching at Kitty's bedside, a mile away from home, and leagues distant, so far as thought or dread of what the morning would bring forth was concerned. Seven o'clock had just struck from the little time-piece in Kitty's room when Mrs. Barker was summoned into the hall. Kitty was better, decidedly so, the doctors thought—better for Faith's presence, and perhaps really on the mend; so Mrs. Barker answered the call quite cheerfully. But in a moment she returned with an altered look, and told Faith that Miss Grace was there waiting for her. Something had happened in North Street.

* Begun in No. 324, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Faith was down-stairs in an instant; every possible dread seemed to rush across her mind before she reached the parlor, where Miss Grace, very white and tearful and agitated, was standing.

"My dear child," the old lady began, compassionately and nervously, "I know it'll be a dreadful blow to you—a dreadful blow—but you must bear it; and remember, Faith, I never thought you ought to have done it."

"Aunt," cried Faith, desperately, "what do you mean? what is it?"

"Oh, my dear," said the old lady, promptly, "that dreadful Jo Markham and a gang of men tried to rob the house last night!"

And having said this, Miss Grace sank into the nearest chair.

Faith stood perfectly still. She was so long accustomed to self-control in the presence of her aunt, or when any emergency arose, that now she collected her thoughts after a certain fashion before she spoke, and yet afterward she remembered the terrible sense of confusion that had oppressed her.

Jo—her Jo—a thief! Try to rob her! Impossible!

It was a lovely morning. All the fairness and sweetness of June seemed to flood the cheerful room in which Faith stood, still feeling as though darkness were around her as she tried to think what all this could mean.

"How do you know, aunt?" Faith asked at last, in a very cold, dull tone. She put one of her hands for support on a chair near her, and looked at Miss Grace with a fixed gaze. "Tell me just what you mean."

But Miss Grace could not be coherent; all that Faith could gather was that about half past one, Roberts, hearing a slight noise in the pantry, suddenly remembered having left the old Farnham goblets out, and started down-stairs to put them away. He was in his stocking feet, and so made no noise in crossing the back hall toward the pantry. He turned the handle of the door leading to the little corridor where Faith had been that morning with Jo, and there, as Miss Grace said, tragically, "He came upon them!"

"Who?" demanded Faith, with trembling lips.

"A horrible man was just lifting that Jo in through the window," continued Miss Grace. "There was no question of what they meant to do; but, unfortunately, only the wretched girl was arrested; the men escaped."

"Arrested!" cried Faith. "Where is she?"

Miss Grace groaned.

"Safe in jail, where I hope she'll stay," was her answer.

"You really must commend Roberts for the prompt way in which he acted, Faith. He did wonderfully. In five minutes he had sent for a policeman, and in half an hour the girl was in jail, and a search out for the men. One good thing, she gave their names promptly enough, though she refused to say much more, but kept asking for you."

It seemed to Faith that she never could get home soon enough, and meeting the servants was a new trial, for all but her own Jane were loud in denouncing "that Jo."

Roberts's voluble explanations were checked by Faith's quiet way of bringing him right to the point in his narrative; but Mary, the cook, insisted upon reminding Miss Faith of the morning before, when, with her own eyes, she saw Jo trying the window, and saying how easy it was to go up and down.

"Easy indeed!" murmured Miss Grace.

Bertie was on the scene by this time, and when Faith had taken a hasty cup of coffee, and put on her walking dress, she took him one side, explaining that she wished at once to go down to the jail. The boy, of course, volunteered to go with her, and they started off, Faith struggling hard to maintain the composure she had kept up before the servants and her aunt.

Bertie had to report that one of the men had been caught down near the marshes.

"It's that sneak Job Martin," Bertie said, indignantly—

"the one that stole so much from the Sanford yacht two years ago. It seems, Faith, he has something pretty bad to say of poor Jo."

"Oh, Bertie," cried his cousin, looking at him appealingly, with her eyes full of sudden tears, "you can't believe anything really against her yet!"

Bertie kicked away a pebble that lay shining in the road before him.

"Faith, my dear," he said, with a wise and unhappy look, "I don't know what to think."

CHAPTER XI.

ASHFIELD jail seemed to confront the cousins with something newly terrible about its heavy door and barred windows as they approached it; all Faith could think of was that somewhere behind those bars and locks Jo was imprisoned, and it almost seemed to her as if she could feel the girl's wistful eyes fastened appealingly upon her.

But, in truth, at that moment Jo's eyes, tired, worn with passionate weeping and her long vigil, were closed in sheer exhaustion. The narrow cell in which she had been placed was very dark, in spite of all the wealth of sunshine lavished on the beautiful green earth that morning. She hardly knew how she had come there—where she was; but at every sound along the stone-flagged gallery outside she would start up for an instant, straining her eyes and her ears for the one step, the one voice, the one face, she was waiting for.

They came at last. The key turned in the door. The jailer's voice said to some one outside, "You can go right in, Miss Emerson."

And Jo, standing up suddenly with a wild movement of her hands and arms, thought light had at last come in upon her. Faith was there, not angry, not ready to cast her off, but with her look—the tenderness of her eyes just dimmed by pain or wonderment; but oh, Jo thanked Heaven, not turned away from her, not cruel or cold! And in another moment she was on her knees beside her, sobbing wildly and hysterically, and Faith's hands—just as they had been long ago in the little school-house—were gently resting on her head.

For Faith, with her keen instinct, had resolved that, decide what she might, Jo should tell her story first. Two sides there are, there must be, to everything, and it is merciful that even when His creatures blindly see but one, God knows it all—balances, judges, and when it may be, forgives and leads back.

They talked together a long time in low tones. Bertie, pacing the gallery outside, caught the murmurs of the voices, and looked in to see a picture he never could forget.

Jo, on her knees but leaning back, was gazing at Miss Emerson with imploring, eager eyes, her cheeks tear-stained and flushed, her hair in rough waves down about her shoulders; and Faith was looking at the girl with something in the shining sweetness of her eyes and lips that made the boy feel as if he was in the presence of an angel.

Faith joined him soon after this. Jo had told her story, and Faith believed her, but just then it seemed wisest only to speak of it confidentially to Bertie.

Miss Grace was waiting in the library window for Faith's return, full of excitement, and yet, if the truth were told, a certain satisfaction from the feeling that at last Faith Emerson had had a lesson. Miss Grace approved of doing charity, but in a different way. At certain seasons of the year she would give out warm clothes, tons of coal, and soup, if necessary; but she never had much faith in trying to do anything with the hearts and minds and natures of "the poor."

Once Faith had said, to her aunt's horror, that her "children" were like her garden.

"They want just what the flowers do, auntie—weeding and tending and nourishing; when I find one that needs

"IT WAS FROM MRS. BARKER. KITTY WAS VERY ILL."

the hot-house a little while, I try and find a place for it until it blooms, or if it needs a prop to learn how to grow. I have to put in a stick and tie it up carefully."

Faith coming along the road with her easy, swinging gait rather baffled and annoyed Miss Grace: why, the girl was actually smiling up into Bertie's face!

"Well, I never!" said Aunt Justina, springing to her feet. And Faith came in, still with the traces of a smile lurking about the corners of her mouth.

It was rather hard upon poor Miss Justina to obtain no further satisfaction from either Faith or Bertie than their confident assurances that it "would all turn out right"; and to discover that Faith had arranged for Jo's temporary freedom, at least, was an absolute blow to the old lady. Meanwhile, dinner over, Faith went down to old Markham's house in Sailors' Row.

Jo was at home; the old man, as usual, smoking in his corner.

At sight of Faith, Jo sprang forward, and at once exclaimed to her grandfather. "There, grandfather! Here is Miss Emerson. Now won't you tell her that what Job Martin says is a lie—that I was upstairs all yesterday evening? You saw me in bed."

The girl's voice was piteous, excited, and pleading.

The old man slowly removed his pipe, and looking with well-feigned surprise at his granddaughter.

"Josephine," he said, solemnly, "you'd oughter be ashamed to stand there telling those lies. I don't know nothin' about where you was last night. I was out fer a long walk."

Jo's eyes, strained and burning, turned from the old man's stony face to Faith's. A dull kind of despair began to creep over her.

"Mr. Markham," Faith said, in her gentlest tones, "remember that you are putting Jo in a terrible position. This man Martin asserts that Jo suggested the robbery of my house to them in a talk last night at your house. Now you must know and you must say whether this is true or not. You must know where Jo was during the evening."

But the old man had evidently resolved on his safest course of action.

"Don't know nothin' more'n I tell ye," he replied, again shaking his head sagely. "She might hev talked with them, an' she mightn't. She 'ain't been such a doofy granddaughter to me that I had oughter expect' much good of her anyhow."

And no more would he say.

Faith was frightened by Jo's strange looks when she left her. At the door the girl put out a shaking hand, and said,

"Will they put me in there again, Miss Faith?"

Faith paused a moment, and long afterward regretted her next words.

"Oh, Jo," she said, piteously, "what are we to do? Nobody in all Ashfield will believe you, except Bertie and me—nobody, now that your own grandfather is against you. If only you could live along so well and be so good they'd have to believe it."

Jo was leaning against the wood-work of the old door, her face turned away from Faith's a little, her eyes and lips composed, but terribly drawn and sorrowful.

"No," she said, in a slow, tired way, "I suppose not; there isn't any one would believe me."

She hesitated a very little, and then, wearily moving her eyes toward Faith's, said, quietly:

"I'm glad you do, and Mr. Bertie, and I won't forget it. Don't be too ashamed of me, if you can help it, Miss Faith."

When lit - the Fred - die went to bed, He al - ways said his prayers; He kissed ma-ma, and then pa - pa. And straightway went up - stairs.

The musical score consists of three staves. The top staff is the melody in G major, 2/4 time, marked 'Moderato'. The middle staff is the accompaniment in G major, 2/4 time, marked 'p' (piano). The bottom staff is the bass line in G major, 2/4 time. The lyrics are written below the first staff.

CUPID PRACTISING FOR ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

29 CAROL ROAD, HOBGATE ROAD, DARTMOUTH PARK, LONDON, ENGLAND.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I am a little girl twelve years old. I go to school, and study French, geography, botany, grammar, reading, arithmetic, writing, objects, history, dictation, composition, singing, drawing, gymnastics, drill, and needle-work. I also study music at home, which I like very much. We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first, and look forward with great delight to the time when the next part will be out. I have often wished to write to you, but have never found time until just now. I have two brothers one eighteen and the other fourteen years old and young sisters. I also have two pets, the cat's name being Lady Jane and the kitten's Fidget.

Perhaps some of the little girls would like to know how to make a simple but pretty mat. To begin with, you must first get some mixed Berlin wool (which is the best), or some other colored wool, but it must be Berlin. You must then provide yourself with a bone crochet hook not very thick. Then make five chain, but take care to join them, and you will find you have a ring; then make this ring make ten treble, making a chain between each, and this will complete the first row. Then make twenty treble in the hole above, also making a chain between each, and this will complete the second row. Then in the third row make one chain, and make this into a treble stitch, and put this in one hole, then one chain, and then make two treble, and put this in another hole, and so on until you finish this row, and you will find you have thirty-one treble. In the last row you must first make three chain, and make this into a treble stitch, then two more, then a chain, then three more treble stitches, all being in one hole. Then make one chain, and join it on the top of treble stitch in another hole, then do the same as the first, and so on until you get round the mat, and you will find you have eleven shells. You must then finish it off by making three chain, and fasten it on the back of the mat very neatly. Now if any of the little girls do not understand it, they may write to me, and I will try to send them a pattern mat.

ANNIE SCOTT.

You were kind to take so much pains with your directions. Thank you very much.

THE BING, CATHERINE, SCOTLAND, N. B.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I have taken out HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for twelve months. I like it very much. I was going to bid them, but there was no index. I wish that you would publish one. We had four canaries, but one died. I have no other pets. We have not much snow here. I take out no other book, so I would call HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE comes. This is the first time I have written, so I hope this will be published. THOMAS S. (aged 11 years).

Write to Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., 188 Fleet Street, London, about the Index.

JAM-TOWN, NEW YORK.

My home is in Jamestown. It is situated at the foot of Chautauque Lake, about eighteen miles from Chautauque, where the great Sunday-school Assembly is held every year. Dr. Vincent comes twice, and so do many teachers from all parts of the world. They have a miniature Palestine, and a Jewish Temple, and many interesting things. I have a little cousin who lives there, and I hope to go there some time, if I am well enough; for I am a sick little boy most of the time. I have a cat and a dog; they are both yellow. My cat will put his fore-paws around the dog's neck, and they put their noses together as if they were kissing. MERRITT B.

EALING, LONDON, ENGLAND.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—My father gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for Christmas present, as I am very fond of reading. I like it better than any book I ever read. I like all the tales very much, especially "Jelf House." I am going to take it in weekly with my pocket-money. What is the price of the book Nov 7 as I want to get it. I am twelve years old, and have no brothers, and only one sister, should like very much to see this in our Post-office Box, as it is my first letter. I remain ALBERT W. S.

The price of Nov 7 is one dollar (for four shillings), and you will have to send to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, Franklin Square, New York, as it is not published in England.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—My auntie has sent me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for the past year; she sends it to me every month. I think it a splendid paper. I like to read the letters very much. I live in Paris, only we have come to the country for my health. I have been ill a long time, and now I have caught a cold and got bronchitis. Paris is a beautiful city. We live by the Luxembourg Gardens—such a nice place! There are some beautiful swans there, and the swans and pigeons will feed out of people's hands, they are so tame. I feed them very often. I have a brother sixteen years old; he is called Clarence; he is living in England. I have no pets except two canaries and one goldfish; one of the canaries will come and eat out of my hand. I know how to make a number of little things, and if his letter reaches you I shall write again, and I may tell you how to make a few things. Perhaps I shall be in England the next time I write; we go to see my auntie and grandma nearly every year. With love, VIRGINIA B.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have never written for the Post-office Box before, but I am very happy to do so. Last summer another boy and I rode on our bicycles to BRYN MAWR, which is about twelve miles' distance. While we were passing through Fairmount Park my friend's bicycle got a hot box, but luckily we were near a fountain. When we were on the Lancaster Pike, at Overbrook, my friend took a header. I jumped off very quickly, but found he was not hurt very badly. We went on, and reached our destination in safety. I spent a very happy day. I received a pocket-book with five dollars in it and many other very nice presents. I got a very good school in Germantown, and come home every week. I have a very pleasant time there. This last week there were only very nice skating and coasting. G. B. S.

NEW LONDON, MINNESOTA.

I AM another lover of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I have often concluded to write to you, but have written only one letter, and that was not printed. All children write about their pets, but I have mine. I have six friends and I have a little club. We meet once a week for three hours. During the first two hours six are busy with their work, and one reads to the club, the last hour is spent in playing. We have had but one meeting, but it was very pleasant. Would you please suggest a name for our club? I am vice-president and I wish to see you. I have a very nice girl of about twelve years—my age. I do not care if it is from the United States, England, or elsewhere, but I do not care if it is new serial. My opinion is, it is very interesting. ALICE SCHMIDT.

Would Seven Daughters do as a name for your little club?

SOUTHAMPTON, HAMPSHIRE, ENGLAND.

PAPA gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present. I am very pleased with it. I think it is the finest book I have ever had. This is the first letter I have written to you. "I like 'Into Unknown Seas' and the Post-office Box very much. I have one sister older and two younger than myself, and two younger brothers also." I have sent you some "pied cities." Your loving GERTRUDE II. (aged ten).

Thank you for the "pi."

DAYTON, OHIO.

We enjoy this lovely paper very much, and I take great pleasure in writing you a letter. My younger sister is writing to you, and I hope you still would do so too if she could, but as she is the pet, and only seven years old, she has never done so. I have written to you, so she must write a letter. I am twelve years old, and my sister Lillah, who is next in size, is eleven. Some of our little friends were here Saturday afternoon, and they played Lotto. I have a little cooking stove; it is called the "Jewel Range," and is really a jewel. LOUISE McM. II.

We are much obliged to Alton for her letter and for her papa's verses.

CLIFTON STATION.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number, but this is my first letter to you. I am always very much interested in the household pets described in the letter box, and I thought others might be interested in mine. Papa wrote a piece of doggerel about them, which I learned, and recited in school today. I send it to you as a good description of my doggies. Your friend, ALICE.

THE TALE OF THE DOGGIES.

A family they are of the canine kind;
A better name I wish, as scarcely could I find.
Their portraits I'd paint if they'd only be still,
For they wiggle around like the wheels of a mill.

First, Neo, the king he is curly and black,
A Newfoundland he is, and boss of the pack;
As a dignified doggie he surely is chief,
And a terror to bad boys, the vagrant, and thief.

Next in importance, Miss Gypsy I'll name,
As a cat she is rich, and a beauty to fame,
And when out a-buttin' she's stomach on a spot
As a common plain cur to a juicy leaf joint.

Her children are two, one white with a spot,
Which gives him his name; the other's named Spot.

Then comes, a Scotch dog, rough-haired and black,
With stiff-looking bristles all over his back.

Now come the house dogs. The first I'll present,
His name is Nobby, for on mischief he's bent;
He's now being taught to sit up and speak—
A very hard lesson to learn in a week.

And lastly, not leastly, our pet dog is Snap,
Who's as cute as a cricket and smart as a nap.

He will jump through a hoop and speak when he's fed,
And he knows what to do when you say "Go to bed."

To point all their virtues and virtues I'd fall,
So this is the end of our little dogs' tale.

STANMORE, BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, ENGLAND.

I am a little boy eight years old. We have a canary that sings beautifully, and it always knows me when I whistle to it. We also have a horse that has four white feet, and a nice Welsh pony, which I wish to sit up and speak like a pet. My uncle made me a Christmas present of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I have not yet got my first year, but I will be very pleased if my letter is published. TOM L.

NARRAGANSETT FREE, RHODE ISLAND.

DEAR POST-MISTRESS.—This stormy day the fog-horn is blowing very hard. Did you ever see 80-one's. The one at Point Judith is blown by steam, and is about six feet long. It makes a dreadful noise if you are asleep. I have painted some paper dolls; I want to send some to you. I have a dog, and a cat, you can tell me where there is one? I am nine years old. Mamma teaches me at home. I have twenty-nine other dolls, besides paper ones. We have two birds, and a big dog named Prince. I send you my love.

Send your paper dolls to St. Mary's Free Hospital, 402 West Thirty-fourth Street, New York City.

TORQUAY, DEVONSHIRE, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I hope there will be room for my letter. I will tell what pets I have and have had. We had a dog and a cat; the dog got lost and the cat had two kittens, and she has a white spot just in front, like a brooch. I am ten and a half. I go to school in the summer, and I like to be a dressmaker in the winter. I friend and I like in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and gives it to me. I like "Two Arrows" very much. I have been obliged to come away from the summer, as I am not strong and not able to go out now, so you see I would miss HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE if I did not have it. DONALD G.

LIMERICK, IRELAND.

I am a little girl eleven years old. There are six sisters and one brother, and myself—that makes eight. We have a dear little kitten, which dresses up in some dolls's clothes. We have a pig, which she thinks it much, for she purrs all the time, and when we address her and put her to sleep in the stable her face. I am not American, but Irish. I have never left Limerick except to go to Kilkenny, a pretty little sea-side place in Clare. I would like to see this letter to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and think it is nice that any of the other children in "Roll House." Your loving little friend,

LENA MACKENZIE.

P. S.—If any of the girls would write to me, I should like it very much.

SOUTH NORWICH, LONDON.

I am nine years old. I have three sisters, I am the eldest. We have a great many nice toys, but only one that is a big one, and I have a dog, which I sang very nicely. The one we have now does not sing. We have lessa than ten, but I could sing every morning. May and I study music, but Ethel is too young. MINNIE O.

ADAMS, IOWA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I am a little girl twelve years old, and I love HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. It was given to me for a Christmas present this year. I took it in 1881, and I was almost too young to be able to sell it. I have three pets—a pigeon, a kitty, and a dog. My pigeon's name is Dick, and he is just as tame as he can be. KIT is a black spaniel, and she is a very affectionate kitty. The dog's name is Fritz; he is a little Skye terrier; papa brought him to me from Chicago in the fall. My mamma has fifteen birds, all in one cage, and when she raises some this spring, I am going to tame one as the articles in YOUNG PEOPLE told us how. If you wish me to, I will tell you how I succeed. My papa has been gone for five of these place four years. I would like to correspond with some little girl in Vermont about my age. MAMIE L. SMITH.

We shall be interested, of course, dear, in your success.

THE STORY OF A NUT.

I was once a nut. I lived on the top of a tall chestnut-tree. I was very happy then. The winds swung me to and fro in my cradle. Perhaps some of you do not know what a nut is. The inside of the chestnut burr. The outside of the burr was covered with sharp thorns, but the inside was soft as silk. The birds sang sweet songs to me all the days long, and I could grow very chubby. One night Jack Frost paid our woods a visit. He turned many of the leaves yellow. That night suddenly my cradle began to rattle, and I felt myself falling, falling to the ground. The next day many laughing, noisy children came to the woods to have a hitting party. They brought baskets and baskets to carry the nuts. I was hidden under some leaves, so the children did not see me. The next day there was a heavy rain, and I felt myself sinking a little into the ground. I was very much surprised, followed. I gradually sank down so far that I could not be seen. After a while the winter snows began to fall, and I grew very green and fat. I was with a white blanket. The days were long and dreary to me in the dark ground. After many cold days I felt the ground grow warmer, and I felt that I was going to grow into the clear air again. After a while a pale little green sprout was seen above the ground. The sun shone on me, and when I grew a little larger and was beginning to wither, rain came down from the clouds and watered me. So I grew to be the noble chestnut-tree I am now.

ELISE BOYD CANTON.

LEIGHAM, KENT, ENGLAND.

Once upon a time there was a little child could talk, and he belonged to a King, who once heard him murmuring something, so he said that if he could find out who he would kill him. This is how he found out. He put him in a large building like a circus, and a man in the middle. Then they let the lion out upon him. The man began to cry, and he said, "What a noble horse! What a long flowing mane! What magnificent muscles are in his powerful feet and legs! There was nothing so grand and strong as that lion which completely enraptured the man. The lion thought he would wait until his foe was ready for him, so he quietly crept back to his cage. He did not kill the man, because he had praised him so. The people then pulled up the man, and gave a joyous shout, and said, "The lion is subdued! What the lion feared that he pushed out in great rage, and shouted, "I am not!" When the King heard this he had the lion killed, and this was the end of that lion.

ELIZABETH DAVIS (nine years old).

WATERVILLE, OHIO.

I am going to write a letter to you to let you know I am a deaf and dumb boy. I am fourteen years old. I have one pet; it is my shepherd dog, which is called Pompey. I have a stuffed rabbit and a canoe. I am building a canoe now; she is complete, except paint. I live on a farm three miles from town. I have twenty cows, twenty or thirty hogs and pigs, and many chickens. I am going to try to raise chickens and sell the eggs. My mamma's friend wants me to camp out with him next summer; my mother said I could go there too. I have one sister. I like the story of "Two Arrows." My sister likes the story of "A Boy's Opportunity." I like the best story of "A Boy's Opportunity." ROSE H.

BREAKFAST ROLLS—I wonder, dear Little Housekeepers, if your mothers will let you try your hands at making some nice breakfast rolls? You will have to begin them the night before they are wanted, and this is the way to make them: Dissolve in a pint of warm milk a table-spoonful of butter—let it heat in the stove till the butter is melted and the milk tepid. Add now the yolk of one egg well beaten and one-third of a cake of compressed yeast, with four tea-spoonfuls of sugar and a salt-spoonful of salt. Sift three cups of flour, and set it near the range to get warm; add this very gradually to the milk, while it is being prepared, and stir it well, mixing it as well as you can for ten minutes. Cover with a thick clean folded cloth, and leave it in a warm place until morning.

Be up bright and early, if you are to surprise papa with rolls for breakfast, dress neatly and quickly, and run down-stairs to beat your rolls warm. They should be risen a half-hour in a very warm place, and should then be dropped into gem-pans, allowed to rise a few moments longer, and finally should be baked in a piping hot oven. They are delicious, and not so hard to make as you may fancy.

In following a receipt, follow it exactly, mind. It is never safe to change anything, or to add to your own liking, or to neglect anything which you are told to do in a receipt. Follow the rule exactly.

CHOCOLATE CARAMELS.—For the girls who desire to make chocolate caramels, I have copied Mrs. Mary F. Henderson's receipt: One cupful of the best syrup, one cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of white sugar, two cupfuls of a very fine chocolate, two cupfuls of cream vanilla, one tea-spoonful of flour mixed with cream. Rub the chocolate to a smooth paste with a little of the cream. Boil all together half an hour, and pour into flat dishes to cool. Mark it with a knife into little squares when it is cool enough.

The next receipt, by the way, is for molasses two of sugar, one of milk, one-half of chocolate, a piece of butter half the size of an egg. Boil the milk and molasses together; scrape the chocolate fine, and mix with just enough of the boiling milk and molasses to moisten; rub it perfectly smooth, then, with a butter, and boil twenty minutes. Try as molasses candy, and if it hardens, pour into a buttered dish. Cut the same as nut candy.

A NEW USE FOR A CRAB.

A CORRESPONDENT of an English paper tells of a novel mode of catching a rabbit which he lately witnessed when out shooting in the neighborhood of the sea.

Two small boys appeared to be carefully inspecting the rabbit holes, which were very numerous, and having decided where to commence operations, they proceeded as follows:

The younger boy slid out of his coat—it was several sizes too large for him—and drawing a piece of string from among the treasures contained in his pocket, he tied up the ends of the sleeves. He then arranged the coat so as to cover the rabbit hole, letting the sleeves hang loose, and fastened the coat over the hole by the simple device of planting his feet on the edges of it on either side.

The escape of the tenant of the hole was now securely cut off, but how to induce "Bunny" to attempt escape (which would be certain capture) was a difficulty which the elder boy took the following strange means to overcome:

From the museum of antiquities which he would call his pocket he produced in rapid succession a nail, a button, a razor-fish shell, a few matches wrapped in newspaper, an inch of wax candle, and lastly (and with much caution in the handling), a lively specimen of the common crab.

Having lighted the candle, the ingenious hunter dropped some of the hot wax on the middle of the crab's back, firmly fixed the candle thereon, and placed the creature at the mouth of one of the rabbit holes—not the one which his companion was guarding with coat and outstretched legs, but another, which his experience taught him was the entrance to the same rabbit mansion as the guarded hole was the exit of.

With eager and sidelong gait, the crab, with the flaming beacon on his back, made for the friendly darkness of the rabbit's residence, and within less than a minute there was a scrimmage in the immediate neighborhood of the coat, and the boy who had just now been proudly guarding his post with extended legs fell suddenly on all fours—a Colossus of Rhodes, as it were, overthrown by an earthquake—and rolled over in a confused mass of coat, dust, and boy. When the dust had cleared away the boy was seen to be still whole, and triumphant with a fine live rabbit securely held in the sleeve of the overgrown coat.

What became of the crab is not known, but he probably lost no time in releasing himself from service as a light-house, and made himself as comfortable as circumstances would permit in the rabbit's deserted home.

POP-CORN.

TINY lumps of gold
 Rattling in the pan.
 Merry watch we keep;

Shake them all we can.
 See them, how they scatter,
 Leaping o'er the top!
 Pop, corn!

 Pop! pip! pop!

Dancing eyes that gleam,
 Rosy cheeks that glow;
 Here the joyful spring,
 All without the snow.
 See the milk-white blossoms,
 Everywhere they drop.
 Pop, corn!
 Pop, corn!

VIOLET.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

WE called her Violet for her eyes
(The very tint of April skies),
And for her little flower-like face,
So like a violet in its grace,
And for her looks so dainty sweet,
From golden head to rosy feet—
Dear treasure in Love's garden set,
Our heart's delight, our Violet.

And often as the violets shed
Their fragrance in the paths we tread,
Or when we find in deep, dim woods
The nodding of their azure hoods,
Or, wafted from a shady nook,
The violet odor bids us look,
And seek with groping fingers, fain
To clasp the precious prize again,
Well named we deem our household pet,
Our heart's delight, our Violet.

A pensive, musing creature she,
Though laughing oft in childish glee,
She coaxes fretting care away,
She brightens every clouded day;
The hasty word her kisses check,
With arms around her father's neck,
"My blessing," still her mother says,
"So sweet the child's caressing ways,
Oh, sad were life without our pet,
Our heart's delight, our Violet.

Though storms may rave and rains may fall,
Within our garden's sheltering wall
The violets bloom in sun and shade,
By chilling tempests undismayed,
And violets in the lonely wood
Have little care though winds are rude;
So timid, yet so fearless, still
Their message is of God's good-will,
Of God; shall we His grace forget
Who gave our home its Violet?

A CIGAR-BOX BANJO.

BY JOHN RICHARDS.

A CIGAR-BOX banjo is something which most boys have heard of, and some have attempted, with more or less success, to make. Possibly their older relatives have ridiculed the home-made instrument, and it has had to contend against prejudice, which, as we know, is almost fatal to success. Nevertheless such a banjo, if carefully made and properly strung, can be made to give forth very musical tones, and where the "real thing" cannot be had, the combination of cigar box and broomstick makes a good substitute. If you would like to try your hands at it, I will tell you how to go to work.

FIG. 1.

Procure a cigar box eight and a quarter inches long, four and three-quarter inches wide, and two and a quarter inches deep. This is the ordinary size of a box used to contain fifty cigars.

The bottom of the box forms the head of the banjo, thus allowing the cover to be opened or shut. In each end of the box cut two round holes, three-quarters of an inch in diameter, half an inch from the top and an equal distance from the two sides of the box.

With a lead-pencil mark off, on a piece of soft wood nineteen inches long, four inches wide, and half an inch thick, the shape of the handle, as shown in Fig. 1. Before sawing the handle out, the four key-holes should be bored, each hole being a quarter of an inch in diameter. Then shape the handle according to the outline of the diagram, and across the top of the handle cut a groove three-sixteenths of an inch wide and equally deep (A, Fig. 1); this is to hold a small bridge to keep the strings from touching the handle.

In the side of the handle drill a hole half an inch above the angle (B, Fig. 1)—this is to hold the fifth key; and just below the angle a groove three-sixteenths of an inch wide and equally deep should be cut for the purpose of holding a small bridge for the fifth string (C, Fig. 1).

From an old broom cut a piece of stick twenty-four inches long; whittle this flat on one side, and on the other side, eight inches from the end, cut the stick away so that it will slope and become flat at the end (Fig. 2). Eight and three-quarter inches of the other end of the stick must be cut away, so as to fit snugly the holes in the cigar box, the end projecting slightly. This broomstick is the backbone of the handle, which is fastened to it by two three-quarter-inch screws, as shown in Fig. 3.

Five keys shaped like Fig. 4 can be cut out of tough pieces of wood, each piece being half an inch thick, two and a quarter inches long, and one inch wide. Make those belonging to the key-board fit tightly in their holes. The key for the fifth string can be cut half an inch shorter than the others. Each key should have a hole bored through it, as shown in Fig. 4.

The small bridge is a piece of wood a quarter of an inch high and three-sixteenths of an inch wide, which is made to fit the groove (Fig. 1, A), with four notches cut in to conduct the strings. A similar bridge, with only one notch, and a quarter of an inch long, will answer for the fifth string.

The large bridge is made of a piece of wood two inches long, five-eighths of an inch wide, and a quarter of an inch thick. The shape of the bridge can be seen in the illustration of the finished banjo. Five notches an equal distance from each other should then be cut in the top edge of the bridge.

The tail-piece is the piece to which the strings are attached at the lower end of the instrument. It is made from a piece of hard wood an inch and a half long, an inch and a quarter wide, and a quarter of an inch thick. Five small holes an equal distance apart and a quarter of an inch from the end of the piece of wood must first be drilled, and through the small end two holes a quarter of an inch apart and three-eighths of an inch from the end should be drilled to allow a piece of wire about six inches in length to pass through them. A piece of tin an inch and a quarter long and three-quarters of an inch wide, bent so as to fit on the edge of the box, will be required. Strings can be purchased at almost any music store.

FIG. 4.

Having purchased the strings, begin to put the various parts together by fitting the handle through the holes in the cigar box and the small bridges in their respective grooves. The tail-piece is then fastened close to the end of the box by twisting the wire around the projecting piece of broomstick and staying it. Place the piece of bent tin on the edge of the box, under the wire holding the tail-piece, thus preventing the wire from damaging the box. Fit the keys in the key-board and the short key into the hole in the side of the handle. Knot the strings before threading them through the holes in the tail-piece. Before tightening the strings the last bridge is placed under the strings, two and a half inches from the end of the box, and your banjo is finished.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HORSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

THERE was no such feeling in Faith's heart or mind as she moved away. Somehow she meant to prove Jo's innocence, but just then it seemed hard to do it in the face of Ashfield's contemptuous pity and scarcely repressed satisfaction in the "exposure," as they called it, of "that little hypocrite," Jo Markham.

Jo stood in the doorway some time after Faith's figure was lost to view. The smell of the salt-marshes came up, mingled with the June flowers Miss Faith had planted in Jo's garden last year. Jo had learned to like it all—to like the mingling of spring odors with her garden scents; and now, as she stood there framing a resolve, she began in a vague way to wish she could at least remember all these things a long, long time.

As I have tried to make clear to you, there was nothing romantic, or sentimental, or even poetic about Jo; but something there surely was, strong and brave—something of a deep-heartedness which made her cling to what suggested the better, the purer influences of her life.

She did not return to the kitchen, but in a little while went up to her attic, and sat thinking—thinking and planning. One thing had become clear to the girl's mind: Miss Faith must not be bothered with her—must not be made ashamed of her; and then she remembered the sweet voice as it uttered those words, "Nobody would believe you, except Bertie and myself."

When the twilight fell, Jo moved about, and began with tremulous fingers to gather up a few of her belongings. Not a very large bundle was that which she made, for she would have to carry it, perhaps, many miles. She was at work in this way when she heard her grandfather go out, and at once she slipped down to the kitchen and hastily put up some bread and meat and cheese into a little parcel, which she carried back into her room, and then, before the darkness set in, she counted up the small amount of money she had saved—not quite two dollars, but to Jo it seemed a little fortune—and fastening it securely inside her dress, she sat down in the window of the attic, waiting for the last of the Sailors' Row people to go into their houses for the night.

Her grandfather did not return. Jo was glad of that. Eight, nine, and ten o'clock at last sounded. It was a peaceful night, clear and starlight, like the one before it. Jo was thankful it did not rain, as, taking up her little bundle, she went down-stairs and softly out of the house. There was no irresolution in her movements. The plan, rapidly as it had come to her, was too well laid for that. She turned her steps quickly in the direction of Ashfield Two Corners, which was a railway station three miles from the town.

Whether she had any regrets, further than the agonizing one of leaving Faith Emerson, Jo scarcely knew. Her one thought was to leave Ashfield, where she would only make Miss Faith ashamed—where nobody would believe her.

Sometimes, as she walked along the country road in the quiet summer night, the girl lifted her face to the heavens, with their wondrous jewels, and tried to feel that she was not alone—to remember all that for a year past Faith had been so tenderly impressing upon her. Her old vagabond life, its freedom from restraint or fear, stood her now in good stead, since she had no dread of the long, lonely walk, no thought of doing anything unusual. But feverishly excited as she was, Jo began to feel the effects of the last two days before her destination was reached. It was rather a weary, drooping figure that at last climbed the steps to the solitary-looking station, where the light of one kerosene lamp showed Jo that the place was entirely deserted. That some trains left there between midnight and morning she knew, and her plan had been to wait in the depot for the first one going out. It mattered nothing to Jo where she went, so long as it was away from Ashfield.

The ticket agent was not in his office, but Jo did not mind being alone in the little room. Putting her bundle on one of the benches, she lay down, using it for a pillow, afraid to sleep, and yet glad of even so poor a chance to rest.

Perhaps she dozed; at all events there seemed to come back to the girl some of the voices and sounds she had heard in the jail, and she roused herself with a start to find that she was not alone; three travellers had arrived; a stout, good-humored-looking woman, with a delicate baby in her arms and a little girl clinging to her skirts, was seated opposite the bench upon which Jo rested. It was evident that they had just come in, for the good-humored-looking woman was breathing quickly, and the baby had a suddenly roused or startled look, as though something unexpected had taken place.

The woman looked with friendly eyes upon the little wanderer opposite her, and almost directly entered into good-humored conversation, explaining to Jo in the course of the next five minutes that she had been spending a week at a station beyond the Corners, and was going now to her home some fifty miles distant. It flashed upon Jo immediately that she might as well go to the same place, but she would not buy a ticket, thought the girl, with the shrewdness born of her great anxiety lest thereby she might be traced.

One of Jo's few "faculties" was for "getting on," as the women in Sailors' Row called it, with children—children, that is, of her own class. The little rosy, chubby girl, clinging to its mother's gown, and regarding Jo with shy, half-laughing eyes, attracted her at once, and she involuntarily put out a hand beckoning the child over.

"Go, Rosy," said the mother, administering a little push; and looking at Jo, she added, "You're going all by yourself, are you?"

"Yes," responded Jo; and while a burning color came into her cheeks, she added, "I'm going to the same place you are."

"Well, now?" said the woman; "what for? To work, I s'pose, in the mills? Got any friends there?"

She asked these questions rapidly, but Jo had time for a moment's thought before she said, "Perhaps—no 'm, I haven't any friends there—goin' just to try my luck."

"Well!" ejaculated the woman again. By this time Jo had little Rosy on her lap, and the child and she were soon talking in low tones.

The ticket agent coming in, sleepy and cross, suddenly roused the woman's activity, and she was soon at the window buying her ticket and having a great deal to say about how long it would take to go to Burnham. Jo listened, saw that she paid one dollar and a quarter for her ticket, and then, putting the little girl down, she stole out upon the platform to await the coming of the train.

* Begun in No. 324, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"JO STOOD IN THE DOORWAY SOME TIME AFTER FAITH'S FIGURE WAS LOST TO VIEW."

CHAPTER XIII.

It was four o'clock when the shriek, the glare, the sudden sense of confusion, announced the arrival of the train. Jo followed her unknown companion into the car, and when they were seated she said, a little timidly, "Would you like me to hold the baby a little while? I'd just as lief."

"Well, there, now," was the answer; "I believe you may, for I declare it's been a regular chore carrying that child down and having Rosy hanging on too."

Jo liked holding the baby; somehow it took away much of the sense of loneliness and desolation she had felt to have the little creature in her arms; and seeing that she made the child comfortable, its mother put her head against the back of the seat and placidly fell asleep.

The conductor by some odd chance overlooked Jo when he came around for tickets, and she was too unused to travelling to understand it, so it came to pass that when at seven o'clock the train stopped at Burnham, in the midst of a thin drizzle of rain, she found herself still holding the baby, following her companion and little Rosy out on to the platform of the strange place.

"Where be you going to?" demanded the woman.

Jo's eyes were fastened wistfully on the broad, good-humored face before her.

"I've come here to look for work," she said, in a desperate sort of way; "an' I don't know where just yet."

"Well," she said at last, and briskly, "you want your breakfast, I guess, anyway, so you might as well come up to the store with me. There's the 'bus now."

And in a moment more the whole party were seated in a rickety old yellow stage on their way to the village.

The omnibus rattled up along a marshy road, where the water came clearly in view, to a village street of good dimensions, wide and well shaded by tall old trees, with breaks here and there where some houses with gardens of their own stood somewhat apart from the rest. Shops and one or two public buildings occupied the principal portion of the little street, and at angles roadways led in different directions. At the end of one of these lanes, as I might call them, a church with an old-fashioned steeple and a very old-looking grave-yard was standing on what seemed to be the brow of a hill.

It looked a pleasant place, Jo thought, watching her new surroundings with tired though interested gaze; but she was attracted chiefly by an old-fashioned brick house with a box-walked garden, where a maid-servant was busy scouring the front steps, and a bright-eyed old lady was looking out toward the sea.

The smoke of some factories dimmed the sky to the west of the village street, and as the stage turned down a side roadway, the quiet of the morning was broken in upon by the sound of their bells.

"Here we are," said Jo's new friend. "Now if I get out first, you can hand me the baby, and then Rosy."

The omnibus had pulled up rather suddenly in front of a small store of general articles, ribbons and laces and some simple dry-goods sharing the honors of the large bow-window with some old ladies' caps and infants' hoods. A side door led into the house, and Jo found herself in a small square hall, with a broad chubby-looking flight of stairs, and at the lower end a window.

"Come right along," said the woman; "I guess Rachel ain't up yet. Rachel's my eldest girl," she explained, leading the way into a room back of the store, which was a sort of general sitting-room, not overtidy, it must be admitted, but looking to Jo very comfortable and home-like, for there was a long window with a deep sill overlooking a little garden, a big, commodious sofa, besides an easy-chair or two, a sideboard full of china, and a table in the centre of the room, with some books and sewing materials on it.

Back of this, and reached by means of two steps, was the kitchen, into which Jo followed her hostess, still carrying the baby, who by this time was thoroughly fretful.

"There, now," said the mother, sinking into a chair. "I declare I b'lieve that child knows more'n you'd think. Kep' up without a sound till it got home, where it could cry comfortable."

Rosy evidently felt encouraged by this to try her own lungs, but an interruption luckily diverted her mind.

An old woman, with a thin, puckered, and woe-begone looking face, appeared in the doorway.

"Well, Mrs. Dawson," she said, in a very melancholy voice; "back, air you?"

"Yes, Mrs. Jones," was Mrs. Dawson's brisk response. "I am; and how've you and Rachel got on?"

"But poorly enough," was the reply. "Rachel's a sight worse than when you left."

Mrs. Dawson's good-humored expression faded at once to a look of genuine alarm.

"Worse? how?" she asked, sharply.

"Got a dreadful cold right on to her lungs," said Mrs. Jones, sitting down on the steps dejectedly. "I've been up the best part of the night with her, and I'm that tuckered out I must go home."

"Dear! dear!" exclaimed Mrs. Dawson, standing up in a helpless way. "Here, my dear," she continued to Jo, who had been trying to quiet Rosy, "do you take the baby while I have a look at Rachel. Yes, Mrs. Jones, go home and have a rest. I guess we'll get along."

Mrs. Dawson needed no second bidding, but rose, and mournfully putting on her hat and shawl, was soon on her way up the street, while Jo sat alone with the children in the little kitchen, wondering what was to happen next and where she should go. Her horror was of the jail—being put into it again, and a second time having no means of escape—while her heart-felt longing and desire was to keep away from "bothering" Miss Faith.

She looked about the kitchen, and longed to be able to remain there at least for a day or two. Perhaps if Mrs. Dawson knew how well she could cook, she would keep her a few days; and the children—she might do for them as well. Many thoughts floated past Jo's tired mind as she sat in the kitchen window, now talking in low tones to Rosy or the baby, now turning her eyes to the gay little garden outside, where flourished many things such as she had tended at home, in Miss Faith's garden as well as her own.

Ten minutes went by before Mrs. Dawson's step sounded in the corridor and through the little sitting-room, but she came in looking very much worried.

"I declare," she said at once, "I dunno what to do. Rachel's real sick—going to be laid up, I can see, with one of her regular colds; and there's breakfast to be got, and the children, and—dear me! dear me!" ended Mrs. Dawson, in genuine distress.

"Please, Mrs. Dawson," said Jo, "couldn't I get breakfast? I can cook very well. I'm older than I look," the girl added, a sudden wistful pleading coming into her face as she spoke. "I'm fifteen and more; I can mind the children too."

Mrs. Dawson seemed pleased. "Why, I dunno why you shouldn't," she said, more cheerfully, "if you can cook, and have a mind to try."

Five minutes later Jo was in possession of the kitchen, with bacon frying on the stove, coffee boiling, while the little cook's attention was divided between these and the children.

The baby was soothed by a bowl of bread and milk, and Rosy evidently enjoyed watching Jo's performances, having been promised a good breakfast presently.

AN INTERESTED AUDIENCE.

FROGS AND TOADS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

MOST of you perhaps already know that the funny little tadpoles in our ponds and ditches turn into frogs. Let us now notice the remarkable changes which take place before tadpoles can pass in this way from the life of a fish to that of a land animal.

We will begin with the eggs, which are little black specks not larger than shot, scattered through a lump of clear white jelly. This mass is called "frog spawn," and it is mostly attached to sticks or grass in the water near shore (Fig. 2). The jelly holds the eggs together that they may not drift away, and it also supplies nourishment to the young animals when first hatched.

If you should gather some of this frog spawn in the spring, and put it in a vessel of water with a few water plants, you will have good entertainment for several weeks. First the round black specks begin to lengthen, then soon to wriggle about. Gradually the jelly mass disappears, and the young tadpoles, with big black heads, dart hither and thither, rapidly wagging their long flat tails as they swim through the water—a sight with which all country children are familiar.

When they grow a little larger you can discover feathery bunches hanging at the sides of the head, as in Fig. 3, a. These are outside gills. After a time the wide mouth appears, and we find the tadpole trying to nibble at things. Little by little the outside gills shrink away, and the tadpole then breathes by taking water in at the mouth and allowing it to run out through slits in the neck. In this way the water passes over internal gills the same as in fishes. Indeed, there is but little, at this point in a tadpole's history, to distinguish it from a fish, and it bears a little resemblance to the form it is soon to develop.

Eyes and nostrils now make their appearance (Fig. 3, b), and soon two little lumps come on the sides, which will grow some day into hind legs (Fig. 3, c). The front legs do not show until later, and then the tadpole is well supplied with limbs, having four legs and a broad swimming tail, as you see in Fig. 3, d.

The odd creature will now be found spending much time at the surface, with its mouth out of water, for it is trying still another plan for breathing.

While these changes have been taking place on the outside of the animal, still more important changes have been going on within its body. Lungs have been growing, and as the tadpole accustoms itself to breathing with the new lungs, the blood gradually changes its course, and rushes to them to be purified, instead of going to the gills as before. Consequently the internal gills are no longer needed, and they also shrink away.

This active little creature now deserves the name of frog (Fig. 3, e). It swims with its new legs, and takes such long leaps that you must keep a close watch or it will jump out of your artificial pond and escape further observation. As the tail is no longer needed, it shrivels away little by little, like the gills, until there is no trace of it left.

Fig. 2.—FROG'S EGGS.

When they have reached this period, frogs, in their native home, are ready to hop boldly on shore, although most of their time is passed in the water, perched on some stick or stone. When cold weather comes, they drop to the bottom of the pond, and spend the winter in a torpid state.

Do you see in the frog's skeleton (Fig. 4) how much longer the hind legs are than the front ones? This arrangement answers very well for leaping, and those long toes are usually joined with a web to assist in swimming.

You will also notice that there are no ribs, so the frog cannot breathe as we do. Our ribs are raised each time we breathe, and the air rushes in through the nose and mouth to fill the empty space thus made in our chests. But as the frog has no ribs by which to enlarge its chest, it simply closes its lips and swallows the air which is in its mouth. A frog has no other way of breathing, and it is possible to suffocate one by fastening open its mouth.

The long tongue of these animals is fastened at the front of the mouth, and the sticky point is turned over so that it can dart forward instantly, then fold back to snap up living insects.

The history of toads is like that of frogs, except that their eggs are laid in long strings of jelly (Fig. 5), which may be found floating on ponds and ditches in the spring. As their young ones can live only in water, these animals lay their eggs either in the water or on trees and plants overhanging a pond, into which they are washed by the rain. Large numbers of toads thus come to perfection about the same time, and are ready to leave the water together and begin a new life upon the land. This they usually do after a shower, when all the surroundings are moist and attractive to these dwellers in the marshes, and, from the sudden appearance of the toads, it is a common belief that they have fallen from the clouds with the rain.

The Surinam toad has a remarkable way of caring for its young ones. The eggs are laid in the water, and the father at once takes them up and places them on the mother's back, when the skin rises up around them, forming a little cell for each egg. In these curious nests the tadpoles pass through their various changes, remaining here until they are perfect toads.

Leading this double life, first in the water, then on the land, frogs and toads are called amphibious animals. They start life with gills and a tail, both of which they lose, and gain in their places new lungs and a full set of legs.

DOLLIVER'S TRAVELS.

BY H. C. BUNNER.

THE school at Gilead Hill was known as a "health resort" when I went there as a boy, though they did not call it by that name. Thin, sickly boys were sent there to get flesh and strength in the mountain air, and they generally got what they came for.

Dieky Dolliver gave out that he had been sent to the school for the benefit of his health, and that was the only possible reason we could find for his being there, although no one ever discovered just what was or had been the matter with him. He said, vaguely, that he had just got over a long illness, and that he was "out of condition." What this meant we did not know, for he was fat, fatter than the fattest boy we had ever seen, and he never showed signs of any ailment worse than natural laziness.

This made us look upon Dolliver as a humbug—a "fraud," you boys would call it nowadays, but then we did not use the word in that sense. And in other ways he was unpopular. For one thing, he was only a day scholar, and for another, he was a stranger in the town. His father and mother were new-comers, a shabby, shiftless, mysterious pair, who lived at old Gorham's Gilead Road Inn. No one knew exactly who they were, or where they came from, or why they came at all. Even the towns-people, who were not above asking questions, could not find out what Mr. Dolliver's business was. He said that he "travelled," but while he made Gilead his headquarters, he was never known to travel further than to the cross-roads grocery, where he sat all day chewing a straw.

Then Dicky was queer, and you know what it is to be the one "queer" boy in a school of fifty. He was too absurdly fat and clumsy to join in our games, and we soon discovered that he had never done one of the many things that all boys do. He could not run, or climb, or pitch a ball, or swim, or make himself companionable in any way. I think he had some little talent for mumbly-peg, but he lacked the application to bring it out. Most of the time he sat in some comfortable place, with his hands on his knees like an old man, and stared solemnly at us while we amused ourselves.

You may think it strange that we had such a boy as that in the school, and missed the chance of "having some fun" with him. Well, the idea occurred to us at first, but we afterward gave it up as a bad one. A week after Dolliver's arrival, Jimmy Harris, who was the champion of the school, said that he was going to make the new boy toe the mark. He went up to Dolliver at recess and asked him if he wanted to fight. Dolliver looked at him with a wondering smile on his big, pale, flabby face, and replied that he didn't.

"You're a coward," said Harris.

Dolliver only looked more surprised, and said, No, he wasn't a coward.

Jimmy couldn't make him out. He thought perhaps the new boy wasn't accustomed to that style of challenge, and so he tried him in the old-fashioned way. He put a chip on his own shoulder, and invited Dicky to knock it off.

But Dolliver only shook his great head, and smiled faintly, and said he didn't want to knock the chip off Harris's shoulder.

We all hissed then, and Dolliver seemed to get some notion of what was expected of him.

"I don't want to hurt you, either," he added.

This was too much for the champion. "Hurt me!" he howled, and, without further warning, he struck Dolliver square on his broad, pasty cheek.

It did not stir the fat stranger. He might as well have struck a prize Berkshire pig. But it settled the fight. Dolliver stretched out his huge arms, put his fists together, and made a rush with a strength and nimbleness which no one would have thought possible from so unwieldy a creature. Harris had his guard up; but he and his right arm went down together, and in one instant Dolliver was sitting on him as he lay on the ground.

I think Dolliver meant to make him apologize; but Jimmy was past apologizing. The wind was knocked out of him, and he was half stunned by his fall. And when, after a minute of solemn silence, Dolliver rose and walked away, we had to work for half an hour to make our champion fit to appear at afternoon recitation.

Nobody tried to have any fun with Dolliver from that time on. We simply let him alone, and had as little to do with him as possible; and I don't think we could have taken a crueler way of ill-treating him, for he was anxious to be friendly with us all after his own queer fashion.

I can see him now, as I look back to those days, sitting under a dead apple-tree on the edge of our play-ground, his hands on his knees like a Mexican idol, staring hard at us as we played three-old-cat and foot-ball, and did all sorts of things that he might have done, I suppose, if he hadn't been so ridiculously fat.

The winter passed, and June came, and the boys went home for vacation, except the few who were left to "board over" through the summer. I was one of these—that year my father and mother went South, and I had to stay at Gilead Hill. It wasn't so bad, after all. There were eight of us, including Dolliver, who came up from the town every day to get the two hours' of summer schooling. We had most of the day to ourselves, and we got a pretty good time out of it—even Dolliver, for he had a chance to become more intimate with us than we had ever let him be before. Of course he couldn't really be one of us at base-ball, or anything of that sort, for he was growing fatter and fatter—he did not even walk to school, but travelled to and fro in the wagon that carried the mail between the school and Gilead Station. But he seemed to be perfectly content to hang around with us and listen to our conversation.

As September drew near we began to be a little troubled about this intimacy. We had an uneasy feeling that when the boys came back and found how fat and helpless Dicky had grown, they would make fun of him as they never had before; and we did not care about being too familiar with a boy who would be the guy of the whole school, so we felt quite relieved when Dicky came to us one day and told us he was going away "for good."

He looked rather sad about it, and at the same time he had an important air. We asked him where he was going, and he said, "Everywhere." He was going to travel through Canada, and would see the Heights of Abraham and Niagara Falls and the Suspension-Bridge. He was also going to Boston and to Buffalo and to Albany and to Chicago and to Philadelphia and to Selma, Alabama, and perhaps to the Rocky Mountains. These were not all the places he mentioned, either. We never before knew that Dicky remembered so many names out of the geography. We began to have a respect for Mr. Dolliver, since he was such a great traveller, and was so kind as to take his son everywhere with him.

Dicky Dolliver went away before school opened again. At parting he gave me a jack-knife—or rather he swapped it with me for a button, so that it might not cut friendship—and he promised to write to us all from Boston.

When the boys returned we told them of Dicky's plans, and I am sorry to say that we were laughed at. Jimmy Harris talked about "Dolliver's Travels," and we ourselves became convinced that our fat friend had been fooling us.

But he hadn't. Pretty soon came the letter from Boston. It began, "My dear school-mates," just as if he had been on the best terms with us all, and it went on in an old-fashioned way, telling us about Boston, and explaining that he had been too busy to go and see the wharf where the tea had been thrown into the water. Then came another letter, and still more and more; all through the winter they came. They were from the towns he had told us he should visit, and from many others—little places that we could not find on the school maps. All through Canada and the West Dolliver travelled, and once a week at least came a letter, generally with a picture of a hotel at the top of the sheet or on the envelope.

We all changed our opinion of Dicky Dolliver. We saw that he was a remarkable boy and an important person. He had done more than any one of us, and we were proud of him. We followed his course on the map, and talked over his descriptions of the cities he had passed through. When a new boy came to the school we took the first chance to mention the wonderful journey and to say, "Oh, you weren't here when Dicky Dolliver was here," and we felt ourselves superior to those who had not been personally acquainted with the great traveller of the school.

Another winter slipped away and another spring, bringing the end of the school year, and I went home that summer. Dicky's letters had begun to grow rare. He had been out to San Francisco, which was more of a journey than that it is now, and he was slowly getting eastward again by way of the Southern States. He seemed somehow to have lost his interest in writing. I don't think I heard from him once during the vacation; and when I went back to Gilead Hill for my last year I was thinking more of Cæsar and that mixed-up bridge of his than of Dicky Dolliver.

"DOLLIVER WAS SITTING ON HIM AS HE LAY ON THE GROUND."

If I remember rightly, it was the last week in September that the Senior Class was taken up to Hebron Corners, the county town, to see the Agricultural Fair, the great event of the year. We went with the teacher of mathematics—his name was Culpepper, but we always spoke of him as "Mattix." He was popular with the whole school, in spite of Euclid and the higher arithmetic, and he did his best to give us a good time. We saw the fat oxen and the fat pigs; we risked our legs riding on the new mowers and reapers; we took chances in the raffle for the prize quilt, which we didn't want in the least; and we saw Sheriff Gidley's Hambletonian colt trot a mile against time in 2.47½, which was a great thing to talk about in those days.

Then, of course, we wanted to go into the great tent outside the grounds and see the "Grand European Menagerie and Museum of Living Curiosities." "Mattix" hesitated a little; but he concluded that it might help us to understand natural history, and he paid for us himself, and marched us into the tent. We filed in rather quietly, somewhat dazed by the dim light and the queer creatures about us.

The living curiosities were in a long canvas hall, on a platform that stretched down one side. First, as we went along, was the Bearded Lady, then came the Senegambian Dwarf, then the Living Skeleton, and then, with a great painted sign over him, giving his name and his age and weight, Dicky Dolliver, the Champion Fat Boy of America.

He saw us almost as soon as we saw him, and he gave one wild howl, just like a little dog when a big one bites him, and he rose from his seat and put his hands before his face, and shuffled quickly off the platform behind a canvas curtain. A big man with a black mustache and shiny, curly black hair followed him, flourishing a little rattan cane. What happened behind the canvas curtain we never knew, for "Mattix" hurried us into the menagerie end of the tent; but we heard Dicky's crying until the tiger began to roar.

Half an hour afterward, when we passed through the "living curiosity" department on our way out, Dicky Dolliver was not on the platform; but Chippy Weems peeped in under the canvas curtain, and saw Dolliver there, sobbing hard, with his face hidden in his hands. Chippy also told us that there was a great black whip lying by Dicky's side, and that Dicky was "all over welts." But then nobody ever believed anything that Chippy Weems said.

A FAMOUS ICE CARNIVAL.

BY N. P. BARCOCK.

I AM sorry that every boy and girl in the United States could not have enjoyed at least a portion of the festivities of the Ice Carnival which recently took place in the city of St. Paul, Minnesota. There was so much to enjoy—such a “double wagon-load of fun,” as they used to say in Vermont—that it would have gone quite around among all the boys and girls in the country, with plenty to spare. You have but to look at the accompanying picture to get an idea of the jollity that prevailed up there in that thriving city of the Northwest for two weeks or more.

For several years the construction of a splendid Ice Palace has been one of the features of winter life in Montreal, and thousands of Americans have journeyed across the border to gaze upon those glistening but transitory castles. Just why nobody has ever before thought of erecting one on this side of the Canadian line I do not know, but I venture to predict that now that St. Paul has found out how much wholesome merriment may be obtained during a brief midwinter reign of King Carnival, the keys of that city will in the future be given annually to his Majesty.

The centre one of the group of pictures that are published on another page is, of course, the famous Ice Palace. I will not weary the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE with particulars as to its dimensions. It was, at all events, the biggest structure ever built of ice, so far as history recalls, in the world, and it was situated within a large snow-covered park, where, throughout the progress of the Carnival, all manner of sports and spectacles were constantly occurring by day and night. On the evening of February 4 this palace was the scene of a dreadful battle. All records of snow forts captured—of which every properly educated boy who has ever lived in a snowy country must have a score or more in his memory—were eclipsed by this furious affair. You see, the Ice King, or King Borealis, as he was called, had taken possession of the palace, and was preparing to make a merry night of it within, when his powerful enemy, the Fire King, approached and demanded the castle's surrender.

The streets were alive with people, who laughed and chattered in the frosty night air until you'd have thought the whole town had gone mad, or that all the grown people had become children again. The great walls of the palace loomed up in the darkness like walls of granite on a moonlight night, but all was quiet within. Twice around the silent castle marched the army of the Fire King, pausing at each of the four gates, and demanding in loud tones the surrender of King Borealis. I don't mind telling you in a whisper that the soldiers of the Fire King were no soldiers at all, but only a great multitude of respectable gentlemen dressed in blanket suits of many colors, and belonging to various snow-shoe and toboggan clubs of Minnesota and the Northwest; and the forces of the Ice King were made up pretty much in the same way. But they looked none the less warlike and magnificent, and everybody was delighted and excited, just as you would have been had you been there.

King Borealis refused to surrender, whereupon there arose from the ranks of the attacking party such a volley of rockets and fiery explosives that you would have thought a thousand men were killed at least, and the light of which turned the snow-covered park into a field of silver, and made the beautiful Ice Palace stand out like a ghostly thing against the dark background of the winter sky. The next instant came the answering volley from the Ice King's forces. From every window and port-hole streamed out the hissing rockets and popping balls of light from furiously shaken Roman candles, and up over the walls of the palace went huge canisters, which, exploding in the air, sent showers of blue and purple drops of fire falling upon the heedless heads of the combatants.

A very good friend of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was one of the gallant soldiers engaged in the defence of the palace, and I am sure that his experience, as he tells it, will be read with interest. “I am a Wakouta,” he writes, meaning that he is a member of the Wakouta Snow-shoe Club, “and we muster one hundred and sixty strong. Our uniforms are white and blue blanket coat and knee breeches, red and blue sash and toque, blue stockings and moccasins. Last night we were put in defence of the Ice Castle, with several other clubs. The attacking party surrounded us, and fired off their candles and crackers in great quantities, and we responded from the inside and outside with like volleys. It was while standing under the walls of the castle during the mighty onslaught, with a squad of others, fighting bravely for the defence of the Ice King, that I received a serious wound. A canister which had been thrown into the air two or three hundred feet, and had exploded and discharged its display of colored lights, fell on me, and cut an ugly gash in my forehead, knocking me down, but not senseless. Fortunately my regular physician, who is one of the club, stood next to me, and bound up my forehead, and I was soon all right again.” I am glad to tell you that this unpleasant experience was not the lot of many who were engaged in the battle, for the whole affair, as did everything else connected with the Carnival, passed off successfully, and with scarcely an accident.

After a truce had been declared between King Borealis and the Fire-King, there was a triumphal procession of their united forces. Indeed, it was a week of processions, and although he has doubtless done the best that could be done, the artist in the accompanying pictures gives you but a faint idea of the splendor of all these Carnival parades. The parade of the toboggan clubs alone was a sight to do one's eyes good. Nobody pretends to know how many clubs were represented, but the whole city swarmed with men and women and children wearing toboggan uniforms, and the mingling of white, blue, red, orange, and black produced a continuous rainbow effect.

Several large toboggan slides were built, the most important one being represented in the picture; and here's a fact for boys to wonder at: the Aldermen of the city actually ordered several of the cross streets to be closed to travel during the Carnival in order that the tobogganers might have a longer and uninterrupted slide. What does my little friend who was recently chased home by a big policeman for daring to slide down the slanting block in front of his father's house think about that?

The inhabitants, as will be seen by the picture, even went so far as to play base-ball on snow-shoes, although it must be confessed they did not make out very well at it. Even the Indians of the Northwest caught the fever of the Carnival, and came with their squaws into St. Paul in great numbers, and pitched their tents or tepees in the grounds belonging to the Ice Palace. They had with them a quantity of dogs broken to harness, and a number of curious little sleds to which the dogs were hitched, and in which passengers were given a dog sleigh-ride at a moderate price.

With all the rest of the merry things, there were, of course, masquerade and fancy-dress balls and skating parties and jolly gatherings at the rooms of the several snow-shoe and toboggan clubs of the city, with now and then an initiation of a new member, just as you see it in the person of that frightened young man who is being tossed into the air from a blanket. All through the city too, during the Carnival, were exhibited, wherever there were suitable sites, wonderful pieces of ice statuary, like that of the mounted Indian and the buffalo shown in the illustration, and which is so good that it is sad to think it has before this, in all probability, like the brief reign of King Borealis, melted away.

BY HOWARD PYLE.

THERE was a wood-chopper, and he had a son who went to the great school at the capital, and there he studied and studied until he became the cleverest student in all the world. So when the student had finished his studies, and had come back home again, he began talking to his father as sweetly as though his tongue was tipped with silver. See, now, why should they waste time in doing nothing better than chopping wood? He would practise his Black-Art. He would change himself into a fine dapple-gray horse, and the wood-chopper should take him to town and sell him for fifty dollars.

"But there is one thing you must remember," said he, "and that is to take the bridle off of me when you sell me, for as long as it is on me I must remain a horse. The great Master of Black-Arts would like nothing better than to catch me in such a trap as that, for his books say that he is to have bad luck through me, and he has been after me for this many a day."

Then the Clever Student went around back of the house and changed himself into a fine dapple-gray horse. The wood-chopper slipped a bridle over his nose, and then off they started for the town, both of them.

Well, they went on, and on, and on, till they had come to where two roads crossed, and there stood one who looked no better than he should be. This was the great Master of Black-Arts himself; but of that the wood-chopper knew no more than the chick in the shell.

"That is a fine horse that you have there," said the Master of Black-Arts. Would the wood-chopper strike a bargain?

Yes, indeed! The wood-chopper had no two minds as to that. But there was one thing, and that was, he would not sell the bridle along with the horse.

At this the Master of Black-Arts grinned till he showed his teeth like a fox in frosty weather, and what should he do but draw a bridle out of his pocket. It was as thin as a wire and as light as silk; yet I tell you the truth when I say that if he had ever gotten it over the nose of the Clever Student it would have been an ill thing for him.

But the Student had his eyes open, I can tell you. No sooner had his father taken the bridle off of him than whisk! pop! he changed himself into a pigeon, and away he flew till the wind whistled behind him.

But the Master of Black-Arts knew a trick as good as that. Whisk! pop! and he became a hawk, and away he flew after the pigeon, and all that the wood-chopper could do was to stand and look after them. But he had the fifty dollars in his pocket, and that was much to say.

On and on they flew till they came to the shores of a great sea. And that was a good thing for the Clever Student, for just as the Master was about to lay claws on him, he dropped to the water and became a fish, and away he swam.

But the Master of Black-Arts knew a trick as good as that, too—that he did. Down to the water he dropped and became a pike, and after the other he swam till the water boiled behind him.

On and on they swam till they came to a place where a beautiful Princess, as white and as red as milk and blood, was walking along beside the shore gathering pretty shells into a little basket. And that was a good thing for the Clever Student, for just as the Master of Black-Arts was about to catch him, he changed himself into a ruby ring, and jumped out of the sea and into the basket of the Princess, and there he was safe and sound.

Presently the Princess looked down into the basket, and there lay the ring. "Bless me," said she, "what a pretty ring! And how came it here!" She picked it up and slipped it on, and it fitted her finger exactly. As for the Clever Student, he liked to be there, I can tell you.

Well, by-and-by the Princess had gathered all of the shells that she wanted, and then she went home.

When she had come there and to her own little room, you can guess how she opened her eyes when a tall, good-looking young fellow stood before her all of a sudden. That was the Clever Student who had changed himself back into his own true shape again. At first the Princess was ever so frightened, but the Student talked to her, and talked so pleasantly that she began after a while to think that she had never seen such a nice, clever young fellow.

But the Master of Black-Arts was not for giving up all at once, and for letting the scholar alone. No, indeed! not he! he was far from being at the end of his tricks yet. But then if his wits were clever, the Student was not lacking either.

"See, now," said he to the Princess, "the Master of Black-Arts will be coming after me before long. When he comes he will be asking for the ruby ring, and he must have it, but I have a trick in my head to meet that."

So what did he do but cut off a lock of his hair, and then prick his arm till it bled. With the blood he wet the hair, and by his arts made of the lock just such a ruby ring as he had been himself, for it was so like that even the Princess herself could not have told the difference. After that he turned himself into a necklace of carbuncles, and the Princess liked it just as much as the ring.

Sure enough, before a great while the Master of Black-Arts came to the King's palace, and on his arm he carried a basket, and in it was a little black hen. He stood the little black hen on the table. "Hickety-pickety!" said

Bless me! but the King was glad to have such a hen as that. If the Master wanted anything, he had only to ask for it, and it was as good as his.

Oh! the Master of Black-Arts did not want anything but a little ruby ring that he had taken a fancy to; if he might have that, it would be all that he would ask for.

So the pretty Princess was sent for, and the King asked her if she would give the Master of Black-Arts the ruby ring that she wore.

Oh yes; the Princess said that the Master might have that, for she had grown tired of it long ago. So she gave it to him, and off he went the way that he had come.

As soon as he had reached home he put the ring into a mortar and ground it up, and ground it up, until it was ground as fine as flour in the mill.

"There!" said he to himself, "that is an end of the Clever Student, at any rate."

After that he went back to his books again, and began to read them, and then he soon found how he had been tricked by the Clever Student.

The Princess and the Clever Student were sitting together. "See, now," said the Student, "the Master of Black-Arts will be coming this way again in a little while. He will be wanting the necklace of carbuncles, and you will have to let him have it. But I have a trick for his trick yet, so we shall get the better of him in the end."

So the Clever Student did as he had done before. He pricked his arm till it bled, and with the blood he wet a lock of his hair. Then he changed the lock of hair into just such a necklace of carbuncles as he himself had been. After that he changed himself into a pearl ear-drop, and the Princess hung him in her ear, and there he dangled.

Sure enough, by-and-by came along the Master of Black-Arts with another basket. Up he came to the King, and then he opened his basket, and in it was a white drake. He stood the drake on the table, and said, "Spickety-lickety!"

"Quack! quack!" said the drake; and every time it said "quack," a gold piece dropped from his mouth.

Hui! if the King was pleased with the little black hen, you can guess how glad he was to have such a drake as that! Just let the Master of Black-Arts ask, and he might have whatever the King had to give. Oh! it was not much that the Master of Black-Arts wanted. The Princess had a necklace of carbuncles that he had taken a fancy to; if the King would let him have that, it would satisfy him. So the Princess was sent for without waiting any longer.

Would she let the Master have the necklace of carbuncles that she wore around her neck?

Yes, indeed, that she would! She had grown tired of it long ago. So she took it off of her neck and gave it to the Master of Black-Arts, and off he went with it.

Well, when he got home he put it into the mortar and ground it up, and ground it up, until it was as fine as the dust on the shelf. "There!" he thought, "that is an end of the Clever Student, at any rate."

Then he went back to his books, and it was not long before he found that he had been tricked again.

"See, now," said the Student to the Princess, "the Master of Black-Arts will be along again presently, and now I can make no more changes, for I am nearly at the end of my arts. He will be wanting your ear-drop when he comes, but instead of giving it to him, throw it against the wall as hard as you can. After that we shall have to trust to good Mother Luck."

Yes; the Student was right again, for it was not long before the Master of Black-Arts came along with his basket on his arm. Up he went to the King; he opened the basket, and there was a gray goose. He stood the gray goose on the table. "Flickety-whiekety!" said he. "Cackle! cackle!" said the gray goose; and every time it said "cackle" a bright diamond dropped on the table.

When the King saw that, he rubbed his hands, and rubbed his hands, and could not say enough of thanks to the Master of Black-Arts. And what would the Master have now? He had only to ask, and it was his.

Oh! it was little that the Master was wanting this time, either. The Princess had a pearl ear-drop that he had taken a liking to; if the King would let him have that, he would be quite satisfied.

So the Princess was sent for, and this time she was not so willing to let the Master have what he wanted. She wept and begged, and begged and wept; but it was all for no good. The Master of Black-Arts wanted the pearl ear-drop, and the Master of Black-Arts must have it. That was what the King said. So at last the Princess took the pearl ear-drop out of her ear, but instead of giving it to the Master, she threw it against the wall as hard as she was able, just as the Clever Student had told her to do.

And then, what do you think happened? Why, the Student turned himself into a ripe melon, so that when it struck the wall, it burst open, and the seeds that were inside were scattered all over the floor.

But the Master of Black-Arts knew a trick as good as that. He changed himself into a great red cock, and began pecking away at the seeds, and gobbling them up as fast as he could.

By and by he looked around, and not another seed could he see, whereupon he hopped up on a chair, and shutting his eyes and flapping his wings, he cried, "Cock-a-doodle-doo!"

But listen! one melon seed had rolled into a crack in the floor, and the cock had not seen it. That was a bad thing for him, for while his eyes were shut and he was crowing "Cock-a-doodle-doo," the wise Student changed himself from the melon seed into a great fox. Up he jumped, Snip! snap! and off flew the cock's head, and there was an end of it and of the Master of Black-Arts.

After that the Student turned himself into his own true shape again. Then he and the Princess told the King all about the business, and when the King saw how fond the Princess was of the lad, he said that there was only one thing to be done, and that was to call in the minister.

After the wedding was all over, the Clever Student set out for his father's house.

The fagot-maker went back with his son to the fine house that the lad lived in, now that he had married a Princess. There everything was made easy for him, and he always had a warm corner to sit in back of the stove.

"OH, MAMMA, THERE'S A LIVE PEN-WIPER!"

A DISAPPOINTED SPIDER

BY HARRY BOLINGBROKE.

SPIDERS have few friends or admirers, most people, indeed, regarding them with intense loathing and horror. And yet as a general thing spiders are harmless, timid creatures, and quite as anxious to get out of your way as you may be to get out of theirs.

Though obliged to class myself among the number of those to whom the spider is a repulsive object, I can seldom come upon an exceptionally large specimen without pausing to regard him, and snatch a fearful joy by giving him a little annoyance.

The fat garden spider that weaves great nets in the angles of balconies and fences always had a fascination for me, not only on account of his skill and industry, and his trick of making himself invisible by rapid vibration when molested, but by reason of his tiger-like beauty, which, of course, I admire at a distance.

I remember one such which had his net in an angle underneath my chamber window, where I could easily observe his manoeuvres. One quiet, sultry afternoon, while drowsily watching my companion, the spider, which appeared to be taking a nap in the centre of his web, an enormous crane-fly came sailing lazily along, and blundered right in among the glittering meshes, where her long legs soon became hopelessly entangled.

The spider did not immediately pounce upon the intruder, but seemed to be leisurely rubbing the sleep out of his eyes and stretching himself before going to work, as though feeling so sure of his game that there was not the slightest need of hurry on his part.

"Don't be too confident, old fellow," I said; "you may be mistaken." For I saw that the fly, in her struggles, had already succeeded in releasing several of her legs, and she might free them all in a few seconds more, and so escape.

Presto! I did not see the spider move; I only saw that he had vanished from the centre of the web, and was now near its edge, throwing a viscid web around the legs of the crane-fly. The action was so swift that it seemed no part of a second; it was instantaneous. He could not have been asleep, after all.

"Ah! poor crane-fly, you are gone now," I exclaimed. There was no hope for her. Her six legs were bound together, but her body was yet free, and her wings, by which the fly tried in vain to extricate herself.

In the mean time the spider glided up the web to his dark corner, where he attached the other end of the rope that held the captive. During his absence a strange thing happened; the fly made several wriggles, and then one mighty wrench, which gave her her liberty, but at the sacrifice of all her legs. Yes, there they were, all in the net, but the fly was gone.

Instantly down shot the spider. He looked amazed and crest-fallen. He had evidently never been served such a trick before. He looked at the useless bunch of limbs a second or two, touched them, tasted them, and then, in a disgusted manner, cut them adrift as rubbish. This done, he retreated, not to his original position in the centre of his web, but away up in his dark corner, as if to hide his disappointment. He evidently was conscious that, for once in his life, he had been completely outwitted.

A SIMPLE POSTAL-CARD CIPHER.

BY XENOS CLARK.

THE use of perforated cards for writing secret messages is very old, having been described by a German in the eighteenth century. But his cards and the holes in them were square; and though the same cards have recently been arranged for writing cipher telegraph messages, they still remain square cards. In fact, no one before has discovered how to make an oblong cipher card, with oblong openings, such as could be used for writing a message on a postal card.

The plan for making a cipher-writer is shown in Fig. 1. Cut out of Bristol-board that is somewhat thicker than a postal a piece exactly the same size as a postal card. Next draw the divisions of the card as shown in the figure. There are five upright lines exactly the same distance apart, and eleven horizontal lines, which also must be exactly the same distance apart. This divides the card in six equal upright columns and twelve equal horizontal rows. The middle lines, both ways, being heavier, divide the card in quarters.

You may now letter the seventy-two divisions just as they are lettered in the figure, and then the card is ready for cutting out the holes. For this a sharp-pointed knife will be required. Use a rule to guide the knife, and in cutting out any of the seventy-two divisions—or "boxes," as I shall call them—follow carefully the lines that enclose them.

The following rule must be observed in cutting out the boxes. You will notice that each letter from a to r occurs four times in the lay-out. The rule is to cut out one of each, leaving the other three of the same letter uncut. Thus you cut out one a box, then one b box, then one c box, up to r. There will then be eighteen oblong holes in the cipher card. The holes will have a great variety of arrangements on different cards, as different persons will make different selections of boxes for cutting. The rule that has been given permits each letter to be cut in four different ways. It does not matter which one of the four boxes of any letter you may cut, provided care be taken to distribute the holes so that the card will not be too much cut up in any one part, and so be liable to be torn. The black spaces in Fig. 2 are the boxes that have been cut out.

The cipher card is now ready for use. Mark the top and bottom of one side A and B, as in the figure; then turn the card over, and mark the top and bottom of the other side C and D. Any one of these edges, A, B, C, and D, may be brought uppermost. Fit the cipher card exactly over the postal, first with edge A at the top. Begin writing your message, a word at each hole, as the holes now stand, taking each horizontal line in order from left to right, and finishing each line before beginning the next. Thus the first word of the message would be written in the right-hand top corner of Fig. 2, but the blank space under and adjoining it would not be written in until you came to the fourth word of your message. Having filled all the holes, turn the card, bringing edge B to the top. Continue your message, as before, in the holes, which will now stand over blank spaces of the postal. Some lines may have but one or two holes. When all are filled, turn the card over, and bring edge C to the top, and proceed as before, and at last do the same with edge D. If the message is ended before all the holes in all positions are used, fill up the blank ones with any chance words. This done, the postal is filled with the message in the most irregular order, to which only the owner of the cipher card has the key.

Of course the other correspondent has been provided with an exact copy of the cipher card, and he reads the message simply by placing this card over the postal, first with edge A at the top, then B, then C, then D. This gives him the words in the order in which they were written.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHEN Mrs. Dawson came down-stairs again she found the table laid, and quite a tempting though simple breakfast awaiting her, and as she seated herself and asked Jo to "draw up her chair," she complimented her on her "smartness."

"You say you want a place, do you?" Mrs. Dawson remarked, presently. "Well, I should think you could get it. Have you any family up to the Corners, or friends?"

Jo hesitated, but her glance, fixed on Mrs. Dawson, was honest and clear. "I haven't anybody in particular," she said, in a sad tone; "I'm an orphan, you see, and grandfather he's very old and feeble."

A long time after this Mrs. Dawson used to say she wondered how it was she never thought of asking Jo further questions as to references, or anything of the kind, such as she would have felt necessary with a Burnham girl who applied for work. But then, as she would explain, Rachel's being so sick, and Dawson not home from Newfoundland, and the baby cross, and the store to look after—all these things unsettled her, and Jo seemed to "fall right in and take a hold."

* Begun in No. 324, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Why Jo did "take a hold" was later a source of wonder to the girl herself. But you see, in reality, it was her first emergency, the first sharp test of the powers Faith and she together had been developing; with all her heart she longed to hide herself and work her way, and when Mrs. Dawson suggested her "staying right on till she got a place," the girl breathed freely, and thanked her new friend with humble gratitude. The thought of Ashfield, the memory of that terrible night, had grown dreadful to her; she was glad to be where no one would ask questions, nobody talk to her of those last days at home; and, luckily for her, Mrs. Dawson was likely, for some time to come, to be too much absorbed in her own affairs to trouble herself about Jo's.

"I declare to mercy," ejaculated Jo's hostess, suddenly, that morning, "if I ain't forgot to ask your name!"

Jo was washing the dishes. Her back was turned to Mrs. Dawson, and she had time for a moment's thought before answering. Jo knew what no one else in Ashfield did, and what never had seemed of the least consequence before, that her real name was Brooke, and not Markham, the old man being her mother's father; but Sailors' Row had not time to make such useless distinctions. As "Markham's girl" Jo had grown up, and as "Jo Markham" she had been quite satisfied to be known.

But now suddenly the girl realized that her real name would be of service. Josephine Mary Brooke she had been christened fifteen years ago. Blessed chance that had put Mary into the name of the little baby who had—though she knew it not—been for one year welcome, well treated, and well cared for! Her name had been, as I say, of no consequence to her whatever, although she had seen it scores of times written in the old Bible which her grandfather kept in the upper drawer of the kitchen dresser. It was her mother's name, and in a pretty school-girlish hand it had been written on the fly-leaf—"Josephine Mary Brooke."

"Everything's so upset," Mrs. Dawson continued, stirring the gruel for her sick daughter, "I never thought to ask you—"

"My name?" said Jo, faintly; "Mary Brooke, ma'am." "Brooke or Brooks?" said Mrs. Dawson, sharply. "Brooks is a deal easier to say; comes sort of more natural; but still Mary's a handy enough name too, when you once get it. I do hate these names that takes your time all up, and leave nothing for what you've got to say afterward. There's Dawson—he's Zachariah. Well, I declare to January, by the time I've got it out full, as I do sometimes—the hull Zachariah—he's up and away out of the front door, and like as not, when he comes in again, I've clear forgot what I meant to follow it up with. So, as a general thing, it's 'Zack' or 'Dawson' when there's somethin' pressin' on me to say. I named that there baby Jo just for no other reason in the world than to save trouble when she was a-growin' up. 'Tain't Josephine nor Joanna; no, Jo; nothin' only just Jo. She kin settle on to something for herself when she's older, if she likes, and has friends with time enough to give her a full, long-legged, spelled-out name."

Jo—our Jo—had not half listened to Mrs. Dawson's long speech until the latter part. Jo! There was another one, then? She looked at the baby, who, tied in his high chair, was banging the table with a spoon, enjoyably, feeling a sudden affection for her unconscious little namesake. It seemed queer to think of, too—as though she had given her name away to the baby all in that minute. Jo, who had depths of real womanliness in her untried nature, wiped one hand on her apron, and putting it out, stroked the baby's curly hair with more tenderness than she had ever displayed before.

"I should like to stay," she said to Mrs. Dawson; "and I'd work real hard, too, and I could look around for something to do in a day or two, I suppose, ma'am?"

"Oh, we'll see," said Mrs. Dawson, whose mother's eye had not failed to note the girl's involuntary caress—"we'll see how you get on. There—store!" she added, as a bell tinkled; "just run out and see what's wanted, my dear."

Jo hastened to the store, feeling her way through boxes and odds and ends to the passage behind the counter.

The bright-eyed old lady from the brick house was the customer.

"Mrs. Dawson home?" she inquired, briskly.

"Yes, 'm," answered Jo.

"Well, you ask her to be sure and not fail me with my cap this afternoon by half past five—not a minute later."

"That's old Mis' Burton," said Mrs. Dawson, when Jo had delivered the message. "I'm sure I hope I'll get a minute to finish her cap. Now, Mary," she added, "I'll leave you to see to the things here, and go back to Rachel."

CHAPTER XV.

Jo certainly "earned her way" that long June day; but her cooking was a decided success, and she was so on the alert to be of use to Mrs. Dawson that she proved very satisfactory in more ways than one. The habits of order and tidiness she had acquired under Faith's constant teaching came into excellent service here, for Mrs. Dawson, good-natured, kind-hearted, and always active, was not a very methodical housekeeper, although she fully appreciated what was done for her by others, and when Jo "picked up" and brushed the little sitting room, Mrs. Dawson declared it looked "something like," which she hadn't supposed it would until Rachel was around again.

The morbid, wretched fancies which had filled Jo's mind since the night in the jail seemed less hard to bear as the day, full of home-like occupations, wore on; and Jo, after all, was young and naturally strong, and the entire change was not unwelcome to her.

Mrs. Dawson had contrived to put the necessary touches to Mrs. Burton's cap, but when it came time to send it she could not leave the house, and so Jo was despatched with the little bandbox, glad enough to walk out in the summer afternoon, and glad, she knew not why, to see the brick house.

Once there, she was ushered into a large, dim sitting-room, where everything looked cool and pleasant, though very prim, and as though only elderly people occupied it; but Mrs. Burton came in briskly, putting back a curtain and examining the cap critically, while she looked at Jo once or twice with an inquiring air.

"You're new, ain't you, up there, my dear?" she said.

Jo said, "Yes, 'm," and then was silent.

"Going to learn millinery, are you?"

Jo said "No, 'm," this time, and again was silent. The old lady seemed rather irritated by the short answers, but Jo's fear of discovery, of being "taken back," held her tongue in such check that Mrs. Burton, who took a keen interest in everything going on all around her, failed to extract anything more satisfactory from the stranger; but her last attempt had a certain result gratifying to Jo.

"I suppose you have given up school, my dear," said the old lady, in a kindly voice, "if you are out at work?"

Jo blushed as she admitted this to be the case.

"Well, perhaps you would like to attend a little evening school up at the parsonage three times a week?"

Jo's eyes kindled. The old lady, catching the gleam, felt quite encouraged, and as at that moment a gentleman's step was heard in the hall, she called out,

W. T. SHEPHERD
1880

"SHE STROKED THE BABY'S CURLY HAIR WITH MORE TENDERNESS THAN SHE HAD EVER BEFORE DISPLAYED."

"Dyke, come in here, please, a moment."

And a tall, broad-shouldered, middle-aged man, with a face grave and kindly, good-humored and yet firm in its lines, stood still on the threshold of the door.

"Dyke," continued the old lady, "this young girl's a stranger here, working up at Mrs. Dawson's, and I've just been telling her about Mr. Tone's evening classes. What do you think?"

Mr. Dyke Burton smiled with a little gleam of amusement. He knew his mother's faculty for interesting herself in everybody else's affairs, but as she always meant it kindly, and was full of generous actions, he never tried to do more than hold her in judicious check once in a while when her impulses or her curiosity led her too far.

He looked at Jo. "Something in the girl's face appealed to him strongly, for it was not possible for Jo to hide the sadness, the anxiety, that lay so deeply in her heart; and her eyes, always wistful of late, were fixed upon him with a look which, for some reason, Mr. Burton never forgot.

"I'm sure it would please Mr. Tone to have a new pupil," he said, pleasantly. "What is the name, mother?"

"There was a moment's silence before Jo said, with a deepened color, "Mary Brooke, sir."

"I will not forget to mention it," said Mr. Burton, smiling and passing on.

Jo went out of the brick house feeling as though she was beginning a new sort of life. I do not think, until this sudden wrenching away from all her old associations had sharpened her mind and developed some new feelings, that Jo had realized what it was to have to act and think and decide for herself, and with a sense of duty as well as of patience governing her. I have told you that the year with Faith had been like five in its power over the girl's life, and in such natures and such lives as poor Jo's it is not possible to drift when once the tide changes. The new ideas impressed gradually upon Jo's mind and heart and soul took a firmer hold upon her than if she had been living in luxury and ease, where one day seemed just to melt delightfully into another. The realities of life with people like Jo make this easy sort of growth impossible.

All the scents and fragrances of the June day seemed to be in the village street as Jo walked back to Mrs. Dawson's. She wondered where Miss Faith was, and what she would think of her flight.

"She will be glad, I guess," thought Jo, as she neared the store; "and she'll know I'm 'trying' somewhere."

Mrs. Dawson greeted Jo from behind the counter of the store with a look of real satisfaction.

"I declare," she said, good humoredly, "I had no idea how I needed help, Mary. I'm as glad as I can be to see you back. The baby's asleep, but I wish you'd carry Rachel's tea up to her. You can tell her anything that happened up to Miss' Burton's, too; it'll amuse her. She and Miss' Burton are great friends. They about keep the news of Burnham agoing. I tell 'em."

The tray was ready, and Jo, following Mrs. Dawson's directions, carried it carefully up the staircase to a room at the back of the house—a comfortable, cozy bedroom with a pleasant outlook, where, in a big old-fashioned bedstead, the sick girl was lying, propped up by pillows.

She was a girl of about Jo's age, but very plump and rosy in spite of her cold; her bright blue eyes were cheery, and her smile brought dimples and showed the prettiest of white teeth; her fair hair was neatly braided, and she wore a tidy little blue flannel dressing gown, in which she looked very trim and comfortable.

Everything in the room, though plain, was cozy, and if lacking all the luxuries of Miss Faith's apartment, yet it was home-like and very pleasing to look upon, from the bright young girl among her pillows to the little knick-knacks on the bureau and above the book rack. There was no regular carpet on the floor, only some gay-colored strips at the bedside and before the bureau; but what impressed Jo as she stood still a moment in the doorway was the fact that up here in Rachel's room the order and tidiness lacking down-stairs was complete. No wonder Mrs. Dawson was anxious for Rachel to be "up and about."

"Come in," said Rachel, cheerfully. "You are Mary Brooks, I suppose; mother told me about you."

She looked at Jo brightly and pleasantly. "I shall be up soon, I hope, and get things straight down-stairs. I suppose everything is at sixes and sevens, isn't it? And do the children bother much? There, put the tray on the bed, please. Thank you."

Rachel had the brightest sort of voice, so that Jo did not mind being asked so many questions, or talked to so steadily, and Rachel seemed to need no particular response. She went right on:

"You've been up with Mrs. Burton's cap. I was so sorry not to be able to take it! She always has something new to tell me. Did you see Mr. Dyke Burton?"

She waited here till Jo said "Yes," and then went on: "He's the best man in Burnham. He has the woollen mills across the bridge, and if you want a place, you'd better go to him."

"Oh, would he give me a place?" said Jo, earnestly. "Well, I think so," answered Rachel. "If I am up to-morrow I'll go and see him about it."

But all of Rachel's eagerness to be "about again," all her energy and ambition, did not avail. That night Jo was awakened from her first sleep in the little attic room given her by Mrs. Dawson, who was in a state of terror over her daughter's condition. Fever had set in; the poor woman was sure it was "monia," and Jo was hurried down to light the kitchen fire while Mrs. Dawson rushed for the doctor.

And so it came about that for weeks no thought of Jo's leaving occurred to Mrs. Dawson. Quiet, but prompt and active, the girl filled all sorts of little "odd and even" places in the household; too anxious to remain somewhere in peace and security to care what she did, how early or late she toiled, or to think of the future, and in no place or way could she have been more successfully hidden. In Mrs. Dawson's employ, Jo Markham, transformed into Mary Brooks, passed out of sight or hearing of Ashfield. No one but the girl herself knew how sometimes lying awake at night, or when, on rare occasions, she got down to the beach, a sudden longing to see the old place—to be near Faith again, if only for five minutes—would come over her; but the dogged resolution "not to bother her," and to try somewhere to be good and to work, kept this feeling in check. There was no fear so long as the sky of her life continued clear that Jo would go back; no fear that she would be a "bother" to any one of those she had left.

A LITTLE QUEEN OF HEARTS.

CANARY HOUSEKEEPING.

BY LILLIE E. BARR.

If you would have real joy with your canary, let him begin housekeeping, for from the 14th of February to the end of May his heart is all aglow with desire to become a nest-holder and assume family cares.

"But, after all, it is all in the baking," as ladies so often say when telling one another how to make some delicate dish, so now success in pet-bird housekeeping depends entirely upon the power of their mistress to let them alone. She can sit quietly in the room and watch them without harming or disturbing them, but she must not handle the cage, or move it in the least, or climb up to peep in the nest. Once a day she must give them fresh food and water and greens; then let them alone, until the little birds are feathered, when she can begin to handle them, and teach them to know and love her—an ample reward for her forbearance. Unless she is willing to deny herself the pleasure of peeping into the nest and letting her friends do the same, it is almost useless, even with the tamest birds, to attempt raising young ones.

Taking this self-denial as a foundation for success, next notice the color and disposition of your bird; if he is gay and merry, get him a quiet female; if he is inclined to be shy and retiring, buy him a wife as confiding and merry as you can find; and be sure you choose for yourself, without much regard to the dealer's advice, unless he is a man you are in the habit of dealing with, and you know you can trust him.

Having bought your female, the next step is to look after their food, as at mating time birds require rich living. Give them plenty of seed mixed with hemp and millet, as millet is excellent for the voice, and prepare an especial repast for them each day of rolled milk crackers thoroughly mixed with hard-boiled egg, using both the yolk and white; this food must be given from the time of mating until the young birds are fledged and can crack seed for themselves, as it is the food upon which the parent bird will feed her young. Be sure it is fresh every day. One egg should last three days; simply cut off a piece, and put the rest in the ice-box or some other cool place for future use.

Give them lettuce, apple, the white tops of celery, or cress every day. Lettuce is preferable to all other greens for birds. Above all things, remember to put a bit of dry mortar or lime in the cage or room for the female to eat, so that her egg-shell may be hard; this is absolutely necessary. A red-pepper pod hung where they can get it is also very good for them, and for a tidbit a bit of sponge-cake soaked in sherry or port wine is thoroughly enjoyed, and helps to keep the female's strength up while building and sitting; an excellent thing to do, as she can then attend to her baby birds better, and is not likely to eat her eggs—a trick ill-fed birds are apt to indulge in.

As soon as your birds have become acquainted, put them together. At first for a day or so they may fight, for birds have real quarrels, and do not disdain to resort to sharp thaps with their bills, but this will not last long.

If you have an empty room or garret that is light, and that you are sure is free from rats or mice, turn your birds loose in it, simply nailing the nest to the wall, with the material for building loosely tacked in a bunch just above it, within easy reach of the mother bird, as she likes to sit on her nest that is to be and pull her materials down to her as she needs them. Hang her own and her mate's cage beside the nest, as they will go to bed in them every night until she begins to sit, when her mate will sleep in the one nearest her, or on a perch beside her, if one is provided for him; but it must be put up before they begin to build. He is very jealous of her now, and his tender devotion to her is beautiful to watch. Sprinkle plenty of gravel on the floor beneath the nest, put the seed in one dish and the prepared food in another, and use the cage cup for water. Do not put the nest too high, as the air is close near the top of a room.

If you have not an empty room to spare, then buy a large common cage with a wooden back, scald it all over with strong soda-water to keep lice away, rinsing it with hot soda-water also. Then secure it at a good height from the floor, but not so high that you will shake it when you renew the supply of food or water. Cover the floor thickly with gravel, for the cage must not be cleaned again until the young birds have left the nest; then place the food in a dish small enough to prevent all risk of shaking the cage in taking it in and out to replenish it. The water should be so arranged that the birds cannot wet themselves by trying to bathe in it, as a drop of water will destroy the eggs.

The men in bird stores tell us that a wire or tin cage covered with Canton flannel is best. I have always found that my finest broods were raised in small open-work wicker baskets. One of my birds raised an exceptionally fine brood in the sluck covering of a wine-bottle, cut half-way down and tacked to the side of her cage. She worked two whole days making openings all round and under it before she began to build. They are building now in a little lounon basket, and seem to regard it as the most desirable house they ever had.

Whatever you use for the nest—wire, tin, or wicker—be sure and secure it firmly, and where it cannot be shaken. I never use the flannel, but it may be good for all that. I simply get a bit of new Manila rope and a bit of soft cotton rope—less of the latter—and shred it up as finely as possible, then secure it above or beside the nest. Bits of feathers and soft linen ravellings form good materials to line the nest with.

In seven or eight days after mating commences, the nest is finished and the first egg laid. The female bird usually lays one egg every day until she has laid her full number, which is four or seven; then she begins to sit, and for thirteen days the little creature that is usually so active and restless sits almost motionless, her loving little heart throbbing against the eggs, and her feathers and life-heat warming them into existence. Now it will repay you to sit silently in an out-of-the-way corner and watch how tenderly her mate feeds her, how loving he is, and how willingly he takes her place on the nest while she stretches her wings and limbs.

If all goes well, and they are not disturbed, at the end of thirteen days the first-laid egg is hatched, and so on each day one egg is hatched, until the whole brood of naked blind little birdies lies helplessly in the nest. Now you may take a look in, just to see if all of the eggs are hatched. If not, take the one not hatched out with a spoon, and hold the egg before a strong light; if veins show against the shell, it may hatch yet, and can be returned to the nest, but if it is transparent, it is spoiled, and may be thrown away.

The birds want to be and must be let alone now until the little ones are feathered, although you must keep a sharp lookout from a distance to see that they are all right, and that they do not wiggle out of the nest, and that all the family and friends do not run for a peep at the new birds. I lost a whole brood in this way. I kept looking at them and showing them to every one, and the consequence was that the father, evidently with the mother's consent, killed the whole nestful. A friend had to raise her first brood herself, because the father and mother left them when troubled by people peeping into the nest. She used a quill for the purpose, splitting it, and placing the cracker and egg in it, she gave each bird three or four quillfuls at a time, feeding them once an hour.

In a few weeks your birdies will be fledged; then you can begin to handle them, and teach them to love and know you, and you will find it a most delightful reward for your forbearance during their housekeeping time.

RÉNÉ.

A FIFTEENTH CENTURY STORY.

BY ESTHER CARR.

PART I.

"MASTER, it is the Blessed Lady herself!" a boy's sweet-toned voice exclaimed, at length breaking the silence which for some time had been uninterrupted.

The master raised his hand to check the interruption, but with a smile on his lips, and went on with his task. The room in which he worked was large and lofty, its ceiling vaulted, the arched windows at some feet from the ground and draped on one side of the room with a heavy curtain so as to regulate the light. An enormous fireplace with stone settles inside it almost filled one end, and was surmounted by a high and elaborately carved oak chimney-piece. With the exception of a few high-backed chairs and one or two oak chests, the room was bare of furniture, though bits of rare tapestry and Spanish leather hung here and there on the walls, here and there, too, lances and swords and carbines. Erect and grim in one corner stood an entire suit of armor, and near it, on a wooden block, a costly war saddle and housings.

A large panel, on which several figures were already grouped, stretched half-way across the room, so placed that the light from the windows on the left fell full upon it on that August day of the year of our Lord 1420, thus showing that the apartment was a painter's studio; and the middle-aged man in the dark woollen robe lined with red, and confined at the waist by a leathern belt—a man of benign countenance, regular in feature, and with brown hair touched with gray falling on his shoulders—who stood, brush in hand, before the canvas, was Hubert Van Eyck.

The figure of the Virgin he was painting was already sketched in, and the head, which had caused the boy's irrepressible exclamation, had begun to live beneath the brush. A beautiful and placid face, with long fair hair bound on the forehead by a glittering diadem of jewels, and falling on the blue drapery of her robe, her eyes thoughtfully cast down, and looking rather beyond than on to the book she held in her finely moulded hands—this was Van Eyck's presentment of the mother of our Lord.

But he was not painting from imagination. On a raised platform at some distance from him, and almost as immovable as the picture, sat the living model from which he painted, a girl about eighteen years old, with pure face and thoughtful hazel eyes, fair hair falling on the blue drapery of her robe, and bound back on her forehead by a diadem of gold set with glittering gems. This model was Margaret, the painter's young sister.

Besides the painter and his model, the only occupants of the studio were two boys of twelve and fourteen years old; the former (the boy who had spoken) standing in rapt attention beside Van Eyck, while the latter rubbed and mixed colors for the master's use, interrupting to do so his own work of copying in distemper one of the half-completed figures of the altar-piece.

Beyond the raised platform on which Margaret Van Eyck sat there was an arched doorway, and through this a vista appeared which made in itself a perfect picture of an interior, showing another room two or three steps lower than the studio, wainscoted with oak, and rich with carved panels and furniture. Patches of bright color fell through the stained glass of a millioned window on which the sun was then shining—through all but one little lattice which, standing open, let in the sweet-scented air, and showed a bit of tender blue in the sky above.

Another half-hour passed in silence. Then the boy, eager in his curiosity and interest, broke in again. "To the right of the Christ His blessed mother, and behind her this choir of angels (you have put my face among them, oh! rare good master); to the left St. John Baptist in this green drapery you have faintly touched in, and beyond St. John—"

Van Eyck paused in his work. "Beyond the Baptist, St. Cecilia playing, and with her angels with their harps and viols—the last group on this side of the picture," he answered.

"And the base, Master Hubert, the base?" the boy went on.

"Ah, the base—the lower panels?" Van Eyck repeated, and then a dreamy look passed over his face, and for a few moments he remained silent.

"I have it here, monseigneur," he said at last, touching his forehead, "and here," and he laid his hand on his breast. "The adoration of the mystic Lamb, the altar draped for sacrifice; angels and saints and men of all degrees bowing before Him. God give me grace to show forth my thought! But what I may fail in, my brother will supply. Should I die and John live, the 'Agnus Dei' will still be finished."

"Master!" René said, clasping Van Eyck's loose-hanging sleeve in both his hands, and pulling him gently so that he was obliged to look in his face. It was not necessary to say more than that one word, for the look of contentment in the blue eyes filling with tears spoke the rest.

"Nay, nay," the master said, smilingly. "I speak from no foreboding. But a true artist's first thought must be for his work, and I would this might be accomplished."

As he spoke, a side door opened, and through it a man entered the room, and with quick and springing step approached Hubert Van Eyck. He was about eight-and-thirty years of age, but his lithe figure and quick movements made him look much younger, and there was a vigor in the expression of the bright eagle eyes and in the outline of the high features which gave him an almost boyish look compared with Hubert, by whom he now stood.

"Well?" the latter said, looking eagerly up at him, and putting his hand on his brother's shoulder.

"Found!" John Van Eyck said, triumphantly, tossing the cap he held in the air. "Success at last!"

"Laudamus!" Hubert exclaimed, a look of reverence mingling with the happy light that passed over his face. "I knew thou wouldst succeed in time, John, but I did not know it would be so soon."

"Soon!" John echoed. "Think of the months of thought I have given it; think of the many failures. But at length the enamel neals and the glass is pure white beneath. The flux has now to cool, and will, I hope, not have to pass through the furnace again. The secret is surely mine, and to-morrow I trust you will see the result. Meantime no one must enter the workshop; dost hear, Margaret?" Margaret Van Eyck, who had relaxed her pose when he came into the room, and was bending forward, eagerly listening, assented. "No, nor your Highness either;" John said, with a smile, and turning to René. "Peter Van Baerle, I know, needs no telling, for he is too absorbed with his colors here to care. That arm is out of drawing, boy," he added; and taking up a piece of charcoal, with one stroke he corrected the fault, and the patient pupil without speaking proceeded to undo his own work.

But now from the belfry near by the mid-day chimes rang out into the clear air, and as the last stroke of twelve vibrated through it, Hubert Van Eyck put down his brush, and signing to his sister that the sitting was over, Margaret came down from her platform and laid aside her blue drapery and the diadem, carefully locking the latter into one of the oak chests. A woman's figure dressed in the costume of the Flemish lower orders—a dark woollen gown tucked up over a red petticoat, and a white face cap rather high in the crown and falling with long flaps over the ears—appeared in the doorway leading to the inner room.

"Dinner is served," she said, and vanished.

"THROWING THE LATTICE OPEN, MARGARET VAN EYCK LOOKED OUT TO SEE THEM RIDE AWAY."

Then a strange thing took place. With a low bow to the boy René, Hubert Van Eyck repeated the words, and stood aside for him to pass first, which, without demur, the boy did, the others following him into the adjacent room, where the table for the midday meal stood. Then René seated himself, a priest who already stood near the table pronounced a Latin grace; Hubert Van Eyck, cutting a portion from the principal dish on the table, then presented it, kneeling on one knee, to the boy, while his brother John offered a snowy napkin in one hand and a goblet in the other. With the utmost gravity René accepted plate, goblet, and napkin from the brothers in turn, and began to eat. Then, with a gracious bow and gesture of the hand, he signed to them to sit down; and Margaret and the priest and Peter Van Baerle, who had all remained standing till this ceremony was over, now also took their places at the table, the whole scene being gone through with perfect simplicity, and as a matter of course. For this boy, art pupil of Hubert and John Van Eyck, and fellow-student of Peter Van Baerle, was also René of Anjou, Count of Guise.

René, at this time twelve years old, second son of the King of Sicily, who had died three years before, had been almost from infancy under the guidance and protection of his mother's uncle, the Cardinal Duke of Bar, whose palace was the boy's home. Already precocious with the precocity of princes, and acquainted with matters of state, though so simply childish in other ways, René had drawn his sword with the old Cardinal's troops in an expedition against the marauding bands of robbers and deserters who infested the Bar dominions and Lorraine.

Already René's future destiny had become a matter of grave state interest. Meantime the boy, giving promise in all that came under the head of the "gentle science," whether poetry, music, or art, had, so long as three years ago, when with the Cardinal on one of his frequent visits to the French court, become the pupil of the Van Eycks. And whenever the chance offered, René eagerly resumed the lessons from his beloved masters in that art which he practised during all his after-life, and which proved of such resource to him.

When they had finished the meal—which the young Prince was allowed to share with the painter's family, so that his morning's study might be as long as possible—Hubert Van Eyck, rising again, knelt before the boy, holding in both hands a large dish of repoussé silver filled with water, into which René dipped his fingers, wiping them on the napkin John held out for his use. Ceremony was for the present at an end, and the boy, getting off his high-backed chair, chattered away to Margaret to his heart's content, while Peter Van Baerle, whose studies were more serious, slipped off into the studio, John Van Eyck following him, Hubert, meantime, and the priest, René's tutor, talking together on the other side of the room. Margaret, whose hands were rarely idle, had taken up a piece of household work that lay ready on a table near, while René stood beside her, turning over the leaves of a highly illuminated missal—also Margaret's work.

"THAT'S YOU!"—FROM THE PAINTING BY J. G. BROWN, N.A.

"Only a few pages more to finish, Margaret," the young Prince said, admiringly. "How you must grudge the time to such work as that!"—he touched the linen she held in her hand scornfully—"or even the hours given to sitting to the master, when you can paint so beautifully as this!"

"Both necessary work in their way, monseigneur," Margaret answered, smiling; "and Hubert's art is better worth furthering than mine. Besides, my missal is nearly finished, and I am only eighteen. If I live, I have time before me for much work—real pictures even."

"If you live!" René said, impatiently. "You are copying Master Hubert's words of this morning. Why must you both make me sad?"

"We make your Highness something more than sad," Margaret said, laughing at his cross tone, for Margaret Van Eyck and the young Prince were sworn allies.

"Yes, cross, too!" René said, recovering. "But wait awhile, Grethel, till one of the suitors Peter tells me of carries you off from Master Hubert and from painting too!"

"I do not think that time will ever come, sir," Margaret answered, quietly. "I love my brother and my art too well to give either up readily."

"Ah, you can choose!" René said, his bright young face clouding. "I would I were not married already—or as good as married! The Cardinal forgets I would have Art for my bride if I had my will."

"But it need not interfere, monseigneur," Margaret said, soothingly. "Your studies will go on as usual, and when you are together at Nancy you can teach the little Princess to love art too. And think what a pretty pageant your wedding will be—some artist should have a picture of that!"

"You shall, Margaret!" René cried. "The feast at my betrothal was good sport enough, and I do not mind my little cousin; but I like you better, and I wish she had been called Margaret and not Isabella. Some day," he added, with all the gravity of his twelve years, "I shall call one of my daughters Margaret—Margaret of Anjou! It sounds very well." René's chatter as to his future arrangements was interrupted by the Abbé de Lagny, who now told the Prince that his Highness's escort was ready.

"To-morrow, dear Master Hubert. Oh, earlier than this morning!" the boy exclaimed, as he said good-by. "I can not lose a day while we stay in Ghent."

Margaret Van Eyck went to the window when her brother had followed René and the abbé down-stairs, and throwing the lattice wide open, looked out to see them ride away. The Van Eycks' house in the Koey Straat, at the corner of the Vogel Markt, commanded a good view of the town, with its step-gabled houses, red roofs against the blue sky, steeples and towers of churches rising among them, while the sun seemed to strike one special flame of light from the gilt dragon on the high belfry tower. The boy had already mounted his pretty Arab. M. De Lagny, with more diffidence, now got upon his steady though rather ponderous Flemish mare; René, looking up at the window, raised his plumed cap from his fair hair, waved it to Margaret, and smiling rode away.

BILLY TOWNER'S FIRST SKIRMISH.

BY JOHN HABBEKTON.

BILLY TOWNER was the smallest man in the regiment which Smith County sent to the late civil war. Indeed, he was not a man at all, but a fourteen-year-old drummer boy, and he would not have been accepted, even for the drum corps, had not his father begged the Colonel, who was a friend of the family, to take the boy, for the purpose of curing him quickly and thoroughly of the war fever. The two men agreed that Billy would take chills and fever soon after the regiment reached the South, that homesickness would follow as a matter of course, and then Billy, discharged because of physical unfitness for his duties, would gladly return to his home, and never again want to leave it.

But this ingenious plan did not work as was expected. Billy did not take the chills at all. Whether he was fit for the service, however, the Colonel sometimes doubted. Two soldierly qualities he quickly developed in fine style; one was an enormous appetite, and the other a steady objection to getting up in the morning; but neither of these was of any special service to the Union cause. At losing drumsticks, tearing his clothes, and burning his shoes when trying to dry them, he had not an equal in the regiment. He was always in urgent need of something which could not be had, always late at roll-calls, and on inspection his knapsack could be depended upon to display more disorder and trash in a given space than any other, even in the drum corps. And yet he was so good-natured and cheery, so full of chatter about the boys he had left behind, that the fathers and brothers of these same boys spent a great deal of time in trying to keep him out of trouble.

Like most boys of that period, he was "spoiling for a fight," although he had nothing to fight with, and learned, to his sorrow, when the regiment got into its first severe battle, that the duty of drummers was to stay in the rear and carry the wounded to the surgeon. But this first battle was long in coming, and Billy made quite a nuisance of himself by expressing his mind as to the slowness of the generals and the unfitness of the government to manage a great war. Whenever the regiment got into a skirmish it was Billy's luck to be left in camp, either on duty with the guard, or by the intention of his Captain, who, like the Colonel, was a friend of the boy's family, and did not want to have to write sad news to parents.

But the coveted opportunity came unexpectedly one night. The company to which Billy belonged were on picket duty, and Billy was with them. It was a pleasant summer evening, and the reserve—the men not actually on post at the time—were lying on the ground, chatting, joking, and grumbling, according to their respective tastes, when crack! crack! crack! went some rifles on the picket line. Up sprang the reserve, and none too soon, for back through the underbrush and trees came the pickets. At first there seemed more of them than had gone out; then, by the moonbeams that straggled down through the tree-tops, the reserve saw that the greater part of the crowd wore gray uniforms. It was not a time to ask for explanations, for the visitors outnumbered the reserve at least ten to one, so there was a lively scrub race for a breast-work a couple of hundred yards in the rear.

Then the firing became very lively. The enemy, who were apparently making a strong reconnaissance, did not care to charge breastworks in the dark, but they kept up a steady fire from behind trees and logs whenever they saw a head, and the pickets returned the compliment when they thought they saw a gray elbow.

Finally re-enforcements reached the breast-work, crossed it, and slowly pressed the enemy back. In half an hour the shots sounded so far away that the Captain of the picket company was sure that no scattering shots could reach his men, so he shouted: "Fall in, men. Sergeant, call the roll."

The roll-call showed that, as was usual during night attacks upon pickets, the enemy's bullets had done more damage to trees and bushes than to flesh and blood. Every name was responded to until the sergeant called, "Towner!"

There was no response. The sergeant moved a little to one side, and shouted, "Billy Towner!"

Then the Captain, who was standing near the sergeant, exclaimed, "Where is that boy? Does any one know?"

No one answered.

"Go on with the roll-call," said the Captain, clasping his hands behind him and sauntering away. The remaining men answered to their names, but they did not speak as loud as the others had done, and as soon as the company broke ranks there was a general interchange of opinion.

"I hope he's merely captured," said old Browley, whose own boy had been at school with Billy.

"It won't take long to find out," said the Captain. "Attention! Deploy as skirmishers; forward—march! Go slowly; look over the ground carefully."

There were very ugly thoughts about the enemy as that skirmish line moved forward. Soon after leaving the breastwork one of the men stopped and stooped down; several others were about him at once, but the body on the ground was not Billy's; it was that of a wounded Confederate, who begged for water and a surgeon. Some one gave him a canteen as the line moved on. Another halt proved a false alarm, caused by an overcoat lying on a log; but a moment later old Browley's voice was heard from one end of the line to the other, and the whole company felt solemn at once; for what Browley said was, "Oh! isn't this awful?"

The men nearest Browley saw the old man kneel and place his hands on a figure which they recognized as that of the little drummer. Billy was lying on his breast, his arms outstretched; and as the men drew near they heard Browley say: "Cold and stiff! He must have been killed by one of the first shots. Oh, boys, this is awful! He was just the age of my Tom; and Tom wanted to enlist too."

"Recall the line," said the Captain. "Bring him to the rear—carefully."

Two or three men handed their guns to others, and stooped to pick up the body, but old Browley said, "One man can do it better than more." Then he put his arms around the figure, which hung limp as it was raised from the ground. Suddenly the company was startled by a single utterance. It came from Billy Towner; it was pitched very high, and it sounded thus, "Ow-w-w-w!"

"Only wounded, thank Heaven!" exclaimed old Browley. "Where are you hit, little chap?"

"I'm not hit," said Billy Towner, "but I'm squeezed almost to death. It's real mean to tease a fellow just because he's sleepy."

"He doesn't know what's happened," muttered Browley. "He fainted as soon as he was hit, like lots of them do. Don't get excited, boy; tell us where it hurts."

"My ribs!" screamed Billy. "You're breaking them. Let go of me!" and the supposed corpse wriggled and kicked until it got out of Browley's arms and upon its feet, where it stood erect, rubbed its eyes, and then indulged in a long yawn.

"You little scoundrel!" exclaimed the Captain, seizing the drummer by both shoulders and shaking him soundly; "why didn't you retire with the rest of us?"

"Retire?" drawled Billy; "when?"

"When the enemy advanced, of course."

"What enemy?"

"The only enemy there is in this part of the country. Didn't you hear the firing?"

"What firing?"

The Captain made an impatient gesture and exclaimed,

"Don't you know enough to wake up when a whole brigade tramples on you?"

"What brigade?"

"Attention, company!" roared the Captain, abruptly; then he marched his men back to the breastwork.

As soon as arms were stacked and ranks broken, old Browley seized Billy's arm and said, "See here, little fellow, next time you go to sleep while you're with the picket, just be obliging enough to lie on your side, won't you, and put something under your head for a pillow, instead of sprawling like a dead man? I want you to understand that you've nearly killed me."

"And the rest of us too," muttered the Captain.

THE ICE KING AT WORK.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

WE have seen how water wears away the land in one place to build it up in another, how it carves channels for itself through the solid rock, and builds up new layers of rock out of the ground-up material, but we have not seen all that water can do. In its solid form, as ice, it has had a great part to perform in world-making.

I am sure you have often read of the wonderful glaciers of Switzerland, where, between the rocky sides of a mountain gorge, the ice seems like a great river flowing downward. Glaciers are found in many countries—everywhere, in fact, where the climate and the formation of the land are both favorable. We hear more of Swiss glaciers only because a larger number of people visit and write about Switzerland than about the other countries where they are to be found. Greenland and Alaska have many glaciers quite as wonderful as those of Switzerland.

A glacier is really what it looks like—a river of ice (Fig. 1); and more than that, it is a moving river. It does not seem possible that anything as solid and as brittle as ice could move in this way through an uneven, rough channel, and fill it as a glacier does.

The beginning or source of the glacier is snow packed tightly in a high mountain valley. As we follow its course it gradually changes into a solid mass of whitish ice, scored all over with cracks and crevices, broken up into great masses and blocks of ice on the surface, and covered often with dirt and stones. Finally we come to a place where the weather is warm enough to melt the ice, and then it flows off as a stream of water.

The glaciers had been for a long time under suspicion of moving, but it was not generally believed till a man named Hugi, in 1827, built a hut upon one of them. Each year it was found that the hut was farther down the gorge.

The fact was proved, and people became interested in finding out more about this movement. A row of stakes was set up in the ice, straight across from side to side of the glacier, and two on each bank to mark the starting point. This row of poles, as it moved, did not remain straight; it bent like a bow in the middle, curving out toward the lower end of the glacier, showing that the middle part moved faster than the edge. This is known to be true of an ordinary river: the water rubbing against the banks and against the bottom of its bed is hindered, and moves more slowly than the water in the middle and on top does.

The glacier ice not only moves where the channel is even and smooth, but in some places where the channel narrows and is bordered by great masses of rock the wide sheet of ice squeezes itself through the narrow gorge, piling itself high in mighty blocks in obedience to the tremendous pressure behind. Of course most of this movement is in summer; the advance of the rows of stakes showed this. There are two very wonderful things to be studied out about this—the cause of the movement, and the way it is effected.

FIG. 1.—A GLACIER.

First for the cause; that has to be sought in the high and lonely mountain valleys. Each winter, snow piles itself high on the mountain top; each summer, this snow is softened and made slushy, but not melted entirely. The soft snow sinks and packs, and is pushed down into the easiest channel. The next winter a new weight of snow is added, making a greater pushing force.

On a cold, clear winter's day you have often picked up a handful of snow and tried to make it into a snow-ball, and found that it would not pack; it would crumble up in your hands. By putting a little water on it you can pack it into a hard, partly clear ball.

If moist snow is put in a mould and squeezed, a block of ice the shape of the mould can be made. Your hands cannot press the snow hard enough to make it into ice, but the mould can. Snow is nothing but ice in fine beautiful crystals with air caught in its meshes.

When you squeeze it you press out the air and bring the ice particles near enough together for them to freeze solid. A tiny little bit of water added runs in between the particles of ice and pushes the air out before it, and so helps to make it solid; and when the water too is squeezed out, makes it freeze. Too much is worse than none at all. Each winter's weight of snow lies during the cold weather without doing much, but when the summer warmth begins to soften the snow, it begins to pack, as the moist snow-ball does, and being a little softened, and pressed by the weight above, to push its way down through some valley. It is hindered in its travels, and being pushed behind and hindered in front, it packs tighter and tighter till we find it, farther down in its bed, a mass of ice. The weight is getting greater and greater behind it with each winter's load of snow, and so the ice is forced down, no matter what is in the way, and the valley is finally filled with the moving river of ice.

The ice is not soft like water, or even mud; how, then, can it fit itself to the channel? That has puzzled a great many wise heads before yours. Ice is one of the brittlest things in the world, but it has a quality that we do not often have occasion to notice. It melts easily, but it also freezes easily. Faraday, one of the greatest men of science in our century, and one of the noblest and simplest men of any time, discovered this quality of ice in a very commonplace way. One hot summer's day, in a restaurant, he noticed some bits of ice floating in a dish of water. The ice was melting, and yet every time two pieces touched they froze together. Tyndall, another great scientist, has explained the movement of glaciers by this simple principle. It was he who found that ice could be crushed out of one shape into another, and that the broken bits froze at once together and made a solid lump, as the snow does. Now glacier ice, underneath the surface, is squeezed in a mould made of its bed and banks and the heavy weight of ice above; the moving part of the ice, which fits itself to the channel-mould, is broken and ground up into bits, but these bits, being pressed together again, freeze into the new mould that it is pushed into—that is, the new part of the channel—just as Tyndall's ice, which was first squeezed in a round mould, came out a ball, and being squeezed again in a cup-shaped mould, came out a perfect cup of ice.

FIG. 2.—TRANSPORTATION OF ROCKS BY GLACIERS.

FIG. 3.—ROCK SCRATCHED BY GLACIER.
(From Lyell's "Elements of Geology.")

A glacier moves so slowly that it freezes to fragments of stone in its bed and on its banks, and carries them along with it (Fig. 2), scratching and scoring with them the stones it finds lower down in its channel. Where the end of the glacier melts, these bottom stones are left in a curved heap. When from change of climate the glacier ends farther up the slope than it once did, two lines of stones show where the banks were. (Fig. 1.) In the picture you see a line of stones down through the middle of the glacier. These are where two glaciers have joined, and the stones mark the joined edges. These stones are always worn round by the grinding and rubbing they have received, and are called "muttoned" rocks by the French, because at a distance they look like the round backs of a flock of sheep; they are scratched, too, in straight lines. (Fig. 3.)

These glacier signs are very important in studying what the Ice King has done in bringing the earth to its present state. Long before there were any people to write about them, the glaciers were writing little scraps of their history and travels on the stones, as the savages did, and this history we can read to-day.

Sometimes may be seen a very curious effect that the stones have upon the ice, which they protect from the melting rays of the sun. Each block of stone rests upon a pillar of ice of its own making. The stone is like the top and the ice pillar like the central column of a table. (Fig. 2.)

Icebergs, you know, are great floating mountains of ice: as only one-eighth of the iceberg is above water, you can guess how immense some of them are. They are really only the snouts of arctic glaciers which have pushed themselves into the sea without melting, and been broken off by the tides and the waves. When an iceberg gets afloat it sometimes comes as far south as Washington before it is broken up and melted. Usually they melt in the sea, and then rocks are deposited at the sea bottom, but sometimes they run aground, and then on the soil of countries far to the southward arctic rocks are dropped. The icebergs and glaciers of the far past have mixed up things very much in this way.

In Greenland no rain falls—only snow; there are no rivers but ice rivers. A large part of the country is covered by a great sheet of ice, nearly half a mile thick, slowly travelling to the sea, and there launching thousands of icebergs.

Strewed all over the northern part of our continent, over mountains, hills, valleys, and plains, is a layer of glacier stones, scratched and "muttoned," different from the rocks below them, showing that once a sheet of ice covered this country as it now covers Greenland. This broke up into separate glaciers, filling the valleys, as the Hudson and the Susquehanna, till it came to a climate warm enough to melt the ice.

As time went, our part of the earth grew warmer. We do not know why; we only know it was so. The glaciers were driven back to the arctic regions. Our country was no longer a wide barren ice field, but was getting slowly ready for the day when God should command it to blossom as the rose and be a home for His children.

his youngest, and would usually, by some mental process which seldom failed to convince his conscience, argue himself into the belief that Paul was in the wrong, and he happened to be present that Paul would be harshly spoken to, or even struck, for some wrong he had never done; for Paul was a juster and gentler disposition than his brother.

fore it fell, and dealt it in stunning fashion to Hugh, who, raising his hand quickly to the place, thought his eyes must have deceived him, while Mr. McAlpine fell so softly as to be scarcely hurt. He might have done, on the fustled, tear-stained cheek of Paul, who, scarcely believing his senses, turned a look of such awe and grateful surprise upon his father that that gentleman was sorely touched to the quick with a sense of his past unkindness to the child.

"Don't let me catch you bullying your little brother again, sir," was all he said, however, addressing Hugh, who was still holding his hand to the seat of the blow, which, strange to say, had left not the slightest mark. "Poo! poo! that wouldn't have hurt a fly," observed his father, as if in answer to the boy's unspoken protest.

"But my arm must have been bewitched," he reflected afterward, feeling not a little bewildered at the turn affairs had taken.

From this day forth began a new state of things for Paul, who, from being the object of his father's harshness and often of his brother's tyranny, became a most considered member of the little household, and, strange to say, the incident we have recorded had also a wonderful effect for good on Hugh; for, so far from becoming jealous of Paul and his father's partiality toward him, he was pleased at the change. And henceforth such peace and happiness reigned amongst them that Pippino soon gave up his idea of molesting the children, and was not so casual to interfere in the family affairs of Mr. McAlpine and his sons.

BERKEHEAD, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—I am a little girl eleven years old—I shall be twelve in May. I am very fond of reading. I have a pair of snow-shoes two chickens, Princess and Ruby; and two hens, Snowflake and Blanche. Poppy is very pretty. I have a dog named Rover, and a cat named Maud. I have one sister, Maud, and one brother, Harold. We like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much indeed; we take it in weekly. Like Louisa M. Alcott's stories. We get it every Friday. We have a nice little tricycle, and enjoy riding it very much. We play tennis and croquet in the summer.

I am only seven years old. Once I had a little canary bird, but one day I went to look at it, and when I opened the door it flew out. I don't know. Please print this letter. Good-by. FAITH T. O.

UNION, COLORADO.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—There are about two feet of snow here this winter, and the snow-shoeing is very good. I have a pair of snow-shoes nine feet long and three inches wide. They slide very fast on a hill, and I get a good many tumblers, as soon as the snow melts. I have a good deal of water, and then the wild-ducks come. I like to shoot them very much, as they are very good to eat. I like the story of "Two Little Fishes" very much, and was sorry when it ended. I do not like to fish, although we have plenty of trout here in the summer.

MANKATO, MINNESOTA.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—I am a little girl eleven years old, and I live in Mankato. I go to the State Normal school here, and study spelling, reading, geography, language, writing, music, and botany in the summer. This city is quite large, and there are a great many people here. It is very good to read the story of "Two Little Fishes" very much, and was sorry when it ended. I do not like to fish, although we have plenty of trout here in the summer.

WEST CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

We are two "bosom-friends," as the story-books say. Emily, or Demmie, is the eldest, and will be fourteen in April; Bessie, who is the taller, is two months the younger of the two. We would like to join the Little Housekeepers, as we are both fond of cooking. We have a nice sunny Mother Hubbard apron for the kitchen, which are so long they almost touch the ground. We would advise every girl who wishes to keep her dress clean while cooking to buy one. We think cooking one of the most useful things a girl can learn, and we think the Postmistress agrees with us, as she has often said that the best of all things is a crust, the other reads HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE aloud. We like to read the letters in the Post-office Box, and particularly the kind ones we get from the Postmistress. One day we had a pony named Nellie. She is very gentle, but sometimes she has "stiff tempers." She does not like two people on her back. One day she was standing while laying plans for vengeance. The first man she came to she kicked up her heels and threw up her tail, and then she went right on. We thought we thought she would kick us. But she didn't; she waited until we got up, and then started for the stable on a gallop, while we sat on the curbstone and laughed. Our cousin Alice has a black kitten which sleeps with her every night. It jumps very nicely on the cold winter nights, and its purring puts us to sleep. We would like so much to thank Miss Alcott for the good her books have done, but we suppose she is bothered enough.

DEMME, INDIANA.

I am eleven years old; my birthday comes on the 8th of November. I live on a farm near Brookington. I walk to school every morning. I study geography, grammar, arithmetic, history, and history. I have a brother, Earl, older than myself. We have very much fun coasting on the hills; we have nice sleds. I would like very much to see you, and would like to correspond with some little girl of my age. I like this paper very much, and I watch for it every week. For pets I have a cat and some pigeons; my cat is black, and sometimes is very naughty. Can I belong to the Little Housekeepers' Club?

OF course you may. LEOLA E. V.

OWEGO, NEW YORK.

I am a boy fourteen years old, and take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I think it is the best paper I ever took. You may think it is absurd, but I like Howard Pyle's fairy tales very much. I was born in Crawford, Austria, a place of about 6000 population. I study arithmetic, grammar, word analysis, and drawing. I have passed regents' examination in spelling and geography. I would like to have some boy correspond with me.

LEN HANDELER.

LEWISTON, MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—My brother has taken this delightful paper since 1882 and likes it very much, especially the story of "Two Arrows," but I believe I like "Roll House" better than any story I ever read. I think that was just splendid, as are all of Mrs. Lillie's stories. I have two brothers and two sisters. I don't go to school, but my brothers and my eldest sister go, and so am I going in March. I wish like Fanny B. McE that you would put your picture at the top of the Post-office Box page some time. I wish some little girl of my age would write to me; I would take so much pleasure in answering and reading her letter.

KATE F. WEAKE (aged eight years).

SALEM, OREGON.

My favorite authors are Lucy C. Lillie, John R. Coryell, and Howard Pyle. I live with my grandparents. We reside in one of the largest houses in Salem. I have one little brother-eight years old; her name is Gussie. I am thirteen years old.

AN ARROW ESCAPE: A TALE OF A DOG IN AFRICA.

IT was a gallant sporting man,
And he was homeward bound,

(2.)

And as he went his leather trunk
Fell out upon the ground,

(3.)

The which his faithful little dog,
Who ran behind them, found.

(4.)

The natives of that country were
A very barbarous race,

(5.)

And when they saw the leather trunk,
Their arrows fell apace,

(6.)

While Toby—that's the doggie's name—
Behind it hid his face.

(7.)

It chanced the gallant sporting man,
Perceiving something wrong,

(8.)

With sailor-boy retraced his steps—
The way it was not long.

(9.)

The other sailor staid behind,
And whistled him a song.

(10.)

The sporting man he fired his gun,
With aspect stern and bold,

(11.)

And then the fierce barbarians
Perceived they had been "sold,"

(12.)

The meeting of the man and dog
Was touching to behold.

(13.)

A narrow 'scape in truth they had,
That dog and that valise;

(14.)

And as they sailed for home that day,
My story now must cease.

LIVING LUNCH BASKETS.

BY JOHN R. CORELL.

OF course it is not at all surprising that you should carry your lunch with you when you are going to be away from home all day, but think of an animal doing such a thing!

There is the camel, for instance. Everybody knows that it carries its drinking water with it, but it does more; it carries its lunch too. That hump on the camel's back is not a curvature of the spine, as it may seem, but a mass of fatty material. That hump, in fact, is the camel's lunch basket.

When a well-fed, healthy camel starts out on a journey across the desert, its water pouch is full, and its hump is big. When water fails, the camel has only to draw on its reservoir, and when food is wanting, the hump is called upon.

Not that the camel helps itself to bites of its hump. That would be a decidedly uncomfortable way of getting a meal, and very likely the camel would rather go hungry than do that. In some way the hump is gradually absorbed, and for a long time after the camel has been unable to find anything to eat, it can get along very comfortably on what its hump supplies it with. By-and-by, of course, the hump is used up, and then the camel will starve as quickly as any other animal.

A great deal more like a genuine lunch basket is the bag the pelican carries its food in. The pelican is about as ungainly and odd a bird as can be found, and yet is a very interesting one. It has great webbed feet, short legs, big body, huge wings, and an enormous head.

Its head is mostly bill, and on the under part of the bill is a flabby bag made of tough skin. That bag can stretch and stretch until it can hold an incredible quantity of fish, for it is in that bag that the pelican puts the fish it catches for its food. When the bag is full, the pelican rises heavily from the sea, and with broad sweeps of its great wings flaps slowly to the shore, where it alights and prepares to enjoy the meal it has earned. One by one the still living fish are tossed into the air, and come down head first into the wide-opened mouth of the hungry bird.

Then there are some of the South American monkeys which have curious little lunch baskets in their cheeks. Everybody must have seen monkeys stuffing and stuffing food into their mouths until their cheeks were bulged quite out of shape.

It looks as if the greedy little fellows were merely cramming their mouths full. The truth is, many of the monkeys have queer little pockets in their cheeks into which they can stow enough food for a meal. Nor do the full cheeks interfere at all with the chewing of the monkeys any more than if the pockets were outside instead of inside of the mouth.

But there is a little animal called the pouched rat which has an odder way than this of carrying its food. On each side of its face is a pouch which looks very much like a kid glove finger drawn in at one end. These pouches stick straight out from the face, and can be made to hold a large supply of food.

The cow and deer and sheep and other similar animals have still another way of laying in a supply of food. They bite off grass and leaves and swallow them without chewing at all. That food goes into a special stomach, there to stay until it is wanted. When the animal is ready for it, a ball of the food is made up in that first stomach, and sent up into the animal's mouth. That ball is just a mouthful, and the animal can chew it comfortably. After it is chewed and swallowed it goes into the proper stomach, and is digested. Eating in that way is called ruminating.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

"THERE! if my life depended upon it, I couldn't go up that ladder again!"

The speaker was one of a group of girls who had been busy all a certain August afternoon decorating the school-house at Burnham for its annual "teachers' and friends' meeting."

"I'm all tired out," the girl continued, sitting down and regarding her last effort with complacency.

"Where is Rachel Dawson?" said a second voice—that of a slim, active-looking girl of about fourteen, who joined the group with a very earnest and preoccupied manner.

"I think she went up to Mrs. Burton's for something," was the answer; "but Mary Brooks is here."

The name was no sooner spoken than a voice from behind a pile of summer vines and wild flowers said, "Yes, I'm here;" and a tall figure, which I think no one in Ashfield could have recognized as Jo Markham's, came in view, its owner standing up above her work, and looking out upon the other girls with a quiet glance.

In the fourteen months of life at Burnham Jo had altered surprisingly. She had seemed to "shoot up" as Mrs. Dawson said, into a tall girl of sixteen "almost while you looked at her"; but with the childish roundness or plumpness Jo had lost some of her old vigor. The brown tints of her cheeks and hands had given way to a clear-toned healthful white, but the outline of her face was delicate now, making her eyes look darker and more wistful than ever; and in place of the rough masses of hair were smooth brown locks, brushed back as Rachel wore hers, ignorant of "bangs," and coiled neatly at the back, the most recent touch of "girlhood's new beginning grace." Rachel Dawson had insisted upon this, and Jo, conscious of her height, and perhaps of the seriousness of the face which looked at her once a day from her little mirror, yielded, glad to be rid of the long braids of hair she was tired of caring for and wearing down her back.

Jo had never left the Dawsons. During Rachel's illness she had proved so efficient a helper in the little household, the invalid had grown so fond of her quiet, orderly, and active ways that, when she was up and about again, she had decreed that Jo, or "Mary Brooks," was to remain and help them at home, attending Mr. Tone's evening classes, and picking up the sort of millinery and fancy-work for which Mrs. Dawson was famous in Burnham.

In a household of wealthier or idler people Jo might not have prospered, nor have kept her Ashfield story so securely to herself; but good-hearted and "homely," in its best meaning, as the Dawsons were, they had to work hard late and early, so that Jo found plenty of occupation of a healthy kind, which, mingled as it was with a sense of security and a pleasant home, where she was treated from the first like one of the family, was the very safest and best thing which could have happened to Jo; and once or twice it had occurred to her that it might not have happened if she had started forth from Ashfield in a different frame of mind—been at heart rebellious, wicked, or only anxious for freedom.

So the home-like, constant activity was good, and the companionship of a cheerful, bright girl of her own age the very best thing possible, while much of the tenderness which was so deep in the girl's heart was lavished on baby Jo. Never was she too tired or busy or down-hearted not to be glad of the child's presence, the feeling of the little face pressed against her own, the tiny arms held fast about her neck. Indeed, Mrs. Dawson was given to good-natured complaints that her Jo never would look at any one else if "Mary" was around.

So Jo had put her shoulder well to the wheel, and all influences had worked for good, not the least important of which was the fact of Mrs. Burton's having been interested in her from the first. That lady's son also had been better pleased with Jo than with most of his mother's protégées, and at the evening classes he often stopped to have a word or two with the anxious, painstaking, though not over-brilliant scholar, who had learned at last to read and write and cipher, and keep Mrs. Dawson's store accounts quite accurately. To give all the details of Jo's life at Burnham would be impossible, but they seemed to her, looking back a long time afterward, to have included many things of greater consequence than she had dreamed. The seed Faith had sown and seen spring into life was tended and nourished; the green stem and the first leaflets were waiting for a time of bloom, and Jo had a vague feeling often that something more was going to happen to her.

The Burnham young people had accepted Jo as Rachel Dawson's friend, and always included her in school treats and picnics, teachers' festivals, and the like; but the girl, not used even to such simple "society" of girls and boys of her own age, shrank from anything that demanded of her more than to be a "helper," as she was on this occasion—a great one for Burnham, since people had been invited from far and wide.

"Rachel has the flag we want, Mary," said the first speaker; "do you mind going up to Mrs. Burton's for her?"

"I'll go," answered Jo, readily. She came out from behind the tangle of greenery, and put on her hat and gloves. One strongly characteristic feature of "Jo Markham" remained. To be out on the water, walking up the hills or down in the valley, morning, noon, or night, at any time, in any weather, was still her delight, and much as she enjoyed decorating the long school-room, she was glad of the chance for a breath of fresh air. The August day was very warm. Burnham's main street, although well shaded, had the heavy stillness which makes a summer day, in spite of sweet fragrance and the abundant green, seem oppressive, and Jo walked slowly, wishing that a breeze would come up before evening and cool the air, or else, she thought, the school-house, with so many people in it, would be stifling. She was wondering who were the strangers from a distance who were to come, recalling the different names she had heard, none of which were familiar to her. But the large square house was in view, and just as Jo roused herself from her dreaming she saw that the Burton family carriage had arrived, evidently from the station, with some of the visitors whom the old lady of the house was to entertain overnight.

Jo, somewhat mechanically, stood still, saw the door of the house flung open, and Mrs. Burton standing smiling on the threshold, while her son sprang from the carriage and assisted two ladies to alight.

The smaller and elder of the two came first, and moved toward the house. Jo took little heed of her. All, it seemed to her, of sight, of thought, of heart, and soul, for that moment, was concentrated upon the second figure, as with the step, the uplifted head, the fair sweet glance she knew so well, Jo beheld Faith Emerson pass through the low gateway.

It was the work of but one moment, yet to the girl, standing a few yards distant, with one of her hands leaning heavily upon the railing, the other tightly clinched and down against her side, it seemed as though she had seen and thought and felt what might have occupied half an hour, for in that swift recognition of Faith, Jo had detected a change in her. Beautiful and gracious and lovely she was—she must be always—but the dear face had grown white and thin, the hand that Jo saw held out to Mrs. Burton, in its dainty white silk mitten, was like a little shadow, and the hoop of pearls was no longer there.

The door closed upon them—closed upon this first actual vision from Jo's past, and the girl stood still in a dazed, bewildered way, conscious of an aching feeling in her heart and a rush of blinding tears to her eyes. What could she do? At first she thought only of the fact that Faith was there—that she was ill—and with it came the impulse to rush in and see her. Indeed, Jo never knew why she hesitated—what dread it was which held her back. Instead of going, as was her custom, to the front door, she hurried around to the kitchen entrance, sent the message to Rachel, and then sped away, her heart beating, her eyes heavy with those sudden though unshed tears, her chief thought being to reach home as soon as possible.

CHAPTER XVII.

MRS. DAWSON and the children were in the parlor back of the store, and Jo called out from the doorway to her little namesake, who toddled forward at once, eager for "Mary" to take her.

"Why, Mary," said Mrs. Dawson, "you're as white as paper. Well, this is a hot day."

"I'm tired," said Jo, wearily; "but I'd like to take baby upstairs with me; you know I never mind her."

And Jo took the little hand in her own, and together they slowly made the ascent of the stairs.

Jo shared Rachel's room now. She had her own "side," with a little bureau and washing-stand and a special strip of carpet, and one window, a small one with a swinging pane, was always regarded as hers by right. In this room was a low chair, and Jo seated herself, holding little Jo closely in her arms, and resting her head against the side of the window while her thoughts sped on. The little child was tired too, and soon in Jo's comforting arms fell asleep.

For the first time it had flashed upon her mind that perhaps Faith would not understand why she had run away. In the last fourteen months many of Jo's simple points of view had been slowly changing, influenced by the regular home life with its straightforward rules, its very commonplaceness. Whereas "Jo Markham" had no idea whatever that any duty to home could exist in Sailors' Row, "Mary," living day by day in the cheerful, home-like, though simple atmosphere of the Dawson family, had gradually learned to appreciate what the daily duties and obligations of life are, and to think vaguely and with many fluttering fears of going back to Ashfield, where the thought of the jail still came over her with sickening fear, that perhaps she had no right to run away as she did. I speak of all this because in thinking of Jo's story it has always seemed to me that God helped her into the right places so tenderly, so mercifully. Could any two years and a half have included better lessons or better influences?

"Why, Mary," said Rachel, suddenly, coming into the room, "aren't you getting ready to go down to the school-house? You know Mrs. Mason asked us to be prompt there by six o'clock. Mrs. Jones is coming over to be with the children, you know."

"Oh, Rachel," said Jo, lifting her heavy eyes, "I don't think I can go down; perhaps later. I don't feel a bit well."

Rachel was at her friend's side in an instant, her cheery, round face full of compassion.

"You do look white," she said, "and your eyes are as big as saucers. Won't you try and see if a cup of tea helps you? Do put that heavy child down; I should think this hot day was enough without that."

But Jo held her little charge until, Mrs. Dawson and Rachel having gone off in great spirits, though full of sympathy for the one left behind, she was alone. Then, putting the baby and Rosy to bed, she went down-stairs, where old Mrs. Jones was having a cup of tea, and asking her to "keep an ear" to the children, she put on her hat and went out of the house.

"SHE NOTED HOW MUCH CLEARER OF COLOR AND THINNER OF FACE SHE WAS."

Faith and Miss Grace would, she knew, sit with the party from Mrs. Burton's, and as she had helped set the tables that afternoon, she knew where their places would be—directly at the upper end of the longest table, close to a window, which, on so warm a night as this, would surely be open. So, thought Jo, if she went down there a little later, she could at least be within sight and sound of her beloved friend; and perhaps she herself was so changed Faith would not know her, even if she were in the room helping to wait on the table, as she had promised to do. Jo had taken a critical look at herself in the glass, noted how much clearer of color and thinner of face she was; but she had only the faintest idea of what impression she used to produce on anybody's mind. Looking at her quiet, earnest face, with its frame-work of perfectly smooth hair, and its grave, dark eyes, the girl had asked herself, with a wistful smile, what did "Jo Markham" look like? She felt sure it was not quite like this.

By eight o'clock the supper party would be assembled,

Jo loitered about the beach road while the summer dusk gathered and the evening closed in. The warm, still night was very lovely out-of-doors; but Jo was feverishly eager to see Faith, and as soon as the shadows were close enough she made her way to the school-house, and around to that end where she knew the window opened upon a bit of lawn.

Jo stood still a moment near the open window. She hardly dared go farther; but at last courage came. She knelt down on the soft, dry grass, and keeping in shadow at one side, looked in.

The room presented the appearance customary on such occasions. A large decorated platform at the upper end was deserted now, but would, as Jo knew, soon be occupied by the performers and speakers of the evening. Meanwhile there was animation enough in the scene below. Three long tables were filled to their utmost capacity with the school committees from different neighboring towns, as well as those of Burnham itself—with teachers, friends, visitors, and "sympathizers." Never had Burnham gathered together such a company; but the eyes of one observer sought one face and figure only, and these, with a quick drawing in of her breath, Jo had found.

The long, narrow table reached to the very farthest point of the room, and was drawn as near as possible to the window. At the head sat Mr. Burton, his broad shoulders almost framed by the lintel, but at his right was Faith; and Jo, crouching in the still, cool darkness outside, feasted her lonely eyes eagerly upon her.

Faith was talking and listening with a look of soft pleasure and interest, and it gave her cheeks their old pretty pink color once again. Jo took in every detail of the dear face, every detail of the dress she wore: the soft white muslins, and ribbons of creamy satin; the little chip bonnet, with its tuft of buttercups and delicate green leaves. How pure and simple and like Faith it all looked! Jo strained her ears to listen for every word that fell from Miss Emerson's lips. After some remarks from Mr. Burton,

"It is too bad," Faith was saying; "I wish I might stay, but, you see, my cousin Bertie is so interested in this trial, as, indeed, every one in Ashfield."

"I think they have taken a long time to find the murderer," said Mrs. Burton. "If it had been in Burnham now, dear Miss Emerson, we wouldn't have left a stone unturned."

And the little old lady laughed quizzically, while her son said, "My mother means she would have taken it in hand herself. I don't doubt she would have unearthed the real culprit."

"The chief trouble," said Faith's soft voice again, "seems to be that the very witnesses are such a low set it is hard to rely upon them for anything. Still, my cousin Bertie, who is studying law, you know, in Mr. Hogenkamp's office, maintains that he believes this lad, Sandy Martin, is not guilty. But everything is against him. He was seen quarrelling with the young man in the afternoon, and threatening him, and they were also seen together about an hour before the man was murdered. The boy is in a condition of the most abject terror. What goes chiefly against him is that he ran away directly afterward, and has only just now been caught."

"Dear me! dear me!" ejaculated Mrs. Burton.

Faith's voice went on:

"You see, the very same night poor young Moxon was murdered there was an attempted robbery at our house, and so the village constables were in a general state of confusion the next day, as one of the men concerned in the robbery was an old offender, and they had been on the lookout for him a long time. He escaped, and was caught again, and died soon afterward. This boy, Sandy Martin, was his son. It was a dreadfully exciting night for Ashfield, I assure you. The Rexfords' yacht was plundered, and the robbery, or attempt, at our house, took place precisely at the hour of the murder."

"What was that?" exclaimed Mrs. Burton, looking toward the window.

A sound had come in suddenly, something like a moan or the spasmodic drawing of a breath; but Jo had shrunk back, away out of hearing or sight, creeping on like some wounded creature until she reached a place where she could sit down in the darkness alone, and there, clasping her arms about her knees, she let her head fall down upon them.

She had thought something would happen; and now it had. And although in the most confused, bewildering fashion, she felt sure that it would take her back to Ashfield to be disgraced forever. The poor child tried vainly to move her lips in prayer, to think how she could avert so terrible an evil, so dark a future as that which seemed to shape itself in hideous forms before her closed and aching eyes. She had crept away because she could not listen to any more; she had heard enough; but she felt that on the morrow she ought to seek out Faith and tell her all.

When she could move she made her way slowly and very wearily back to the store, still thinking and thinking, and trying to feel sure that she need not make herself known while Faith and Miss Grace were here. Oh, if only Faith had mentioned her—Jo; if she could have formed some idea of her former benefactress's feelings about her and her running away! And then poor Jo wondered if she was forgotten.

Mrs. Jones was eager to hear some account of the festivity, and disappointed that Mary Brooks had nothing to tell; but the girl's haggard face was excuse enough for her going directly to bed, where little Jo in the crib at her side was a sort of comfort not unmixed with pain, for as the girl bent over the child she loved so truly a pang shot through her heart. When they "knew all," would they ever speak to her, or let her touch or kiss little Jo again?

Ashfield meant disgrace in Jo's mind, and yet she felt sure that to Ashfield she must go.

Rachel came home late and was soon asleep; but for Jo the hours of the night were long and weary, and before sleep her resolution had come. Early the next day she would go to Mr. Burton's and present herself to Faith. What would the latter say on hearing the story Jo would have to tell?

A FIFTEENTH CENTURY STORY.

BY ESTHER CARR.

PART III.

THE artist household in the Koev Straat was early in its habits, even among the early-rising Ghenters; and the following morning, their simple breakfast over, Hubert Van Eyck and Peter Van Baerle were already in the studio by six o'clock preparing for the day's work. Margaret, busied with household matters, was not up on her precious diadem and resume her sitting till two or three hours later. Hubert had plenty to work at meanwhile.

Suddenly the door communicating with his brother's workshop burst open, and John Van Eyck rushed into the studio, his face pale with dismay and anger. In his hand he held some fragments of colored glass, and striding up to where Hubert stood, threw them down on the floor at his feet. "Look!" he cried, his voice choking with passion. "Last night's work!"

"What!" Hubert exclaimed, in equal dismay; "broken your precious enamel? But how, brother—how?"

"How, indeed?" John answered. "That is what I have come to discover!" and he looked from Hubert to Peter Van Baerle and to Margaret, who, hearing the crash of the broken glass on the floor, had come from the sitting-room to see what was the matter, and now stood aglazed at the sight before her and her brother's anger. "You heard my strict orders, Hubert, yesterday, that no one was to go in yonder," he pointed to the door; "Margaret and Peter heard it also. This studio door is locked every night, and no one has access to it or to the inner room but ourselves. The glass has not broken itself," he went on, with a grim smile. "It requires not to be one of the Wise Men to say that some one has broken it—some one has destroyed the fruits of my months and months of thought and endeavor."

The inventor's anger was quieting down to sorrow.

"Poor John! poor brother!" Hubert Van Eyck said, patting the other's shoulder affectionately, while the tears stood in his own eyes; and then, as if by mutual consent, both the brothers looked at Peter Van Baerle.

"Monseigneur, at any rate, is safe from suspicion," John said. "He left soon after one o'clock yesterday. He has not been in the house all night."

Could any suspicion attach to the boy at whom they were looking, and whose usually rather stolid face now bore an expression of amazement mixed with sorrow, as he stood with open mouth and honest round eyes staring at his masters, apparently unconscious that any suspicion could attach to him. It was not until Hubert, still looking full at him, put the direct question, "Peter, know you aught of this?" that, with a start, he became aware that he was suspected.

"I—I, master?" he exclaimed, and the earnest denial that followed convinced Margaret of his innocence. But the very haste with which it was given, making the boy stammer and grow red, had, alas! rather the contrary effect on her brothers. And yet why should it have been Peter Van Baerle? Or if Peter, then had he broken the enamel only by accident? for a pupil whom John Van Eyck had treated so kindly could never have done it from malice. It had been caused by an act of disobedience, perhaps curiosity. He had disobeyed the order given, and was now afraid to confess it.

"Peter disobey? Peter afraid?" René of Anjou exclaimed, indignantly, when, arriving by-and-by, he was told by Margaret of the misfortune, and found the little household in unusual excitement. "I would answer for Peter with my life!" and quietly taking each of the brothers aside separately, the young Prince strove earnestly to plead the cause of his fellow-pupil, and to convince them how impossible it was, first, that Peter should have disobeyed such strict orders; secondly, that supposing him to have disobeyed, he should not own it.

To a certain extent René succeeded. They knew Peter's character even better than he did, and until now they had trusted him in all things. They were anxious not to believe him in fault, and that has much weight in most judgments. But monseigneur must see that the evidence was strongly against Peter. If he had not destroyed the fruit of all John's labor, who had?

"May it not rather be, dear Master Hubert," René said, lowering his voice and looking over his shoulder as he spoke, "that the Prince of Darkness himself has sent some evil spirit to work this mischief? Does he not know that you and Master John are forever toiling against him; that works such as these"—he pointed to the paintings before him—"are works of light, and turn men's hearts away from him? Oh, believe this to have been through supernatural agency rather than through Peter's fault!"

Hubert smiled sadly. Not that he questioned the possibility of what René suggested, but the evil deed might have been put by Satanias into the heart of Peter Van Baerle just as easily as it could have been caused by the more manifest interference of an evil spirit.

For a day or two matters went on quietly and much as usual in the Van Eyck's house—externally at least. After his first anger and disappointment had subsided, John Van Eyck had set to work at once to repair the harm done; and as his brother encouragingly said, it was, after all, only a temporary disappointment and a matter of time. He had mastered the secret of the enamel, and had no longer difficulties of discovery to contend against. Though he could not show the first-fruits of his labor, the second might be better still. John was less confident. What if no one had broken the glass, and it was the natural result of the chemicals employed, which had not stood the test of fire? Of course he must begin again. John had not served his patient apprenticeship as a discoverer in vain. Had not he and Hubert toiled long and perseveringly together at that oil medium in painting, their discovery of which was to mark an epoch in the history of art?—that oil medium which would set at defiance the damp of these northern climates, and preserve the creations which in the method of painting used at that time ran such risks?

No extra precautions were taken; indeed, there could not be, as the studio door had always been locked at night, and John Van Eyck's workshop could only be reached through the studio, while the windows were too high for the room to be entered through them. Neither was Peter Van Baerle watched by the brothers. They would trust him still, and if a doubt existed as to the accident, he should have the benefit of it. But though outwardly quiet, the peace of the little household had been disturbed. Peter looked gloomy and depressed. Margaret often caught herself looking at him and wondering, though she always reproached herself for the doubt. René of Anjou alone was firm in his unshaken trust in the boy.

But this calm did not last long. One morning when John Van Eyck's second attempt at enamelling on glass was near completion he found, on opening the workshop, that his hidden enemy had been at work again, and had destroyed for the second time the result of his anxious labors.

"I must lose my night's rest, then, it seems," John Van Eyck said, shrugging his shoulders. By this time anger and disappointment had given way to the determination not to be foiled which lies at the root of the character of every real pioneer. "Whoever the secret enemy may be, he will have to be wary to escape me. I shall watch to-night." And as he spoke he looked sternly at Peter Van Baerle. It was absurd to doubt any longer. It could be no other than this boy (alas that he should be forced to think it!), this traitor whom they had treated as their own flesh and blood.

That night and the next—his third attempt recommenced in the workshop—John Van Eyck watched as he had said, watched at the open door between the two rooms, so that he could at the same time command the entire length of the studio. But he watched in vain. Neither Peter nor any one else, human or spiritual, appeared. Once, indeed, his attentive ear caught within, not outside the room, a slight sound, and he listened eagerly, prepared to dart out upon the offender, be he who he might. But it was not repeated, and it had been so slight that it might have been a bat at the window, or the creaking of one of the oak chests in the studio; it might even have been merely the sound of his own loudly beating heart, exaggerated by the silence of the night.

It was Monday, the 11th September, 1420. For only a few days longer was René of Anjou to profit by the lessons of his beloved masters before going back to Bar with the Cardinal. On that day he had spent the afternoon instead of the morning in the studio, and John Van Eyck, "John the Painter," as he was perhaps best known, was now correcting a copy the young Prince had been attempting of Margaret's head, as painted by Hubert in the Virgin of the "Agnus Dei." It had seemed to the little group in the studio that the stir and bustle of the city sounded unusually loud. There was a murmur of voices sometimes raised to angry tones, and a tumult which the ordinary traffic of the day scarce accounted for. And when hurried steps were heard ascending the stairs, and the Abbé de Lagny, agitated out of his usual calm manner, came hastily into the studio, the cause of this disturbance was known.

Evil tidings had come to the Comte de Charolais, and the abbé, being then at the castle, had heard them—tidings of horror, indeed. The Duke of Burgundy, as René knew, had gone to meet Charles the Dauphin at Montereau, and there the Duke had been treacherously murdered, almost at Charles's feet. Of the ten knights who had accompanied the Duke on to the bridge, eight were wounded and taken prisoners, one lay dead, and the Sire de Neufchâtel alone had escaped and brought the news to Philip of Charolais. The whole palace was in terrible commotion and distress, Philip about to take horse at once for Malines and the Hague to advise with the Bishop of Liège and other friends, so that he might at once avenge his father's death.

All this the abbé related to the peaceful workers in the studio with as full particulars as his haste and breathless condition would allow. "The poor Countess Michelle is dreadfully overcome," the abbé went on. "Alas! is she not the Dauphin's sister? Meantime Master John, the Count desires your presence at the castle. He would see you before he sets out."

"And the young Prince?" Hubert said, anxiously, looking from De Lagny to John Van Eyck, who had already started up to leave the house: "has anything been decided about him? I would not alarm him or you, M. l'Abbé, but an extra escort should be sent for him this evening. Our people of Ghent, when they are once aroused—you hear them now?" (the noise without was increasing; bells were tolling from the various churches, feet hurrying into the Place close by; the sound that had lately seemed but a murmur of voices was now becoming an angry roar)—"are not easily quieted. Our little Prince in all reason cannot be suspected. But there is no reason in an angry mob; and his sister is Dauphiness of France."

"I fear nothing," the boy said, laughingly, laying his hand on the little sword at his side.

"Your caution is a right one, Master Hubert," the abbé answered, with a respectful gesture to the boy, "and affects no one's courage. The Cardinal in his anxiety for the Comte de Guise has already thought of this necessary precaution. He bade me ask you of your courtesy to let the Prince remain here till late in the evening, by which time he trusts the tumult may have ceased. He will then send an escort for him."

But now Margaret Van Eyck hesitatingly drew near, and murmured something to her brother.

"The Blue Chamber, Margaret? Yes; the thought is a good one.—My sister suggests, M. l'Abbé, that if his Eminence would so far honor us as to allow the Count to be our guest for to-night, and he did not disdain to accept our humble hospitality, we have a room ready to receive him."

"And one adjoining it for M. l'Abbé also," Margaret hastened to add, eager for the offer to be accepted. "And this would avoid the necessity for his returning through the streets at all till to-morrow."

"Dear Margaret, good Master Hubert, how delightful!" René cried, jumping about the studio, and clapping his hands in a very unprincely way. "Yes! yes! yes! M. l'Abbé, a capital plan! Say yes at once. I am in great danger of being cut to pieces by the mob; I am afraid of everybody and everything; I do refuse to leave Master Hubert's house to-night. Tell my uncle what a coward I have grown, say anything you like, but let me stay here—do! do! do!" And René, having finished his dance, rushed up to the abbé, and flinging himself down on his knees, threw his arms round M. De Lagny's legs so as very much to imperil the priest's dignity.

The suggestion chimed in very well with the abbé's own opinion, and it seemed a harmless pleasure to accord his pupil, should the Cardinal's consent be obtained. He would therefore accompany John Van Eyck to the castle, and if the Cardinal agreed would return presently with the few necessaries that René and he required for the night. (No attendant, René begged—for once let him be free.)

The abbé and John the Painter left the house, Margaret went off to prepare for her distinguished guests, while Hubert Van Eyck settled to work again, René also making a useless attempt at doing so. But he was too much excited to persevere in anything for long, and unable to follow the good example of Peter Van Buerle, who plodded on at his copy, undisturbed by the unusual interruption to the daily habits of the house in the Koey Straat.

The evening was as delightful to the young Prince as he had anticipated. The Cardinal's permission had been obtained, and M. De Lagny had returned to accept the Van Eycks' hospitality, and to tell Hubert that his brother was detained at the castle. For this Hubert was well prepared, for it was not only as a favorite painter that Philip of Charolais regarded John Van Eyck: he was personally fond of his society, and John was the Count's secret councillor on more than one occasion. Now Philip, having set out on his mission of revenge, had commanded John the Painter to remain for the night at the palace, and use his influence to restore quiet among the household.

The evening meal over, Master Hubert and the abbé returned to the studio, which they paced in earnest conversation on the one great topic of the day, the murder of the Duke of Burgundy and the treachery of the Dauphin, who was in the secret of this vengeance of the Duke of Orleans for the share John the Fearless had had years ago in the murder of the Duke's father. And now this fresh assassination!

Meantime, through the open door the fair young figure of Margaret could be seen, seated at the organ that occupied one side of the inner room, while René, kneeling on one knee beside her in an attitude of almost devotion, rested his head on the back of her chair, completely absorbed by the grand sweet tones of the music Margaret played. This picture—framed by the door and excluding the figure of Peter, who was blowing the organ on the further side caught the artist eye of Hubert, and he paused for a moment and looked at it. Had Margaret not already sat for his Madonna, here was a St. Cecilia ready to his hand!

"THE FAIR YOUNG FIGURE OF MARGARET SEATED AT THE ORGAN, AND RENÉ KNEELING BESIDE HER"

Then René's clear voice sang one of the chants, the girl playing a few chords in accompaniment, and when the music ceased, music of another sort echoed at intervals through the doorway, the sound of fresh young voices and ringing laughter.

"It is good for him, an evening like this," the abbé said, as he heard René's laugh—"good for him to feel free, like any other boy of his years, and to be with young people nearer his own age. The Cardinal is an old man, and I—well, I am not a very young one." And it had been good for M. De Lagny too, who had thoroughly enjoyed his talk with Master Hubert. But what neither the painter nor the abbé had overheard was the whispered talk between René and Peter Van Baerle, which had taken place not many minutes before. Indeed, Margaret had not heard it either. But René's eyes, brimful of excitement and importance, might have told the elders, had they been on the alert, that something was in the wind, for even Peter's stolid face showed signs of animation.

HOW TO MAKE A TENNIS NET.

BY CHARLES LEDYARD NORTON.

HERE is a great demand for nets nowadays. They are wanted for tennis and badminton and hammocks, not to mention the miles of seine that fishermen use. They are even used for decorative purposes, and I have lately seen several rooms successfully draped with sea stained fathoms of old net. How is it made? Well, by far the greater portion is made by machinery, but every fisherman must know the hand-stitch in order to repair rents made by the wear and tear of daily use.

And it is a convenient art for any one to know. Last summer a stray calf played the mischief with Nell's tennis net, and, as I was passing, I saw her trying to tie it together. As she made rather poor patchwork of it, I asked her to let me try, and in ten minutes I had mended it so that twenty feet away you would not know it had been broken. Nell learned the stitch, and is now making a hammock in variegated colors for fancy-work.

The meshes can be made with the fingers alone, but if much work is to be done, a netting needle and a mesh-stick are necessary. These are shown in the initial letter with which this article begins. The needle is filled by winding the twine around the tine in the eye of the needle, then down one side through the notch at the other end, up the other side, round the tine again, and so on until the needle is full. The mesh-stick may be square or round, or in fact any shape, and eight or ten inches long. For a mesh measuring one inch and a half on each side, a stick three inches in circumference is necessary. In other words, the mesh is just twice the size of the stick.

The knot is the same for all kinds of netting. It is variously known to sailors as a "fisherman's bend," a "bucket hitch," or a "sheet-bend."

Now it is very easy, with the tools in hand and the learner looking on, to show how this hitch is made, but it is not so easy to make it plain with nothing but pen and pencil.

Suppose we tie together the ends of a piece of twine of, say, a foot long, and hang it over a hook or a door knob, or anything that will hold it firmly. (See a, Fig. 1.)

In this figure R and L represent the right and left hands. Pass the needle up through the loop a, and hold the twine with the thumb of the left hand at L. Throw a turn of the twine so that it will rest on and over the left hand and wrist, and over the loop b. Then pass the needle up through the space marked x. Pull it up and through, and "haul taut" slowly (c). The knot will take the form shown, which is the same as that seen in Fig. 2, and only needs tightening to make it firm. A moderate amount of practice will enable one to go through these motions very rapidly and easily.

Such is a single stitch. Now let us see how to make a net, say a tennis net, to begin with. Tighten the knot c, Fig. 1, and, holding the mesh-stick in the left hand, lay the twine over the stick, the knot resting just at its edge (Fig. 3). Pass the needle up through the loop, draw the twine tightly around the stick, and then throw the turn over the wrist, and make the same knot as in Fig. 1.

Pass the twine once more around the stick, and take still another stitch through the original loop. Now slip the whole affair off from the mesh-stick, and you have two half meshes fast to the original loop. These are marked 1 and 2 in Fig. 4.

Holding the stick as before, make No. 3 in the bight of 2 (bight is the proper term for the end of a loop) just as 1 and 2 were made in the original loop. Then make No. 4 in No. 1. This mesh, numbered 4, is the first complete one made, and forms, in fact, the corner mesh of the net. No. 5 is also made through No. 1, the knots resting one on top of the other.

The rest of the meshes follow in order as numbered, and when a few rows have been made back and forth, the work may be stretched out with the hands, and will be found quite like the real thing.

The operation of taking two stitches through the last mesh of each row is in fact "widening." It is kept up for the entire length of the net on the edge which represents the top. On the other edge, however—the one which is to form the end of the net—it must be changed to narrowing as soon as the full width—three feet—has been reached.

Narrowing is done by passing the needle and taking the stitch through the last two meshes of the preceding row. (Fig. 5.)

When the full length has been made, the narrowing takes place on both edges, and the fourth corner is finished off by taking the stitch through the last two meshes, and tying them fast.

In making the body of the net, care must be taken to narrow or widen at the right edges, and to guard against mistakes it is well to tie in a bit of colored ribbon as a reminder at the top or narrowing edge.

Boys will like to know that scoop-nets are worked in precisely this way. A small square is made at first, and then the work is continued, going round and round the edges of the square, narrowing whenever necessary, but at regular intervals, until the net is done. This is the only kind of net that cannot be made by machinery.

In tying the knots tight, the fingers become chafed unless a glove is worn, or unless, which is the better way, the needle is pointed directly at the knot last tied when the final pull is given. This brings the strain lengthwise of the needle, and as the hand grasps both needle and twine, there is no danger of chafing the skin or breaking the needle.

FIG. 3.

FIG. 4.

FIG. 2.—A BECKET-HITCH.

FIG. 5.

When a new needleful is to be attached, take the usual stitch on top of the last knot made, but be sure and make it particularly firm, and do not cut off the ends too close until the net is finished, and everything sure to hold fast.

I once knew of a netting club where the members—they were all girls—spent several pleasant afternoons making lawn-tennis nets. When they had as many tennis nets as they needed, they set to work at hammocks, and long before the hammocks were ready to be swung they found out that the prettiest and most useful things in the world would be little net-work apron pouches to hold the extra tennis balls when the first "service" should happen to be a good one. These pouches were of colored twine, and made a pretty addition to a tennis costume.

A SHIPWRECKED CREW: AN ADVENTURE IN THE EASTERN SEAS.

BY DAVID KER.

"YOU were talking just now of having seen lakes and palm-trees in the desert, which melted away as you came closer to them," said Captain G—, as we paced the quarter-deck together. "Well, I can't say that I have ever seen that, but I once saw something just as queer in the tropical seas. It was when I was making my first voyage in command as master of the old Sea-Queen, a trading bark that used to run between Liverpool and Singapore in the old sailing-ship days, when steamers were just beginning to be heard of.

"Among my passengers was a young captain in the English army, who was going out to join his regiment. A very pleasant young fellow he was, and capital company on a long voyage like that—always laughing and telling good stories, and quite ready to enjoy a joke even when it went against himself.

"Of course—as always happens when soldiers and sailors get together—we were constantly disputing whether the redcoat or the bluejacket was the better man; and whenever anything went wrong with either of us, the other would say, 'Ah, that's just like a sailor,' or else, 'Soldiers are always doing things like that.' But it was all done in good-humor, and we weren't a bit the worse friends for it.

"Well, one fine evening, when we were almost across the Bay of Bengal, and bowling along with a fair wind right for the Straits of Malacca, I and the passengers were sitting on deck under the awning, and Captain Elliot was telling us how he and his men had once scrambled up a steep ridge in the Himalaya Mountains (with the mist so thick that they could hardly see where they were going), to attack some native tribe or other that had been misbehaving itself.

"We were picking our way along as best we might," said he, "with the cold gray cloud all around us like a wall, when suddenly there loomed up just in front of us the dim outline of a large body of armed men advancing through the mist to attack us. The alarm was given instantly, and we opened fire upon them at once. We had let fly three volleys before we began to notice that they didn't return our fire, and then we discovered that what we had been firing at was simply the reflection of our own figures upon the mist, like that thing in Germany that they call the Spectre of the Brocken."

"Well," said I, when we had done laughing, "it's just in cases of that sort that we have the advantage of your landsmen. A sailor's eye, now, would have seen through that thing at once."

"Yes," answered the Captain, who was one of those fellows that are never at a loss for an answer, "a sailor's eye must be good, for if I may judge by the tales I've heard of sea-serpents and all that, it sometimes sees what don't exist at all."

"And then they all laughed again, and I felt rather foolish.

"Early the next morning I was having a look all round through my glass as usual, when all at once, a good bit away on our starboard bow, I saw something very much like a boat. I took another look, and sure enough, as well as I could make out, it was a small boat with four men in her, seemingly making little or no way through the water, from which I judged that she must have lost her oars, or else that her crew were too weak to work them.

"I must say I rather wished that they had met some other ship than mine; for by going out of our course to help them we should lose our fair wind, and delay ourselves a good deal just when we were in a hurry to reach Singapore. But I wasn't so mean as to think of forsaking the poor fellows just for that, especially as the only land near them was the north end of Sumatra, and you know what a savage place that is; so I tacked and stood right for them.

"By this time all the passengers were up alongside of me, staring at the shipwrecked boat with all their eyes; and Captain Elliot had just taken my glass to look at her, when he burst out with a roar of laughter that seemed as if it would shake him all to bits. And well he might; for when I looked through the glass again I saw that my 'shipwrecked boat' was only an old tree, and that the 'four men' were its four branches sticking up.

"How about a sailor's eye now, Captain?" said Elliot. "It seems to me that you didn't exactly see through that thing at once. Anyhow, I hope that after this you won't despise us poor soldiers quite so much."

"And you may be sure I didn't."

THE DRAWING CLUB.

BY ALICE DONLEVY.

IT was Leonard Lee who proposed it, and Leonard, aided by his three aunts, always succeeded in anything not needing two strong feet, for Leonard was lame.

Like Leonard, Edith and Rosa had taken drawing lessons. The cousins lived near, and spent part of every day together.

"The Drawing Club will give us something different to do," said Edith, when the subject was proposed.

"It will be fun to manage ourselves," said Rosa.

"Whom shall we have in the club?" asked Edith.

"All our friends who can draw," said Leonard.

"We ought to ask Norman," exclaimed Edith. "He is always cutting cats and tigers and lions out of black paper."

"Well, that is drawing. My teacher tells us that any way of expressing form is drawing," said Leonard. "People kept record of battles, before the alphabet was invented, in picture characters. My drawing teacher drummed that into my ear for a year. I will call your attention," he continued, imitating a lady's voice, "to this fact: you draw what you see; you write what you know. This box has four sides, you know. You see two sides; you draw two sides."

"Rosa," said Edith, "do you remember the Picture Day, when we looked at other people's drawings of dogs of different countries and different centuries?"

"Yes," said Rosa. "Let us have a Picture Day for our club."

"Tell Clarita to send that drawing she made last summer of the boat-house to admit her to the club," said Leonard.

"How often shall we meet, Leonard?" asked Rosa.

"The club shall meet Saturday mornings, and we will draw from nature; no copying allowed. Each one must bring paper, pencils, and knife."

"But," said Rosa, "if you ask Clarita to send in a drawing, why not ask everybody?"

ROSA'S LEAF

"Yes, of course; every one must bring a drawing," said Edith.

"I will write the terms of admission in the invitations, and the admission drawings shall belong to the club; then the club will start life with some property."

Leonard's aunt Ida now looked up from her embroidery. "Will not the size of your room limit the number in your club?"

"Why, we had forgotten about the room; but I think mother would let us have the dining-room. It has a long extension-table, which we could all sit at," said Rosa.

"How many can sit around?" inquired Aunt Ida.

Before they could answer, Dr. Lee, who had heard part of the discussion about the club, came in with two Japanese trays. One was smaller than the other. One held a half sheet of sand-paper, and the other a file.

"I present the Drawing Club with two pencil-dust holders," said Dr. Lee. "The coarse file will sharpen the wood, the fine file will point the black-lead."

"Oh, uncle, how nice! How did you think of it?" asked Rosa.

"I remembered seeing files used for sharpening pencils in Mr. Nast's studio," said the Doctor. "The cork handle is my own addition. These trays will help to keep your club-room clean."

"We haven't a club-room yet. Rosa proposes our dining-room, but," said Edith, hanging her head, "when the girls from school came to sew for a fair, they left the room in such a mess that mother said she would have no more societies at our house."

"Then I will be your landlord," said Dr. Lee, "on one condition."

"What is it?" they all asked.

"I will tell the club at its first meeting."

Saturday morning came. Dr. Lee's door-bell rang seven times long before nine o'clock. Precisely at nine the ninth member of the club hung his hat in the hall.

"We are to have the back room," said Leonard, "because it has a north window, and the sun will not shine in our eyes while we draw." Leonard knocked at a partly open door.

MARION'S SPRIG.

"Come in," Dr. Lee was standing near one window where all the inside shutters kept out the light. The upper half of the inside shutters of the second window was folded back, letting in the light from the top. The lower half of the shutters was closed. "I am glad to see all my new tenants; for the members of the Drawing Club are my tenants if I am the landlord, and I let the club-room on condition that you leave everything in the room as you found it."

"Those are easy terms, sir," said Norman.

"I hope to see the club fully organized next Saturday. Good-morning."

The Doctor left the room, and the club proceeded to organize itself, the first thing to be settled being the choice of seats. The room was a bedroom, from which the bed had been removed, and it contained, besides the ordinary furniture of such a room, one or two other pieces which the thoughtful "landlord" had foreseen would be useful. Finally it was settled that Marion, Norman's sister, should have the pine table, Rosa a little square one, Clarita (as being a more advanced student than the other girls) the desk, while Norman politely removed the wash-bowl, and made room for Dora at the wash-stand. The rest sat at a long table in the middle of the room.

"Leonard," whispered Edith, "not one has brought rubber. Clarita is the only one who has paper."

"Suppose we draw with pen and ink this morning, then," said Leonard. "I have plenty of smooth paper and some pens, which I take pleasure in presenting to the club."

"Every pen-holder is different in looks, length, and thickness," exclaimed Dora.

"That was Aunt Ida's idea," explained Leonard. "Here's more of her work," pointing to the top of another low book-case. There were nine bottles filled with wet sand; in each stood a sprig of holly leaves. On the mantel stood ten tiny easels, each holding a half-sheet of commercial note-paper. The ruled lines went down, not across. Exactly in the middle of each paper a single sprig of holly was pinned.

"Now," said Leonard, "each choose a sprig to draw."

Norman had been told by Leonard what to do, so he began to cut a holly leaf out of black paper with scissors. Then Leonard placed an easel back of Norman's bottle of holly. The leaves looked sharp against the white paper. While Norman was cutting out his leaf, Leonard took a stick of India ink and rubbed it with water into nine clam shells. Then Norman laid his black paper leaf on the smooth white paper, and drew around it with his pen, making the leaf black with the pen.

"Wait; that scratches," said Leonard, immediately bringing two vases from the top of the book-case, smelting of camphor. "Here is a brush with a tooth-pick handle. That is better for laying the ink on thick."

The brushes were such as druggists sell.

"Can you give every one a brush?" asked Edith.

"Yes; I bought them on purpose," laughed Leonard. "Here, Marion, take the brush to make the back leaf darker."

"Why, time is up, and I haven't finished this one holly leaf," said Edith. "I have only begun."

"Well begun is half done," said Norman, laying down his brush, and the club adjourned until the next Saturday, not having accomplished much in actual drawing, but having at least made a start, and become interested in their work.

BABY'S QUIET TIME

BY JULIE M. LITTMANN.

THE clock on the nursery mantel
Is ringing a low, sweet chime,
Its six strokes telling plainly
It's baby's quiet time.

The big French doll in the play-house
Is dreaming, I suppose,
Of the merry times in Paris,
Of her hair and dainty clothes.

And the woolly lamb, and the lap-dog,
And the donkey that can bray,
Are falling asleep by the fire
In a quiet, peaceful way.

And mamma is telling a story
Of the bean-stalk Jack did climb,
And the golden head is nodding,
For it's baby's quiet time.

ROCKY CREEK, ARKANSAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I will tell about a little bird that I saw as I was coming from church one morning. It was on the ground, and had a large worm in its bill, and was striking it against the ground as if to kill it, and as it saw me it flew off a little way and began as before. I thought that it was trying to kill it before it carried it to its little ones or its wife. The other day as I was practising I heard a noise at the fire-place, and on going there, what do you think I found? Why, a lot of little birds (swallows) that had fallen down the chimney, and as it was raining, I picked them up and wrapped them warmly, until it stopped raining, and then I put them up the chimney as far as I could, and let them stay all night. But the old ones would not feed them, so I took them down, and one was dead, and the others looked as if they were nearly starved. I was greatly bothered about them, and did not know what to do; but at last I thought about putting them up the chimney upstairs, and I did so, but with little hope of the old ones feeding them, and I was sure certain that they would die that I did not go to look at them for fear they would be dying and calling for something to eat. But the old ones came and fed them, and I hear they are doing every day.

JANE A.

JEFFERSON COUNTY, KENTUCKY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I read in No. 323 an account of field-mice storing away their winter supply of nuts in granaries and in their hiding-places, written by Harper R. of Harper, Iowa. I suppose that the nuts were the hazel or wild filbert. I wish to ask Harper if he ever discovered any unsound or worthless nuts among those thus gathered. It seems that God has taught by instinct all animals that it is useless to put away things that are of no value. In my boyhood, when our beautiful beech forests were cut away, I have often examined after the immense flocks of wild pigeons that came to feed on the beech nut nuts, and I noticed they would fly over each other and gather the nuts from under the leaves, they would move so fast that a good runner could not move as fast as they, yet I could never discover a single sound nut left in their track; and in the thousands that we would kill to save the mast for our hogs and would dress for our tables, I have never found in them even a single decayed or faulty nut. We might learn a useful lesson from these birds and little animals in regard to putting away and keeping those things which are of value. I wish to ask HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE: Have taken it for my children for several years. They have all of their numbers nicely kept, and will have them soon.

OLD BOY.

NEW YORK CITY.

We are Dr. Douglas's little girls, and our dear papa was General Grant's beloved physician. Our names are Josie and Hattie, and we are eleven and ten years old. We have taken within very few weeks the HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I cannot tell you the great pleasure it has given us, or how very much we have enjoyed it. Dear mamma reads the stories to us every evening as we sit around the fire, and we often say that we are sorry we have never taken the magazine before, for I think all the stories are very good, and our dear papa is a way now for his health. Ever since General Grant died he has not been well, for he was up day and night with him, and it made papa very ill. When he was watching the Virginia sail away with my dear papa and sister, I thought he looked exactly like a sick man. He has now bought a new slat-top cap for his head, and he did look so lovely in it that I thought I would like to introduce him to our kind Postmistress some day.

How very interesting the account of St. Mary's Hospital was, and how delighted the dear little ones must have been with their Christmas gift. I wish we could hardly imagine their joy and pleasure when they saw the silver-quoits and other nice gifts that the kind, thoughtful sisters had sent them. I am a sufferer. It is no wonder that they are sorry to have such a pleasant home and kind friends when they recover and could enjoy themselves.

Dear Little Fairfax Payne! What a sweet little girl she must be, and how good of her to make so great a sacrifice! I am going to try to be a good girl.

something at least to the purse. I think it would be very pleasant for us all if Ora Oliver M. would write and tell us more about her. I am glad that Harry F. had such a happy Christmas, and hope by next Christmas he will be well.

Our town is a very pretty one, and there is a great deal of beautiful scenery. By way of saying good-bye to you, I will tell you something about what is known as Pot Rock. It is a great flat rock, with every here and there little round holes, or pots, as they are called, and it is surrounded by little stones having been whirled round and round by the river, which of course at one time covered the whole rock. It is a charming place to go picnicking.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have no pet except three dolls, named Pansy, Rose, and Ruth. Pansy is a small wax doll with brown eyes and golden hair; Rose is a large wax doll with hazel hair, blue eyes, and blue hair; Ruth is a French doll twenty-two inches high, with golden hair and very large blue eyes. I go to a private school on Madison Avenue, New York, where I study spelling, definitions, history, grammar, arithmetic, French, and Latin; I also take drawing lessons.

ELMIRA A. F.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I thought I would write a letter to you, because I have been wanting to do so for a long time. I have a book entitled The Boys of '76, all about the war between America and England, and how the Washington soldiers fought his men, and how they fought and fought, and made the British lay down their arms. I liked it so much I read it once and again. I wish you would write me a letter, and live in Putnam Avenue, and there is an electric light on the corner of Bedford and Putnam Avenues.

I wonder if Russell will be surprised if I should whisper to him that I think I knew his pretty golden-haired mamma when she was just the age he is now.

NEW YORK CITY.

Little Deborah—or Ora, as she is called—is three years old. While traveling to meet her father, the train passed over a very high trestle-work bridge. Ora looked out of the window until she got pale with fright, then quietly turned to her mother and said, "My papa would ring the bell here." Her mother read her those of the little letters in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE that she could understand. Soon after, she brought me a drawing she had drawn, which she called a baby, and said, "Here is Ora's letter to you." Her mother said, "Read it to me." Ora looked at the drawing, and said in a nervous, trembling tone, "This baby has long clothes. This baby is laughing. This baby wakes up when you take her up. There, that's all." For a first letter we thought it quite clever.

Ora's devoted auntie.

AMANDA SHAW E.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have three pets—a German blackbird, an English thrush, and a bullfinch. I go to school and study reading, writing, spelling, grammar, history, drawing, and other lessons. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it has been published. I went to a boarding-school in Duran, Connecticut, where my papa always sent it to me, and I read many away from it. I am twelve years old.

ROSTA MARIE G.

COWA, CALIFORNIA.

I live in Round Valley, which is surrounded by mountains. There is a small town called Covelo three miles away. The school that I go to is two miles away. I go on horse-back. I am about twelve miles away from the railroad. The roads are very bad in the winter, and sometimes there is a week that we cannot get any mail, and there are good many wild animals in the mountains around here, such as bears, wild cats, panthers, coyotes, and deer. This valley is called Round Valley because it is so nearly round.

It being seven miles long and five miles wide, it is a city miles from the Pacific Ocean. We have a nice flower garden in summer. We have horses, and I like to ride on horseback very much. I should very much like to correspond with May M., who lives in Adelago, Colorado, and I picked a letter from her.

DORA HESLEY.

DREHMAN, MASSACHUSETTS.

I had six hens, but a dog killed all but two of them, and a rooster and pullet were left. They were so useless that I sold them, and my grandmamma's with my uncle's hens, but when spring comes he will give them back to me, and I shall have some more to feed with me.

Last summer I went to Bethel in Maine. It is a country place, with trees and woods and mountains all around. There were wild strawberries in a field near the house, and I picked a great many of them. A deer came out of the woods near the house, and ate some of the grass there. Mr. V., the gentleman who kept the house, saw the deer. There were six springs near the house, and one was a mineral spring. I went fishing with my papa, and caught ten trout. I had a very nice time, and hope I shall go to Bethel next summer.

I am six years old, and go to a Kindergarten school. My mamma has written this letter, because I am so little, and I have a baby brother, Ned, and my brother Harry and I take the HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE together.

FREDERIC W. H.

MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

I live in the country, and enjoy skating, coasting, and all country sports. In the summer we go to my grandmamma's cottage at the seaside. It is not far from the city, and I have a very nice story of the "Ice-Yachts on the Shrewsbury" with a good deal of interest, and next summer I will write you all about the sailing-Station, which is a very nice place. One of the boys is a pretty little kitten, and I named him Benjamin, after the man who gave him to me, but he will call him Blue Eyes, and I named him me, and he has grown to be a large cat, but is very playful, and comes up very early in the morning and plays with me in bed.

F. G. T.

ASTORIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and like it very much. I think "The Ice Queen" and "Rolf Howe" were splendid. My home is near the village of Springdale, fifteen miles from the city, and is in a very nice place, and in the natural gas region. A great many persons here use gas for fuel, and also for heating and lighting some of the churches. There is an ice-pond about a mile from the city, and persons are allowed to skate upon it, providing they do not spit upon the ice. I go to school, and like it very much. I am seven years old, and wish some of the girls about my age would correspond with me.

ALICE M. C.

AC CHARENT BLANC, MONVILLE, FRANCE.

My dear LITTLE FREDERIC! This is the first letter I have written to the Postmistress. I think I cannot do better than begin to tell you about my pets. We have six rabbits, and not long ago had ten, but sent to have a cat after them. They were about a week old, and one morning we went to feed them, and there was only the poor mother left. We found two of them in the hatch, and the other two we could not find. We have thirteen fowls, fourteen pigeons, two doves that are very tame (they fly about the orchard, and always come back to me), and a very nice dog, called "Lutie," a very good dog; if we are in the woods and a tramp comes up to us, we have to hold the dog he is so fierce! A week ago we had some food deep; we had rare fun with it. We had a sled, and spent most of our time in sliding and snowball fights. I do not like France so well as the English do. I am seven years old, and English now. I have been here nearly two years. I wish I could remember how to speak Italian. When I first came to England I never spoke English.

DAISY.

SHELLWATER, MINNESOTA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I thought you would like to hear from a girl away up North, where the snow is very deep, and it is very cold, and which is not very large; it is about eighteen miles from St. Paul, which is the capital, and a very lovely city. They are having an ice festival here this winter. It is made entirely of ice. They are using snow-shoes, and have a toboggan coast. We are going to have a toboggan coast in this city, and they are having a toboggan suit. They are made mostly of white blankets, and are very pretty. They manufacture them in Sweden, and they are made with a coat to my home. My papa is warden of the prison. There are four hundred men and eleven women; all came because they were bad. To go back to the toboggan suit, they are just like a sled, but up at the end, and some are cushioned. When done, they cost all the way from four to ten dollars. I am not very strong, so I do not enjoy winter sports as much as some girls and boys do. Last summer I went with my papa and mamma to Lake Superior; Ashland was the name of the town. It is quite a summer resort for happy hunters and others. I had a very pleasant time. Indeed, the people were all so agreeable, and it was such a beautiful place. The hotel looked off the coast, and from the windows I could see the boats as they came in, and the passengers come on the dock. There is an iron dock, where they load iron, which comes from the hills, a short distance away. I should like to go again next summer. NELL R.

A WILD-CAT'S CUNNING.

It was a gloomy wet day in October, with a slight mist rising from the ground—for it had been raining for several days—when four or five of us boys started on a hunt for a wild-cat. The place we had chosen for our hunting ground was a large bottom covered with cane-brake and bushes, and extending from the junction of a small creek, called Smith's brook, with the Erie, and was divided by a long high ridge, between two hills back. After riding for about half an hour we came to the place where we were to begin the hunt. One of the party then started to bark at the bushes with the dogs, while the rest of us ascended the ridge and rode along slowly, waiting impatiently for the hounds to start at it. He heard a prolonged yelp off to the right, followed by another and another, until the whole pack had joined in. Upon hearing them we immediately rode to a high point some ten or twelve yards farther on, which commanded a view of the bottom below. The trail seemed to be very hot, but the dogs would not get to the right and make off up the bottom, while the hounds would keep on going round. In anticipation of this, we descended the hill and rode cut into the bottom, hoping to cut off the retreat of Mr. Cat. Sure enough, after a few minutes' waiting, a slight rustling of leaves about thirty yards in front announced its approach, and the second it started at our view. We stopped our horses perfectly still, and, as we were among the bushes, the cat didn't see us. After running a few paces he mounted the trunk which had been blown up to the top of the earth by a storm, and trotted rapidly up to the other end. Here, to our surprise, instead of jumping he leaped round and made off down the river, had understood the trick, and by the time the cat had hidden himself we heard them coming at full tilt. On they came, until they had jumped the log, and at that moment, and then, one after another, they leaped upon the trunk, running in Indian file up to the top of the log, where they were completely fooled, as they had thought the wild-cat had jumped off the end of the log. Finally, after running about in a confused manner for some minutes, they started off of the log track. As soon as the dogs had gone about half a mile, the cat jumped down, and would have made off, had not a shot from one of the party changed his mind. T. K.

I am almost sorry he did not escape.

EDNA, NEW YORK.
Santa Claus gave me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as one of my Christmas presents, and I like it the best of them all, for I have a new book every week. Mamma reads it to me. I like the story of the boys and the fairy stories best. I have a horse named Daisy, a dog, three cats, and a bird named Sweet. I have a dear little brother three years less than six years old.

Your loving friend, EDNA L. R.

NANAINO, B. C.
I live in a small city called Nanaino, on Vancouver Island. Coal-mining is the principal occupation in this place. My father is a gold-miner. He is now up in the Big Bend claims. He and my uncle own quite a number of quartz ledges, and have taken shares in a gold mine. I passed for the High School when I was nine years of age. W. B.

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA.

I am a little boy nine years old. I have never written an letter to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I intend to write one now, which I hope you will print. I go to school, and am in the Senior Third Book. It is very cold here; it was fifty days below zero in December. My father and mother has had a Christmas tree. I have two little brothers and a sister, named Clara, Henry and Arthur. In Christmas Eve papa and mamma were very busy fixing the tree. There were a lot of ornamental candles, some oranges, and bags of candies on the tree. My little brother Arthur had a rattling ball; he is only one year old. Henry got a little wooden horse, a drum, a little bell on wheels, a horn, and a set of candies. Clara got a big wax doll, a set of dishes, and a little kitchen with a fire place in it. Before Christmas Henry and I saved up all our money to buy mamma and papa Christmas presents: papa got two silk handkerchiefs, and mamma a crown fascinator and a push catched. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much; my papa has just subscribed for it. This is my own writing, and if you print this I will write another. Good-by. GEORGE G.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

I have taken the paper for over five years, and have never written before. I like Roxy much. My father's name is Leonard, my mother's name is William O. Stoddard, Howard Pyle, and Jimmy Brown. I liked "Two Arrows" and "Roll Home" very much, and I think "A Christmas Party" is going to be here also. I have two brothers and one sister; their names are Ella, Scott, and Lanham. Lanham is two years old, and the baby and pet; he is my only pet. I love to read, and I read great deal. I would like some little girl eleven years old my own age, living in Europe, to write to me and tell about some of the cities there. N. C. JENKINS.

A little boy named Dixon was in the habit of running away. One evening his parents missed him. They hunted for him everywhere, and everybody in town had heard about his missing. His father and sisters hunted in the streets every place they could think of, and as there happened to be a spy-hole in the town at that time, his sisters were afraid they had taken him. At last they met, and agreed that whoever found him should bring a card back. At last they thought they would go home, and see if anything had been heard; but just as they got home his aunt found him in an outer shed fast asleep. There was great rejoicing in the family. The little boy has never run away since. BLANCHÉ VAN B. (aged 11 years).

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBRASKA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I thought I would write a letter, as my other one was not printed. I am a little less than ten years old. One evening snow about fifteen inches deep. For a pet, I have a dog named Sport. I have lived here all my life. My papa and mamma came here about thirty years ago, and when they came they got a little baby wolf, and when there was a fire in town it would always howl about fifteen minutes before the fire started. At last they thought of an Indian it would sit upon its box and howl at him, and scare him away. Afterward, papa got a pet 'coon, and once he jumped from a yard, and when we saw it the dog was bringing some in his mouth, just as a cat does her kittens, but when he got to the fence he dropped the 'coon, stamped the fence, and only got away from the fence, but the 'coon would not come. Yours truly, GERTRUDE S. W.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

My brother takes your delightful magazine, but I assure you I enjoy reading it as much as he does. We live just across the bay from San Francisco, and take a trip there about once a week. My mother and only pet are a dog and a cat, but neither is very satisfactory, for the cat is sordid at home, and the dog is a little too affectionate. My father has a dog, but he has no proper place to keep them. A close cousin is a lovely little lake, called Lake Merritt; being salt, it is of course never freezes, and as snow is very scarce here, we cannot. I break the ice about the good times in winter that our Eastern cousins have. Nevertheless, we are proud of our glorious climate, and I fancy that I can earn good money to escape from their cold weather, for many of them, especially invalids, spend their winters here. ELLA G.

CHERRY BRANCH, MISSOURI, FRANCE.

I felt greatly interested in L. S. B.'s letter from Venice, and the description of St. Marco. I was there twelve years ago, and daily, at two o'clock, a thousand pigeons called by the name of St. Marco's Square, for in Venice a pigeon is never killed; it is considered as sacred. I think Venice a lovely place; so quiet, with only a constant splashing of cars. I break the ice about. Going in the gondolas is a great enjoyment, and a funeral on the water is a most solemn service. We were in Turin when the tunnel through Mount Blanc was opened. I was there at the fireworks, illuminations, etc.—and when we came to England we came through the tunnel, which is a very long and narrow, and it is very dark at that time, and it seemed as if daylight would never make its appearance. I was greatly interested with the account of "Jumbo." I have often given you him a rattling ball, and my sister has a rattling ball. I feel so sorry his death should have been such a sad one. I am afraid I am trespassing by writing too long a letter, so will close. Much love to the Postmistress and readers of our journal, young and old, from A. I. P.

A COMING PRIMA DONNA.

A LAUGHING CHORUS.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

OH, such a commotion under the ground

When March called, "Ho, there! ho!"

Such spreading of rootlets far and wide,

Such whispering to and fro!

And, "Are you ready?" the Snow-drop asked;

"'Tis time to start, you know."

"Almost, my dear," the Scilla replied;

"I'll follow as soon as you go."

Then, "Ha! ha! ha!" a chorus came

Of laughter soft and low

From the millions of flowers under the ground—

Yes, millions—beginning to grow.

"I'll promise my blossoms," the Crocus said,

"When I hear the bluebirds sing."

"And straight thereafter," Narcissus cried,

"My silver and gold I'll bring."

"And ere they are dulled," another spoke,

"The Hyacinth bells shall ring."

And the Violet only murmured, "I'm here."

And sweet grew the air of spring.

Then, "Ha! ha! ha!" a chorus came

Of laughter soft and low

From the millions of flowers

under the ground—

Yes, millions—beginning to grow.

Oh, the pretty, brave things!

Through the coldest days,

Imprisoned in walls of brown,

They never lost heart, though the blast shrieked loud,

And the sleet and the hail came down,

But patiently each wrought

her beautiful dress

Or fashioned her beautiful crown,

And now they are coming to brighten the world

Still shadowed by winter's frown;

And well may they cheerily laugh, "Ha! ha!"

In a chorus soft and low,

The millions of flowers hid

under the ground—

Yes, millions—beginning to grow.

THE TAG PUZZLE.

THERE are two things to be done with this puzzle: first make it; then do it. It is very easily made, and more easily done—provided you happen to do it; if not, you may rack your brains for an hour, and then be no nearer to the solution than before.

To make the puzzle, get a patent parcel or baggage tag, made of tough paper, such as expressmen use. In the centre of it cut a slot two inches long by three-sixteenths of an inch wide, as shown in Fig. 1. Then take a piece of blue ribbon five and a half inches long by half an inch wide, double it so as to make a loop, and stitch the two ends to the lower end of the tag, taking care to turn in an eighth of an inch of each end, so that the stitches may hold well. This done, procure a piece of yellow cigar ribbon about fourteen inches long; pass one end through the round hole in the upper end of the tag, then through the looped blue ribbon, then back through the round hole (see Fig. 2). To the two ends of the yellow ribbon sew pearl buttons, or rings, or small coins with holes in them, provided they be too large to pass through the round hole.

The puzzle is now made. The thing to be done is to remove the yellow ribbon from the blue without tearing, breaking, cutting, or otherwise defacing any part of the puzzle.

GIVING HIM HIS MONEY'S WORTH

UNCLE CHARLIE (to Neddie, who is making a terrific noise). "You, Neddie! Didn't you promise to play quietly when I gave you the nickel?" And now—

NEDDIE. "Yes, Uncle Charlie, and I have been quiet five cents' worth. G'lang!"

RÉNÉ.

A FIFTEENTH-CENTURY STORY.

BY ESTHER CARR.

PART XXX.

THE carillon in the belfry, chiming three-quarters past eleven, echoed through the profound stillness of the night in the artist's house. M. De Lagny, sleeping the sleep of a man with a good conscience—snoring a little, perhaps—heard it not. Neither was Margaret disturbed by the loud clanging of the bells as she lay asleep in her little white-curtained room, dreaming of angels in blue robes, and saints with golden aureoles which were to illuminate her MS. And Hubert, who had determined in his brother's absence to keep faithful watch in the studio over the great object of that brother's interest—alas! good Master Hubert, worn out with the day's work and excitement, with his unusually late conversation with the abbé, had suffered fatigue to overcome his good resolution.

Good Hubert Van Eyck, abandoning himself to reflection in his own room before beginning his night watch, was now sitting in that room, with his head bent forward and resting on his arms, fast asleep, forgetful for the time of any danger to John's work from his mysterious enemy, regardless if the danger came from without, of the risk Philip of Charolais' precious loan, the jewelled diadem, might run from midnight robbers.

As the carillon ceased, the door of the studio in the Van Eyck's house was noiselessly opened by a cautious hand. Then a figure slipped as noiselessly into the room, followed by another, and the door was gently pushed to but not closed. Both figures approached the heavy woollen curtain hanging over the window.

"He is asleep," the foremost of the two said to his companion in a scarcely audible whisper. "I saw him in his room as I passed down the stairs. A better chance for us, Peter. At dear Master Hubert's age, you know, men rarely see spirits from the other world; and ice may be useful to-night. This is the very hour—just before midnight. Watch well, Peter, and pray while you watch." And leaving sufficient space to keep the door of the workshop well in view from their post of observation, René of Anjou and Peter Van Baerle vanished behind the curtain, and like two knights-elect, began their vigil.

Five minutes passed, and five minutes more. Perfect silence reigned in the studio, and the two boys remained immovable on their watch. Then a sound so faint as to be scarcely a sound fell upon René's ear, and made his heart beat rapidly. But, René remembered, the noise that John Van Eyck had once, and once only, heard had not been louder than this. It was repeated. Could it be Hubert, roused from his sleep, and coming down to his neglected watch?

No; the sound came from the wide stone fire-place which I have described at one end of the room. A third time René heard it, and then—the moonlight from the upper and uncurtained windows falling full and bright upon the spot—René distinctly saw something move in the great open chimney. He grasped Peter's arm, and Peter, by a significant pressure in return, showed that he too had seen the movement. A foot now distinctly appeared—a leg—then another—and then, without sound, and as lightly as if made of air, a grotesque figure perched on the hearth, which a sudden light, other than the moonlight, illuminated.

"A gnome!" René whispered. The carillon rang out four quarters, and the great belfry clock slowly struck midnight.

The figure so strangely revealed by the mysterious light shining from the chimney, and casting rays far into the room, was, indeed, an exact representation of the gnomes or earth sprites of the fairy-tales. Not more than four feet in height, its thick body, and the enormous head set by a short neck on its broad shoulders, seemed quite out of proportion with the legs and feet that had first appeared. It was dressed from head to foot in red, and as it stood immovable with the light playing round it, it seemed to the two boys watching from behind the curtain like some fire-spirit that had been suddenly kindled on the hearth.

Motionless it stood, and in a listening attitude, its head a little on one side, and the light falling on its repulsively ugly features, wicked lips, and beady black eyes, till the echo of the last stroke from the belfry had quite died away. Then it descended from the hearth and cautiously, noiselessly, and yet with incredible swiftness, glided across the floor of the studio toward the door of the workshop.

René touched Peter again with an imperative gesture. Gnome, fire-spirit, imp of darkness, whatever it might be, there was only one thing for them to do. As noiselessly (they had taken the precaution to come without shoes) and almost as swiftly as the figure itself, the two boys slipped from their concealment and followed it, the light that came from this strange will-o'-the-wisp showing the way through the door of John the Painter's workshop.

Evidently it was not the first time that the misshapen visitant had entered it. Without an instant's hesitation he made for the spot where the precious enamel was laid. The light, as René and Peter now perceived, came from a lantern slung round his waist, which he deposited on a bench near. Then, raising a heavy hammer that hung from his belt above poor John Van Eyck's last work, he paused again to listen. But the blow never fell.

"In the name of the Agnus Dei!" René's soul cried: he had not power for spoken words. With a spring forward he grasped the uplifted arm with both hands. It did not melt into air; it was solid, whether human or not, and the arm was endowed with enormous strength. Wrenching itself away from the boy's hold, and quick as lightning, it turned the hammer into a weapon of defence, which in a moment more would have descended with full force on René's head; but Peter Van Baerle, stronger and heavier than the little Prince, had been on the alert, and throwing himself on the ground, clung round the dwarf's legs with such tenacity that in another instant the three figures were all rolling in one confused mass on the floor. So rapid and absorbing had been the attack and defence that the strange scene had been hitherto quite noiseless, but with the fall the spell of silence seemed broken.

"À moi! à moi!" René's voice rang out with the well-known battle cry.

"Help! help!—stop thief!" the burgher spirit of Peter Van Baerle shouted out, while articulate noises, between hissing and screaming, like the cries of a demoniac, issued from the misshapen throat of the dwarf. Meantime the moving ball of humanity, legs, arms, and heads singularly mixed, rolled on through the doorway and into the middle of the studio, the dwarf exerting all his strength to escape, while the boys clung to him with desperate determination. Then the whole house seemed to wake at one and the same moment. Harried footsteps sounded down the creaking oaken stairs, doors were flung open. Together, Hubert Van Eyck, rudely awakened from his nap, M. De Lagny, scarcely yet awake, and having hastily clothed himself in a long black cassock, appeared at one door, while Margaret, in flowing white drapery put on with equal haste, stood in the arched doorway of the inner room, holding high above her head a little lamp of antique pattern, whose light flickered on her fair, dishevelled hair.

"For goodness' sake, what is the matter?" and "Avaunt!" the two men cried at the same moment, bewildered at the extraordinary scene only partially visible in the uncertain light of the room. Then, as Margaret advanced, and the rays from her lamp fell on the struggling group, "The Comte de Guise—Peter!" each cried out, rushing to the rescue.

"We have him! we have him, Master Hubert!" René panted out. "Neither gnome nor fire-spirit; real flesh and blood. Ha! wouldst thou bite? Then take that!" and grasping the dwarf by the collar with one hand, while Peter held him tight, with the flat of his little sword René belabored the dwarf soundly across the back, the pliant, finely tempered steel acting almost as well as an ordinary cane would have done, and with telling effect, to judge from the howls of rage and pain that proceeded from the subject. But with a sudden wrench, and kicking himself free from Peter Van Baerle's grasp, the dwarf at last broke away, and with lightning speed made for the chimney.

"Seize him! seize him, M. l'Abbé!" René cried, as he dashed after him, followed by Peter, who had regained his footing.

"Hans Gulden, Meining's hideous dwarf, as I live!" Hubert Van Eyck exclaimed, as he saw the dwarf's whole figure revealed. "Here, at this time of night! Oh, I begin to understand! Stop him, Peter; let him not escape!"

But though now known not to be supernatural, their nocturnal visitor seemed gifted with almost supernatural powers of movement. Before he could be stopped he had sprung on to the hearth, closely followed by the two boys; but, better acquainted than they with its intricacies, he darted up the dark chimney with incredible celerity, and though René succeeded in grasping one little red leg as it was disappearing, its owner struggled so violently to disengage it that all that remained in the captor's hand was a pointed red shoe—a scrambling noise up the wide chimney telling them that the chase was over and the quarry had escaped.

"Straw! straw! fire the chimney!" the excited boys screamed, furious at their defeat; "bring the imp down again! Oh, Master Hubert, it is he who has done it all; he who has spoiled the enamel before! We caught him at his vile work. Help us to smoke him out."

"Nay, nay," Hubert Van Eyck said, laying his hand on the Prince's arm; "better so, monseigneur, believe me. The dwarf has had a good drubbing, and been well terrified, and we should have had sorry work with him on our hands through the night. I fear me," he added, gravely, and turning to the abbé, "he is but a tool, though a willing one, and spiteful enough to enjoy the dirty task assigned him. At any rate, I saw him plainly enough to identify him, and make his master reckon with me to-morrow morning—as reckon he shall!" Hubert said, in a lower tone, but one of concentrated anger.

"And, besides, we hold the imp's shoe in evidence. I have known for long that my brother was regarded with envy by Meining, and that he has grudged us each discovery in art, every favor shown us by the court; but I did not think envy would have driven him to such lengths of criminal dishonesty, such practical spite. But now, forewarned, forearmed, indeed. Your Highness has put me under a deep obligation to-night," he went on, turning to René, "and in John's name and my own I thank you. And, Peter, my pupil, Master Hubert asks you to forgive us both for the unworthy thought with which we have sinned against you. My boy, will you forgive?" and the artist held out his hand to Peter Van Baerle.

Years afterward, when René was King of Sicily, when he held in his Provençal capital tournaments and courts of the Joyeuse Science, loving art always in the midst of happiness or sorrow—years afterward, when Peter Van Baerle—known in art as Petrus Cristus—followed in the footsteps of the Van Eycks, did the recollection of that night call up a smile—that night of their first vigil, and of the solid and ugly form in which John Van Eyck's evil genius had appeared.

THE SAILOR'S ODD BOOT.

BY DAVID KER

THERE was no smarter frigate than the Ariadne in the whole British navy during the old fighting days of Admiral Nelson, and there was no better officer than her stout Captain, Sir Richard Oakley, or, as he was generally called, "Dashing Dick." Strict though he always was, Sir Richard was a great favorite both with his officers and his crew, who were well aware that he never punished any one without good reason. The sailors never forgot how "Dashing Dick" had once torn his own shirt into bandages for the wounded after a hard fight; and if he had taken it into his head to steer right into the middle of a French fleet, there was not a man on board who would not have followed him to the death.

One morning Captain Oakley was pacing the deck as usual, the very picture of an old sailor, when a big "topman," with a face as brown and hard as the Captain's own, came up and touched his forelock in salute.

"Well, my man, what is it?" asked Sir Richard, recognizing Bill Hawkins, one of his smartest seamen, who had saved his life from the stroke of a French cutlass only a few months before.

"Please your honor, some chap's been and stole a lot o' my things," answered Bill, as hesitatingly as if he had been confessing the theft himself.

Dashing Dick's bold brown face darkened, for a theft aboard his ship was something quite new to him.

"Stolen?" echoed he, through his clinched teeth. "Are you quite sure of what you say, my lad? It's a very awkward thing, remember, to charge any one of your messmates with being a thief."

But Bill was quite certain that he could not be mistaken. On the eve of their departure from England, a few days before, he had bought himself a new "kit," and had then, as he said, "stowed it away for'ard." Next day several of the smaller articles were missing, and no one seemed to know anything about them.

As the Captain listened, his eyes glowed as they were wont to do when an enemy's ship appeared in the offing. In a trice all hands mustered on deck at the call of the boatswain's whistle, and Sir Richard, bidding them look him full in the face and listen to what he was going to say, addressed them as follows:

"My lads, I'm very sorry to find that there's some one among us mean enough to steal from his messmates—a thing which I could never have expected of British seamen. Now I don't choose to have that sort of thing going on aboard any ship that I command, and I'm going to stop it, once for all. I've got my eye upon the thief at this moment—"

Here he paused, and shot a glance at the wondering crew which (as one of the men said afterward) "seemed to go right through you and out at the other side."

"I hope your honor don't think it's me," said a gray-haired coxswain in the front rank.

"Or me," "Or me," echoed several voices at once.

"I don't say it's anybody yet," answered the Captain, with a grim emphasis on the last word; "but I do say that the thief is looking me full in the face at this moment, and that I am looking at him, and he knows it as well as I do."

This, after all, was hardly surprising, inasmuch as the whole ship's company were looking straight at him in obedience to his own orders; but the announcement and the solemn tone in which it was made caused a visible sensation among the crew.

"Now," pursued Dashing Dick, "I'll give him till to-night to bring back what he has taken; but if all the things stolen from William Hawkins are not restored this very night, to-morrow morning the man who stole them shall have the best flogging that I ever gave any man."

When the sun rose next morning, all the missing articles were in their place again, no one knew how.

This detective feat earned for Captain Oakley the unbounded admiration of the simple Jack Tars, some of whom could only explain it by saying that the Captain must have stolen the things himself, in order to have a chance of giving his crew a lesson. But apparently the lesson was not altogether effectual, for scarcely had the Ariadne been three days at anchor in Portsmouth Harbor, after her cruise up and down the Channel, when a shoemaker, whose shop lay close to the anchorage, came on board with a charge of theft against our friend Bill Hawkins himself!

At this sudden change of the robbed man into the robber, Captain Oakley hardly knew what to think, for he had always had a very high opinion of Bill. However, he repressed his astonishment, and ordered the shoemaker to tell his story.

It was soon told. He had been making a pair of sea boots a few days before, and, having finished one, had just gone to work upon the other, when the completed boot suddenly disappeared, and the shoemaker—a crabbed, suspicious old fellow—set down the theft to one of those very sailors out of whom he made his money.

"Whoever took that boot," muttered he, "knows that the other one's no use by itself, and means to come back presently and buy it cheap, and so make up the pair; but when he does come, I'll be ready for him, or my name's not Timothy Tompkins."

Sure enough, three days later, Bill Hawkins, after looking hard at the odd boot in the window, stepped into the shop and called out:

"Hello, my hearty! d'ye sell odd boots? How much for that one?"

"What more proof could any man want? Mr. Tompkins pounced upon him at once, and brought him before Captain Oakley as the thief.

"Well, Hawkins," asked Sir Richard, "what have you to say to all this?"

"Please your honor," answered Bill, undauntedly, "I didn't take t'other boot, and I don't know nothing about it; and as for that 'un as I wanted to buy, I only meant to give it to my old chum, Sam Stokes, the pensioner."

"But what on earth could he do with one boot?"

"Why, your honor, he's only got one leg."

Sir Richard glanced toward the shoemaker; but all that could be seen of him was the skirt of a coat vanishing like lightning through the doorway.

What the Grandmothers say.

BY JESSIE McDERMOTT.

Oh, sixty years ago to a day
Three maidens lived—so the grandmothers say—
In a farm-house under an old elm-tree,
And they were as busy as maids could be,
And as fair as busy—the grandmothers say—
Oh, sixty years ago to a day.

For Molly could spin, and Dolly could bake,
And Polly had all the butter to make,
And never an idle moment had they
To spend with the village girls at play;
For Molly must spin, and Dolly must bake,
And Polly had all the butter to make.

"Molly must spin"

Those were good old times—so the grandmothers say—
 Oh, sixty years ago to a day,
 When bread was baked in the proper way,
 And butter was sweet as new-mown hay,
 And yarn was yarn—so the grandmothers say—
 Oh, sixty years ago to a day.

"Polly has all the butter to make"

Now who were these maidens so clever and quick,
 Who never were idle, or naughty, or sick,
 Who were busy and healthy and handsome and gay,
 Oh, sixty years ago to a day?

I think you will not have to go very far
 Before you find who these maidens are:
Your grandmother's one, and my grandmother's one,
 And, in fact, every grandmother under the sun
 Was one of the Mollys or Dollys or Pollys
 Who did such wonderful things, they say,
 Oh, sixty years ago to a day.

"Dolly must bake"

SHEEP-HUNTING IN THE HIMALAYAS.

BY ERNEST INGEISOLL.

"OVIS AMMON" is the scientific name of a wild sheep with enormous horns whose home is among the rocky summits of the Himalayas. To hunt and kill these animals, which are agile, surefooted, and watchful to the highest degree, tries the sportsman's skill and endurance very greatly, and is often attended with real peril.

Two English officers not long ago resolved to give themselves a few days at the sheep, and travelled with their cooly servants to a point in the interior of the great range almost at the highest limit of timber growth, where they pitched their camp in a pleasant ravine sheltered from the strong wind that blows every afternoon.

By six o'clock the next morning one of the officers, with his Hindoo hunting companion, or "shikaree," had mounted to the desolate plateau above the trees. Crossing it to some higher ground beyond, the shikaree suddenly pointed straight ahead, where were a herd of five sheep, so near the color of the rocks they were resting among as to be almost indistinguishable. Throwing themselves flat down, the hunters crept back out of sight, and then making a long roundabout climb, succeeded in getting quite near to and above their game on the other side. Peering cautiously around the edge of the little ridge, the officer found the herd still there, but was surprised to see, not two hundred yards away, an old sentinel, who was looking around him very suspiciously, but presently went back to the rest. The hunters were about to advance a little, when a noise in the rear caused them to look back and behold a band of wild horses sniffling and staring at the visitors. An instant later the horses rushed down the slope like a charge of cavalry, whereupon the sheep, catching the alarm, trotted out of sight.

Following quickly to where the herd had disappeared (first taking off his boots to save the noise of tramping over the loose slaty rock), the hunter reached the edge of a cliff, and saw the herd below him, about one hundred and fifty yards away. They were circling about uneasily and might be off any moment; so picking out one old ram which had splendid horns, the officer let fly at him, aiming right between the shoulders.

The whole herd, crowded close together, flew up the opposite slope and out of sight. The shikaree declared the shot must have been a miss, but when the officer had drawn on his boots and dashed down the slope, he found blood stains on the ground, showing that the bullet had hit. It was a painful climb to the top of the rough, steep slope the sheep had galloped up so nimbly, and on top was another bare plateau, across which the track of the fleeing animals could be traced by occasional drops of blood.

At the other side the plateau fell away into a broad depression surrounded by rocky slopes, and right in the middle of this basin lay the ram, evidently badly wounded, but by no means helpless. Leaving him where he was, the hunters got out their little tea-making apparatus, and devoted about three quarters of an hour to breakfast.

This over, they arose and prepared to have another shot, but the noise made in descending the stony slope frightened the wary sheep, which hobbled away to a cluster of rocks and hid himself. It was evidently necessary to make a wide detour in order to get him, and this meant half an hour of the roughest kind of climbing; but at last, by the greatest care, and disregard of scratches and bruises, they crawled within range. Only the horns of the ram were visible, but the officer took aim at where the shoulders ought to be, and when the smoke cleared away, the horns had gone down.

He proved to be a magnificent fellow, with perfectly coiled horns. Taking his tape, the sportsman began measuring them, when suddenly the old ram sprang up, butted furiously at the shikaree (whom he sent flying on to a heap of stones, where he lay groaning that all his ribs had been smashed in), and made a dash for liberty. As he passed, the Englishman caught one of the horns and held on for a minute, struggling to get out his knife; but before he could do it the ram gave him a dig which doubled him up and sent him on to a pile of sharp rocks about as badly used up as the shikaree.

As soon as he could pick himself up, gather together his watch, rifle, and various scattered belongings, the sportsman ran on in pursuit of his late antagonist, who was not so dead as he looked. He found him standing quite still, and was just about to fire at him again, when Ovis Ammon suddenly pitched forward, "dead as a door-nail."

This chase was long and glorious enough for one day; and by the time they had carried the fine head back to camp as a trophy, both sportsmen were willing to spend the remainder of the evening in rest.

UNCLE JACK'S HOBBY.

BY GEORGE F. JONES.

UNCLE JACK had come in to dinner, and was telling them how he had bought a steam-engine.

"What do you want an engine for?" said Mrs. Dudley, his sister. "You haven't any railroad to run it on."

"No," said Uncle Jack, "it is a stationary engine."

"Stationary means that it won't go, doesn't it?" said Walter. Walter was a young man in knee-breeches. Mrs. Dudley was his mother. He sat next to her, and Uncle Jack sat on her other hand. Mr. Dudley sat opposite her, and made up the party of four.

Uncle Jack had not finished his soup, so Mr. Dudley answered Walter; and as he thought the question rather a stupid one, he said:

"Don't take for granted, Walter, that your uncle is a fool. Any one who would buy an engine which would not go would be a fool. A stationary engine is one which does not travel round on a track, but it turns a wheel round, and goes, just as a sewing-machine goes. You don't say that a sewing-machine won't go simply because it won't trot into another room by itself. The engine stands in one place, but it does its work."

It was a little hard on Walter to give him such a lecture as this for a remark which was not meant to be ill-natured. Walter was quite taken down, and to reassure him Uncle Jack said:

"Really, Walter, I think you would like to see my engine, it is so compact and simple, and goes so fast and so smoothly."

Then, turning to Mrs. Dudley, he went on: "It is to run our repair shop, you know. The old way was, when we wanted to make any repairs at night in the mill, to run the water-wheel and all the shafting just to keep one machine going. Now we have this little engine in the machine shop, and all we have to do is to turn on the steam, and there we are."

As he was speaking, he took a card out of his pocket and handed it to his sister. It was a blue card with a picture on it in white.

"There," said he, "that's one of the drawings it was built from. It is the simplest engine I ever saw. Even you and Walter can't have any difficulty in understanding it."

Mrs. Dudley looked at it and sighed. "I never understood any of these things," said she. "I think I am altogether too stupid to understand them. But I hope Walter will understand it," and she passed it on to him.

Walter looked at it hard for a moment, and then passed it on to his father. Mr. Dudley was carving a duck, so he laid the card on the table, and the subject dropped.

After dinner Walter staid in the dining-room. He was still a little grieved by his father's snubbing, and he wanted to comfort himself with a few more grapes. As he was helping himself quietly he saw the blue picture lying by his father's plate.

It suddenly occurred to him that if he could ask his uncle Jack to tell him how the engine worked, he could tell his father, and show him that he really did know something.

So he ate the grapes he had in his hand, and picking up the blue picture, he ran into the parlor. Mrs. Dudley was sitting on one side of the fire with her crochet-needle and a lapful of wool. Mr. Dudley was sitting on the other side reading a newspaper. Uncle Jack was standing with his back to the fire, smoking a cigar.

Walter went up to him slowly. "Really," said he— "really, Uncle Jack, I should like to know how it goes."

Uncle Jack took his cigar out of his mouth and knocked the ashes into the fire, and smiled at Walter.

"I should like to tell you," he said, "but I am afraid that I can't without making you some drawings."

Then he put his cigar back into his mouth, and his hands behind his back, and smiled down on Walter again.

He was a handsome young man, and his smile was good-natured. So Walter said:

"Oh, do tell me. I think I can understand without any drawings."

Uncle Jack took his cigar out of his mouth again and looked at the glowing end of it. Then he put it back, on the other side of his mouth. "You must first clearly understand what the engine is for," he remarked.

"Well," said Walter, "you said it was to run your repair shop, and papa said it was to turn a wheel around."

"The things are practically the same," said Uncle Jack. "Do you know how a sewing-machine is run?"

"Why, yes," said Walter; "you work the treadle up and down, and the needle goes."

"That is a general and somewhat indefinite way of putting it, Walter. You do work the treadle up and down. Do you know what part of the machine the treadle moves?"

"Oh yes," said Walter. "There's a stick fastened at one end to the treadle, and at the other end to the wheel. You work the treadle up and down, and that moves the stick up and down, and that makes the wheel go round."

"That's better," said Uncle Jack, "but a little indefinite still."

"I think it is extremely definite," said Mrs. Dudley, looking up from her crochet. "I never saw as much to a sewing-machine. I put my feet on the treadle, and the needle goes. If it doesn't go, I send for Walter; if he can't mend it, I send for the sewing-machine man; but am profoundly ignorant of the whole process."

"That is because you have never sat on the floor and watched it go," said Walter.

"No," said Mrs. Dudley. "I don't think I ever have."

"I am glad," said Uncle Jack, after he had relighted his cigar, which had gone out during the talk—"I am glad, Walter, that you have sat on the floor and watched the machine go. It shows an inquiring mind. I will, however, suggest that you call the 'stick,' to which you refer, a 'connecting rod.' It connects the treadle with a pin in one of the spokes of the wheel, and—"

"A pin?" said Walter. "Do you mean that sort of peg, stuck into the spoke, that the stick is fastened to? It looks a great deal bigger than a pin."

"They call it a pin," said Uncle Jack, "and it may be almost any size. On locomotive engines they are sometimes five inches thick or more. But we are forgetting the main thread of our talk. Your foot moves the treadle up and down; the treadle moves one end of the connecting rod up and down. The other end tries to go up and down, but it is fastened to this pin. The pin is fast in the wheel, so this end of the rod can't go in a straight line, but it pushes and pulls the wheel, and makes that go round with it."

"Why," said Walter, "our grindstone works something like it. There is a big crank on one side that you turn by hand, but on the other side there's a little crank that has what you call a connecting rod fastened to it, and a treadle something like a sewing-machine. But it is a crank and not a pin stuck into the stone. In our sewing-machine there is a pin."

"It is the same thing in principle," said Uncle Jack. "The pin we are talking about is called the crank-pin, and the spoke and pin form a regular crank. But so far you are only turning that big wheel under the table of the sewing-machine. How does that make the sliding part of the machine go?"

"Oh, I know that," said Walter; "there's a sort of round leather rope that goes round the big wheel and up through the table, and makes a little wheel go round up there. That's what makes the needle go."

"Yes," said Uncle Jack, "that's all right. The leather rope is what we call a belt, and all our machines, down at the shop are run by belts, just as the sewing part of the sewing-machine is run."

"Are the belts like the one on the sewing-machine?"

"Not very much. They are flat, like a regular leather belt, but they answer the same purpose. Now, then, here's rather a hard one. The treadle moves up and down and turns the wheel around: now if you should take off the treadle and lift up one end of the rod and hold it in your hand, do you think you could move the wheel with it?"

"Yes," said Walter; "if I could once start the wheel, I think I could push and pull on the end of the rod, and keep the wheel going."

"Bravo!" said Uncle Jack. "That is just what the engine does. Look here on the picture (Fig. 1). Here is the wheel, and here is the pin; I'll mark it P. This is the connecting rod; that I'll mark R."

"But what is the funny thing that looks a little like a square cross?" said Walter.

"That," replied his uncle, "I will mark C H; it is the cross-head; it slides between these two lines. You see, the steam pushes it backward and forward, and it moves the rod backward and forward, and the wheel goes round. There is a belt on the wheel, just as there is on the sewing-machine wheel, and that drives the machines in the shop."

After a moment Walter said, "That's all very nice, but how does the steam do it?"

"Did you ever have a squirt, Walter?"

"Yes; it was a beautiful syringe, but"—and here he whispered in his uncle's ear—"they took it away from me at school."

Uncle Jack smiled for a moment. "Did you ever take it apart?" said he.

"Oh yes," replied Walter; "I could unscrew the top, and the handle would come out. There was a round thing about as big as a two-cent piece on the end of the handle, fastened on like—like—"

"As the foot of a goblet is fastened to the stem?"

"Yes, just like that," said Walter. "It fitted in quite close; and when you filled it with water"—and here he whispered again—"I could squirt across the room."

Uncle Jack smiled again, as if he remembered doing something of the kind himself.

"The part that fitted so close you must call a piston," said he, "and the handle, or the goblet stem, you must call a piston-rod."

FIG. 2.

"Piston and piston-rod," repeated Walter.

"Now, then," said Uncle Jack, "we are going to make an engine of your squirt, and we are going to keep the water out of it."

"It would have been a good thing for Walter," said Mrs. Dudley, "if he had kept the water out of it."

"I was only trying to get the water out of it," said Walter.

"Now, Walter, if you should put a rubber pipe on the nose of your squirt, and blow into it, what would happen?"

"I never tried," said Walter; "but I suppose, if you blew hard enough, you could blow the piston into the other end of the syringe."

"That's right. Now, if you made a hole in the other end, and fastened a rubber pipe to that?"

"Well, I suppose you could blow the piston and the handle back again, but you'd have to blow hard."

"And suppose you have a big squirt fastened to a chair, and the end of the handle fastened to the connecting rod of your sewing machine."

"Oh," said Walter, "is that the way it goes?"

"Yes," replied Uncle Jack; "and I must draw a picture of that, or I am afraid you won't understand it." So he drew the picture (Fig. 2) while Walter looked over him.

"Here's your squirt," said he; "and here are the pipes coming up to where you can blow into them. Here are the piston and the piston-rod; that is the handle of the squirt, you know. On the other end you have the rest of your engine—the wheel with its pin and the connecting rod. Now just fasten this outer end of the connecting rod to the handle of your squirt and begin to blow in, and what will happen?"

"Why, the air will push the piston forward, and that will pull the rod, and that will pull the wheel."

"Yes," said Uncle Jack, "that will pull the wheel half-way round. Then you can blow into the other end, and that will push the piston back, and the wheel will go the rest of the way round, if you get it started right. You see the piston and the piston-rod keep going backward and forward just as the treadle went up and down, and that makes the wheel go, after it has got well started. But I haven't said a word about the valve yet, and that's a most important thing in an engine, and I must go now. Come down to the mill to-morrow at about four o'clock, and I'll show you more about it. Good-by."

THE ROSE-CRESTED COCKATOO --See Page 318

THE ROSECRESTED COCKATOO, AND HOW TO FEED AND CARE FOR PARROTS.

BY UNCLE JOE.

THIS beautiful and interesting member of the parrot family comes from Australia, whence, indeed, come most of the crested parrots. It is of medium size, and may be easily distinguished from others of its kind by its soft rose-tinted white plumage and remarkable crest, which it can at will raise and project in fan-shaped form over its head or throw back on to its neck. The feathers of the crest are long and pointed, with brilliant crimson at the base, next a band of golden yellow, then a stripe of crimson, the ends being tipped with white. The feathers of the neck, breast, and sides, and under the wings and tail, are deep crimson-colored.

This bird is very fond of being noticed and admired, and will resort to many amusing ways to attract attention. When intruded on by those with whom it is not on familiar terms, as in the case of puss, shown in the accompanying illustration, or when moved by pleasant emotion, he will elevate his crest like a gaudy fan, moving it backward and forward, ruffling his feathers, and dancing on his perch.

Now in regard to poor puss. You need not banish her from the house for fear she should molest the large-sized parrots, for she has a very wholesome respect for Poll's strong beak; and as to the small birds, were it not for puss, rats and mice would be likely to destroy them, notwithstanding the greatest care being taken for their safety.

If you will take the trouble, you can teach a cat to treat birds with distant respect when in their cages by carrying out the following instructions: When you see puss intently watching a bird and moving stealthily toward it, take hold of her with both hands, and let some one else hold the cage in which the bird is; then rub the cat's nose several times briskly on the bars of the cage. A few such lessons will be sufficient to restrain her from meddling with the birds when caged. But if you desire to let the birds loose and allow them to fly around the room, there is but one thing to do, and that is to banish puss entirely.

The paroquets, lorikeets, cockatoos, short-tail or true parrots, macaws, love-birds, and nearly the entire family of parrots, may be taught to repeat words and short sentences, and the more intelligent birds of the various groups seem to have some knowledge of the meaning of many words. They will learn to talk quicker and more plainly if their lesson is given them in a dark room in the evening, leaving them to con it over without interruption until next morning. Parrots learn more easily from children than from adults, the high pitch of young voices being more in accord with the tones natural to these birds.

A foolish as well as false idea is held by some persons that it is necessary to cut or split the tongue of a parrot to enable it to talk. This is not only cruel, but it destroys its power of articulating distinctly. Bird-fanciers and others entertain another idea equally foolish, which is that parrots do not need water to drink. They should have water in moderation once or twice a day, according to the season, the cup being removed in the interval, so that they may not overdrink, and that the water may be fresh and clean. You must also supply them with good clean gravel, which they require for digestion, particularly when fed on seeds.

The food suitable for the cockatoo is the same as that required for parrots generally—hemp and canary seeds, cracked corn, unbulled rice, biscuit or bread soaked in a little water, coffee, or milk. Be careful not to let soft food become sour in the cage. Offer occasionally fruits, carrots, nuts, etc.; also hang a red-pepper pod in the cage, and provide the birds with good clean gravel.

Do not leave any poisonous things within the reach of the birds. I once lost a most valuable talking sulphur-crested cockatoo, which died from eating the phosphorus from some matches that he picked up.

Parrots are hardy birds, and often live to a great age. They should be frequently allowed to bathe in lukewarm water. Too much rich or greasy food will cause at times an irritation of the skin, to ease which the bird will pull out his feathers. When you observe this you must alter the diet, and give fruits, carrots, bananas, oranges, and cooling food generally. For sore or swelled feet, soak in warm water and Castile soap. Do not use metal perches, for they give the birds cramps in their feet. Put a small branch of a tree with bark on in the cage for the bird to bite on, and he won't be likely to cut up his perch.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

A GOOD START.

I WANT all my nieces and nephews to stop whatever else they may be doing, and listen to me for a few moments, while I talk to them about the importance of a good start. Yes, Charlie and Bertie, Ollie and Mary, I mean you; and it is because you happen to be where you can start well, if only you will, that I shall wait until you are ready to pay attention before I begin. There! I see your bright eyes lifted, and the right listening look on your faces, and I will proceed.

I heard a certain lad—I will not mention names just now—ask the maid one evening, not long ago, to be sure to call him when she should rise in the morning. "I have work to do," he said, "and I must be up an hour earlier than usual." Let me whisper here that sometimes a good start for the day is gained by beginning the night before. For example, it is a much better thing to finish all the school-work—lessons, themes, exercises—before going to bed, than to leave it to the chance of rising an hour earlier than the accustomed time. It makes, you see, the difference between a certainty and an accident.

In the case of my young friend the good start he had counted upon was lost by the fact that the maid forgot his request, and never thought of it until she rang the bell to awaken the rest of the family. Many another boy loses his good start by not getting up when he is called.

I think if young people knew how much needless trouble they give their elders by just this one vexatious habit of going to sleep again after they have been called in the morning, they would turn over a new leaf.

When I have ordered breakfast at an hour much earlier than suits my own convenience, that Mollie and Marty may eat it in comfort, and have plenty of time to set out for school, I am not in the most cheerful of moods if I am obliged at least half a dozen times in the course of an hour to call, "Mollie! Marty!" the call making no impression. It is hardly fair—is it?—that if they do not care for making a good start in the day for themselves, they should spoil mine for me.

One thought leads to another. Children, believe me that no day is started well if it begins with cross looks and fretful words. There is a homely proverb about having the black dog on your shoulder, which simply means that you are hateful and horrid and disagreeable. Let us be careful never to be horrid on purpose. Perhaps we cannot help being slow or stupid, but we all can help being peevish and perverse.

In starting out in a new study—Latin or algebra or botany—the rate of your progress will depend greatly upon the thoroughness of your beginning. You would call that man a foolish builder who forgot to look after his foundations, and I am sure it is quite as absurd to build badly in a new study. Get a good start, boys. You will then go on without failing in the end.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Jo slept late the next morning, and awoke to find the sunlight streaming into her room, and Rachel standing beside her with her breakfast on a tray.

Rachel laughed merrily. "Well, Mary," she exclaimed, "so you have waked up at last! Do you know it is ten o'clock?"

Rachel seated herself on the side of the bed with sparkling eyes.

"Oh, how I wish you had been there last night!" she continued; "it was perfectly delightful. That lovely Miss Emerson from Ashfield was there. Mrs. Burton has talked so much of her I've just been wild to see her, and she came and talked to us girls, oh! so beautifully—told us lots of interesting things. And what do you suppose? She is going to give a large party for us in September. It is all arranged with Mr. Burton: cars to be chartered, and a splendid time all around. Fanny Lee has seen her place at Ashfield; she and her mother once spent the day there, and she says it is a lovely house, and Miss Emerson's own room is fit for a princess. Why, what's the matter, Mary?"

For Jo, feeling faint and trembling, had turned very white.

"Nothing," she answered, trying to look cheerful and interested. "Go on, Rachel; tell me more about Miss Emerson."

"Oh! she is so lovely!" cried Rachel, enthusiastically. "But unfortunately she is very delicate, and in October she is to go South or to Europe for her health. Her old aunt seems rather anxious about her. She sang for us, too. I wish you could have been there, Mary."

Rachel darted away, hearing the store bell ring, and Jo locked her hands together in fresh agony. Oh! the shame and misery and sorrowfulness of it all! Over and over again came back Faith's own words. No one in Ashfield would believe in her; yet she must face them, must see Faith, and submit to whatever punishment or disgrace followed. And they all, as Rachel said, would go to Ashfield and be with Faith, see her, talk to her; while she, Jo, perhaps would be behind prison bars!

Never had the little room she and Rachel shared looked so cosy and home-like to Jo as on this morning; never had the house seemed so cheerful, the store so attractive, Mrs. Dawson so kind, or Rachel's voice, as she sang gaily over her work, so bright and tuneful. Little Jo clung to her skirts as soon as she was down-stairs, and she caught the child in her arms, kissing the little chubby face and soft neck twenty times, while Mrs. Dawson looked up smiling to say, "You'll hev that young one so spoiled, Mary Brooks, the house won't hold her bime-by."

"May I go up street a little while, Mrs. Dawson?" asked Jo; "I want to speak to Mr. Burton."

"Why, yes, of course," was the answer; and as Jo departed she continued to Rachel, "I declare Mr. Burton told me he wanted to see Mary this morning, and I forgot all about it."

Jo walked hurriedly up the village street. The day was lovely after the torrid heat of yesterday, with little soft breezes moving the green leaves above her, rocking the boats that were moored along the narrow stream that divided the town, and touching everything with a sweet sense as of new life and exhilaration. Where house windows stood open, the rooms within looked very cheerful, and in the very faces of passers-by was something that went to Jo's heart, making the girl wild to cling to this new, bright, peaceful life which had grown so dear to her for months past. For among the Dawsons' class Jo had made friends; she had been cheerful and happy at times, always looking forward to seeing Faith some day, and meanwhile being too young and vigorous not to be at times light-hearted. Her young friends in the evening school, it is true, thought her very quiet and grave, and a great deal too anxious to learn, but at home with bonny, gay-hearted Rachel her voice and step, even her laughter, had gained much of the sweetness and gaiety belonging to her years; although her joyousness had always a tinge of something quieter and calmer than Rachel's, yet it shone forth in her eyes and had softened the girl's whole face.

The sense that it was all to be changed now hastened Jo's steps; all the happy, familiar sights and sounds jarred upon her, and she only longed to hurry toward Mr. Burton's house. Her lips trembled as she put the important question to the servant at the door, "Can I see Miss Emerson, please?"

Mr. Dyke Burton was crossing the hall, and on sight of "Mary Brooks," who was a decided favorite of his mother's, he stopped and answered her query.

"Miss Emerson left by an early train this morning," he said, and added, "Come in, Mary, won't you?"

"Left!" cried Jo.

She moved into the large hall and stood still a moment, looking imploringly at the kind-hearted gentleman. "Oh, Mr. Burton," she said, sinking down on the bench near the door, "what am I to do?"

CHAPTER XIX.

MR. BURTON was accustomed to having the young people of Jo's class in Burnham apply to him for counsel, but he saw at once that in the present case there was something unusual.

"Come into my study, Mary," he said, quickly, and opened the door of the room to which Jo had often gone on pleasant errands, and which she entered now feeling that she was to bid it good-by forever.

Mr. Burton pushed forward a wicker chair, and when Jo sat down he said, in his kindest voice, "What is it, my dear? You seem in trouble."

"Oh, yes, sir," cried Jo; "oh, if only she had staid! I wanted to see Miss Faith, to tell her everything!"

The girl paused, her voice too choked for utterance. Then suddenly she stood up and resolved to tell it all to Mr. Burton. She had learned to feel it not right to act on her own judgment only. She felt that to some one the whole story must be told, and advice asked and given.

"I don't know how to tell you, sir," Jo said, piteously, and standing a little distance from Mr. Burton, who was seated by his table. "I don't know what you will think or say. You may tell me I am not fit to be here, I don't know. But I'm determined to go back to Ashfield; yes, I must. If she had been here it would have been easier. Last night I was outside the window of the school-house. I knew she was there, and I went just to look at her and hear her speak again. Then I heard her telling about the trial that is to be in Ashfield. I know that Sandy Martin, Mr. Burton, and I know he is not the murderer."

There was dead silence in the room for perhaps half a minute.

Jo had no idea of the effect of her words upon Mr. Burton, nor how much of herself she had revealed to him in those few distressed sentences.

At breakfast that morning Faith had said to him that she and Bertie were trying everywhere to find the girl who had been implicated in the robbery—a girl in whom she had taken a great interest, but who, on being released from prison on her bail, had run away.

"I DON'T KNOW HOW TO TELL YOU, SIR," JO SAID, PITEOUSLY."

Keen man of the world as Mr. Burton was, in a flash he understood that this protégée of Miss Emerson and the girl he had known for a year and a half as "Mary Brooks" were one and the same.

"You know?" he exclaimed. "And then you, Mary, are the girl Miss Emerson told me of this morning?"

A wave of scarlet color swept over Jo's white face. She let her head droop, and said, in a choked way, "What did she say, sir? Oh, did she think me very wrong?"

Mr. Burton began to pace the floor. "She spoke very sorrowfully," he answered. "She said she was terribly disappointed in you."

Jo lifted her face, from which all the burning, shameful wave had died now, and looked at Mr. Burton with a gaze the unutterable sadness of which went to his heart.

"I didn't mean her to be," the girl said, in a low tone; "I only meant to save her trouble and bother; and she said no one in all Ashfield would believe in me, or believe what I could tell about that dreadful night. But oh, sir, I see now—I think I've seen for a long time—I was wrong. All I want now is to go back and do whatever is right. I suppose they'll put me in prison again, but what I'll say will be the truth, and I think"—Jo looked earnestly at Mr. Burton—"I think they'll believe what I have to say about Sandy, because, sir, every one in Ashfield or in Sailors' Row knows we never were good friends, and how we used to fight, and how I hated him."

Mr. Burton ceased walking a moment. The confidence in Jo, which had been dashed by what she had said, together with Faith's communication, was beginning to return; but he felt that the case was one which required careful thought, although, no doubt, very speedy action.

"I think, Mary," he said, finally, and sitting down again, "you had better tell me the whole story. Then I shall know what had best be done, and how we can do it."

His tone, the "we" spoken with kindly emphasis, reassured poor Jo. She moved forward, and taking the chair by the table, began her story slowly, and with an evident desire to be accurate and particular as to time and place.

Much she told: first of Faith's goodness and care; something of her life with her old grandfather; and then went on to the principal events, in which Mr. Burton was now specially interested. There was not the slightest effort to make things seem well for herself in any way. As he listened, Mr. Burton became entirely convinced that Jo was telling him only the simple truth, and that with every wish to see her old foe Sandy done common justice.

CHAPTER XX.

WHEN Jo had finished, and Mr. Burton had cross-questioned her in various ways, the morning was far advanced. To both speaker and listener the time had flown, but never afterward could Jo forget the look of the cheerful study that August day—the sunshine coming in pleasantly; the books, chairs, and tables so cosily arranged; the pictures she had always cared for catching gleams of light or melting under shadows. Outside, the lawn, with its fine cedars dappled over with spots of light and shade, the hum of bees, the occasional sweet note of a robin sounding in her ears while she spoke; and with all was a curious feeling, more like a real sensation than Jo had ever known, that she was to be shut out forever from these sounds and sights of the outside world she loved so well, and the peacefulness and content of the home life she had learned to value and care for.

Jo's eyes had wandered toward the sunny picture outside the low French windows, but now she turned them gravely back to Mr. Burton's thoughtful face.

"You say, sir, you don't know what they will do with me?" She asked the question quietly, yet with a note in her young voice that sounded like a sob.

"No, Mary," Mr. Burton answered, in a perplexed way, "I can't tell yet. Whatever is right, I hope; but if you are brave and tell all the truth, you may hope for the best. Now I think you had better remain here while I arrange for our journey to Ashfield. I will make it all right with Mrs. Dawson. We can start by the three-o'clock train."

Jo's heart beat furiously a moment, and then stood still. Must she go without one word of good-by? But she dared not oppose Mr. Burton's plan. When he looked up from his study of the time-table he noticed no change in the wistful, earnest face, the attitude of anxious waiting.

"Best to get there at once," he said. "But you cannot go to Miss Emerson's. She is not strong enough to bear the excitement of an interview before you appear in court. Besides that, it will not do to have any one but Mr. Hogenamp, who is this Martin's lawyer, know you are there. But I have a friend who I am sure would receive you kindly; she has a small hotel now, a quiet place, where you would be comfortable."

She was to go; Mr. Burton would be with her; she was to go into court, to tell every one who might be there all that she had related this morning, and it would set her old enemy Sandy free, and might close the prison doors upon her. Well, it must be right somehow. It seemed right even if it was cruel. Jo's heart—nay, let me now say her soul—took this in, and it was, I have always thought, her first actual hour of heroism, the first real sign and fragrance of the flower part of the girl's life.

But it appealed to her with no delicate, poetic, or romantie suggestiveness. I doubt if Jo had ever heard of any heroes or heroines or martyrs to any cause. What she had chosen to do was from the very depths and force of that divine part of her, her conscience, which had wakened to tell her what lay before her with the first comprehension of Faith's words that night in the school house; but I have often thought that in the face of the young girl, white, dry-eyed, and still, which Mr. Burton observed so compassionately that August morning, he might have seen that "shadow of God's messenger" which we are told to look for as if it were a glory.

"If you don't object, Mary," Mr. Burton went on, "I will tell my mother that I have to go with you to Ashfield on business. I assure you she can keep a secret admirably; and as some one must know it, it had better be she. I think it wisest." And seeing Jo's mute look of assent, Mr. Burton went away, returning in a few minutes to say that Mrs. Burton wanted Jo to have a little dinner before they started.

The old lady was subdued and very gentle in manner, kindly pressing all sorts of excellent food upon Jo, who, however, with difficulty made a slight meal. Now that the excitement of telling her story was over, she felt only impatience to be off, and she could not talk, could scarcely bear what was said; she felt even in one sense too lifeless to ask Mr. Burton how he had contrived to "make all right" with the Dawsons.

That he had done so successfully she felt sure, but only when they were on the train, steaming away toward Ashfield, with a terrible pang of separation. She was going—going forever, no doubt—from those dear, dear friends! Oh, was it worth while? Had she been wise to speak, and bring all this upon herself? And then came back to the still simple and childish mind what Mr. Burton had said to her. It would be like "bearing false witness" to go on living with that silence as sinful as speech on her mind.

STUTTGART.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—I have been living at Rochester, in England, within walking distance of Gales Hill Place, which I dare say you may remember as the residence of Charles Dickens. I had often visited there, and have seen a good many of the places which are mentioned in his books. There is a slab put up to his memory in the Cathedral.

I like Stuttgart very much. A little way out of the town is a place called Deukendorf, where there is a monastery which was built by the old Knights Templars. It is very pretty, but some part of it is used as a mustard manufactory. Mr. Miller and I are collecting stamps.

I would send me a few American stamps, in return for which I should be pleased to send them any English, German, or Indian stamps. I am going to London, when I am also going to the Conservatoire; but at present we may stay and I are having German lessons from a governess. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I think the pictures are so pretty. My favorite stories are "The Lost City," "Wolf House," and "Two Arrows"; the last I am very much interested in, and will send me the paper every time I see it. I think mother likes it as well as I do. I have but two pets; one is a kitten called Jet, and the other a bird named Bijou. I am fourteen. I should very much like to correspond with some little girls of my own age, or older.

ROSIE CARTER.

St. Michael's, LAOAG, ARORE.
 I am ten years old, and I have a brother and two little sisters. One of my sisters is six and the other two years old, and my brother Jacinto is eleven. We live five miles from home, in a Grandmother M. lives. She is very kind to us. She invites us to dinner every Thursday, and takes us for walks and visits and to see all nice things. She asks father to take us to school every past nine. She has nine sons and twenty-one grandchildren. Some play the piano very well, and the younger ones play every kind of game, and enjoy it all very much. We have some telephones and four blackbirds; one of the latter whistles like a man. I have been studying English for the last centennium months with my mat.

CLARA M.

PARIS, FRANCE.

I am an American boy aged twelve. I come to Europe every year, in May, and go home in November; but this time we did not go home, and will not be in America until next November. I come from New York city. Papa hires a car for me to run in the north of Scotland, at Aberfores. It is very good shooting. We go there every August. We killed fifty six-stags, five hinds, forty-five roe deer, and seven hares, and also five pheasants, besides about five hundred grouse and a lot of black game, snipe, woodcock, and partridge. I do not shoot, being too young, and not having been blessed with a gun. I have a pony in Scotland, but seldom ride it. I study Latin, arithmetic, algebra, geography, philosophy, French, five months, and seven months of study four hours and thirty minutes, not counting dancing and writing. I never have gone to school, always having had a tutor. I have crossed the Atlantic nine times; the first time I crossed on the Britannic, and was surprised at the beauty of Ireland on the Fourth of July. We coasted the coast, and I was constantly taking pictures of the sea, the mountains, and the people. I was very much surprised to see the people were in a fog at the time, and when it cleared off we saw the land. We had to throw over most of our cargo, which consisted of cattle, sewing machines, and cheese. At first we could not launch our boats, but at last, after one had been broken, we got them in safely. We went to Wexford; from there we went to Dublin. I have been all over England, and I have been in Edinburgh, which is a very pretty place. I have been through the whole of England, and I have been all over Switzerland, and liked it very much, especially Chamouni. We staid one night to see the top of Mont Blanc. I came back to America the year the Centennium was celebrated, and I had a very bad passage, having a snow-storm, and not being allowed on deck for three days. I like crossing the Atlantic very much, sometimes I was very sick and sometimes not. Our deer forest has fifty and sometimes more, which they shoot at the thousand acres, not counting the grouse moor and the home beat, where papa raises every year one thousand pheasants, which they shoot at the covert, shooting about the second week in November. We have some pretty scenery here, being situated about two miles from Loch Ness. We, looking from our room, can see the trees to the lake, and then a blue strip of water and hills for a background, and at one side the hills are covered with trees, and on the other side, the rocky hills on each side, with a few lonely thatched houses, with a little patch of potatoes or something else, and at the top of the mountains dark green fir-trees.

OWALA, INDIAN TERRITORY.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—We are two little Cherokee girls, who have received your paper for a year, and we are very much interested in it. I know that drifted to the tops of the fences this winter—the deepest we ever had. Our school-house is built on a hill, and the bell can be heard in the morning, and several of our little friends are subscribers to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and we are all interested in the story of "Two Arrows," for it describes the Indians farther West, who are so different from us, and yet are of the same race. I should think it would be better for them to be educated. I feel sorry for them; and the history of the Indians is sad.

DOLLY'S SANTA CLAUS.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

It was just two days before Christmas. The snow was falling fast, and the little feathery flakes were lighting on the sidewalks, and slowly but steadily building up a thick platform, and everything and everybody seemed to be full of the coming holiday. But, by no, not everything. Dolly Ashton's little face was just the reverse of happy as she gazed moodily out of the parlor window, wishing that she might be out, by leaving the snow storm. Dolly was only seven, still a little child, but yet, unlike other children, she never counted the days until Christmas. Dolly's mother was very kind to her, and she had for three years fighting the Indians out West, leaving his little girl, who did not remember him at all, with her uncle. This uncle knew nothing about children. He was not married, and spent a good deal of his time away from home on business, leaving Dolly alone with the servants, who took good care of her, and she was not expected. Dolly knew very few children, and her life was a sad, lonely one. Santa Claus never visited her, though many and many a time she hung up her stockings by the fireplace; she was always disappointed, and found it the next morning as limp and empty as when she had taken it off the night before.

This Christmas her uncle was away, and Dolly was feeling very unhappy and depressed. She had a cold, and was therefore kept in the house, while her mother, who had been so kind to her and a little girl, who were playing outside. They were taking turns in drawing each other up and down on a rule kind of cord, and though it was not very interesting, they were very happy, and they were poor children, they looked so happy and gay that Dolly really envied them. It was the little boy's turn to be seated on the end of his sister took the cord and set off on a lively run. Dolly was looking on full of interest, wondering if, in her haste, the little girl would notice the man who was hurrying up the hill, and in one to turn out of his way. A minute more, and when she looked again the little girl was lying on the snow, and she was standing up, and she was on one side, while the little boy looked on in mute distress. Then the man walked on, and Dolly heard the girl say:

"Oh, how happy! my leg hurts so I'm afraid I can't walk."

"I don't think I could drag you up all that way. It's more than I can rush up the hill, and I don't do that, and you there was a short silence."

Dolly waited a moment, deciding what she would do. She was rushing up the hill, she flung open the front door, and stood upon the stoop. A few minutes later the little brother

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WOULD you believe it, chicks, that some of you actually take the trouble to find out the puzzles, wrinkling up your pretty brows and taking your chubby fingers, and making out the nicest copies of squares and diamonds and acrostics, and then, after all, forget to sign your names? The Postmistress would remember your writing if she could, but she is so much like the old woman who lived in a shoe, and had so many children she didn't know what to do, that she cannot possibly do it. You should see how vexed and disappointed she looks when she peers over a sheet of paper, and searches in every corner, and finds no name. It's not kind of you, pets. And if you don't see your name among the bright children who answer puzzles, do not blame me.

As for young gentlemen who send exclamations and needles to sign them with full name and a full post-office address, I am not a bit sorry for their disappointment—not a single bit. When they are so very unbusinesslike, they ought to be disappointed. And if a lad chooses to send an exchange in pencil on a postal card, he need never expect to see it in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but he may, never, never be there. There is no objection to postals, but write with ink.

ENGLAND, NEW JERSEY, February 22, 1886.

DEAR POSTMISTERS.—I have to-day received a letter from Monroe, giving some of the statements asked for in response to the chapel in that place. Monroe is a country town of 300 people. The Church people bought a lot of paper was a small building, and they were very anxious as a temperance hall. They erected on one end of the building a tower, repaired it inside, and endeavored to make it look as church-like as possible, with as little expense. They laid ninety dollars for a bell, but have no communion-service, no baptisms font, and still the repairs to the chapel to be for. They laid ninety dollars a month. Any one wishing further particulars is at liberty to address Rev. E. Osborne, Charlotte, North Carolina. I think the money collected for this fund would be very appropriately applied to the buying of a communion-set, which might be given to Fairfax Payne, with the and sister were seated comfortably in Mr. Ashton's parlor, talking eagerly with their little hostess.

"You see," explained Johnny, "it was a holiday to-day, because it is so near Christmas, and the streets were all shut up, so that we could draw out here, because the streets are so narrow down where we live, and she gave us five cents to get the things we might just come up to, and I drew out in an sit down, and that I could stand on the step and they wouldn't send me off, and we were having a splendid time, but when Maggie fell, she answered the little girl's question."

"Yes," answered Maggie, very brightly for one who had received a serious injury. "But, oh! tomorrow she will be just the same. Maggie and Ben see shall hang up our stockings, and Santa Claus will fill them," she added, turning to Dolly. "And that's fun, isn't it, Johnny?"

"Yes," answered the little girl, merrily. "Santa Claus doesn't come here," said Dolly, sorrowfully.

Johnny looked at her with mingled pity and surprise. "Doesn't come here?" he echoed, "I wonder why not. Perhaps it's because there is only one child, and he doesn't think it's worth the trouble to come."

"I wish I had a sister," said Dolly, sadly. "I always wished so before, but now I do more than ever. What does Santa Claus bring you?" "Johnny says he brings things, things just where they're most needed; so last year I got this nice red hood, an Johnny got his tippet, and we each got a nice pair of boots, and I got a pair of shoes and some goodies," answered Maggie, brightly.

"I wish you were with us, to see what fun it is looking in the stockings. I'm sure you'd like it," answered the little girl, who had just had Maggie said: "I guess we'd better go now, Johnny. My leg is so much better, an' if you draw me to the corner, I can get into the car, and walk down our street."

"Do you have to go?" cried Dolly, heartily wishing she need not lose her bright little companion so soon.

The next day Dolly's cold was better, but the maid said she must stay in at least for the morning, and so Dolly staid here, again at the parlor window, hoping to see her little friend yesterday. About five o'clock in the afternoon it stopped snowing, and Dolly went to find Betsy, and she might go out. But Betsy, who was in the nursery now in the bedroom, and at last Dolly ran down stairs into the laundry to ask the laundress if she knew where her nurse was, and there she found the laundress sitting in the kitchen. Betsy had come out to lunch with a friend, thinking her little mistress could not, with her cold, be in the kitchen. The laundress told her that another sad, lonely afternoon for poor Dolly, and she walked back sorrowfully enough into the parlor. There she caught sight of a little piece of paper with Maggie had written on it, and the address, and she began to think whether she really might not go. Betsy was out, so there was no one to stop her, and without any more hesitation Dolly ran upstairs and put on her hat and coat. Then she took her purse in her hand, and thus fully equipped, she left her room and slipped out into the street without being seen, and she had a passing car, and was soon carefully watching the numbers of the streets. At last the car passed No. 2, and then No. 1; so, stopping the car, she descended, and was soon left standing alone on the sidewalk. She started off, looking carefully at the numbers of the houses that were written on the doors, and when she came to No. 58 she walked up the stoop and peeped into the hall. The door was ajar, so she pushed it open and walked in. There was an old rickety stair-case leading up to the first story, so Dolly, remembering that Maggie had told her that she and her brother lived on the second, chose that as her road, and began to toil up the stairs. She had only two flights she saw, as Maggie had said she would see, an old piece of paper with the name "O'Brien" on it, pasted up on one of the walls. Dolly went up to the top of the stairs that held the sign, and knocked rather timidly.

Maggie herself opened the door, and very surprised and glad too she was when she saw who it was the visitor.

Dolly sat down by the fireplace with Johnny and Maggie, and talked for a little while, and then she played, and by and by she was tired, and sleepy, and she thought that she would go to bed, with which to fill the child's stocking, for she had heard of the Fortune home, and of the entire absence of Santa Claus. She thought that if her own darlings would willingly give up a portion of their gifts, but then there was nothing which would be suitable for a rich child like Dolly, and she thought of anything that money could buy, but nothing more.

So thought Mrs. O'Brien as she finished filling out the stocking and turned to the old woman who worked with her, she herself lay down to rest, and not a person within the walls of the tiny apartment. Dolly stirred again till about ten o'clock that same evening, when Maggie woke up, and gave a little scream at the sight of the well-filled stockings. A moment more, and she had awakened her two companions, who were soon as well as herself. The stockings were soon examined, and just as the children had down the last few inches of the stockings, they were in the room, and they heard a church clock strike ten solemn strokes to their great amazement.

"Why," said Dolly, "I don't know what the first cry of Johnny and Maggie, but Dolly stood with a scared look on her face, and cried out pitiously: "Oh dear! what will they think at home? I ought not to have come at all. I must go right away."

"Her three friends looked very much surprised. "Why, don't your people know you are here?" asked Dolly.

"No," answered Dolly. "Visions of Betsy's stockings had risen before her with frightful vividness. "I ought to go right away."

So a few minutes later Dolly was sitting again in a street car, with Mrs. O'Brien by her side, being borne swiftly toward her own home, and by half an hour more she was in the hall of her uncle's house with Betsy, who was pulling her toward the parlor door. Dolly was greatly surprised to see her uncle in the room, but when he saw her he took her in his arms, and gave her the warmest kiss she had ever yet received from him. Then she saw that his face was very white and pale, and his voice trembled when he asked her where she had been. When she finished her little story he said, very earnestly, "Dolly, I hope if I live you will never go to any more of your Santa Claus parties, but do then quite understand just what her uncle meant, and she knows that ever since then Santa Claus has come to her in the same way, and she has a child, and that she is the happiest little girl with the kindest uncle in Ashton, and she is quite ready to believe when her uncle tells her that she loves all her happiness to little dolls and her sister, who are, as Dolly often says, her real Santa Claus. ROSE, ITALY.

DEAR POSTMASTER,—I read S. McR. Chater's letter in OUR Post-office box, and felt so sorry for the little girl who sent me the letter. I thought I would try what I could do toward helping to fill the purse, so I got my cousins and some of my friends to give what they could. I am eleven years old, and cannot do much, but mamma says every little is a help. My cousin Frank began to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE with the first number, and we are now reading it, so you may know how well we like the papers—we are old friends now. We have some numbers bound, and often read the first ones over again, because they are old now and they are new to us.

The following are the names of MY COUSINS and friends, and what they gives: Serena 1 Coy, 40 cents; William Garrett, 20 cents; Bertie Garrett, 20 cents; Heydon L. Street, 25 cents; Viola M. Huff, 30 cents; Gertrude Payne, 20 cents; Jessie Jones, 25 cents; Millie Jones, 25 cents; Nellie Jones, 25 cents; Matt Moore, 10 cents; Thelma Smith, 10 cents; Thelma Schiff, 30 cents; Tottie Sisson, 25 cents; Sereno Moore, 10 cents; Totie, $3.15.

Will you kindly see that S. McR. Chater gets the money? It did not say in the paper how we were to send it. I have been going to write to you, so will you please let me know how to do. I'm sorry to hear I lost my papa, grandmamma, and oldest aunt, all in one week, last December. It would make me very happy if you let me know how to send the money. One of my little sister readers,

SERENA COY.

The money came safely, and has been sent to Mrs. Chater. The fund now amounts to $20.

I am just eight years old to-day. My birthday presents were very pretty. The tally ho my father sent me from New York was jolly. I have had a great deal of information from other like the story of "Two Arrows" very much. One of my presents was a box of carpenter's tools. I appreciate it very much. Every Saturday I go to an industrial school, and am learning a carpenter's trade. I am very fond of reading.

HIS FIRST CRUISE.—By Frank H. Converse.

Part I.

WHEN Mrs. John Darling finally consented to let her Dan make an experimental voyage to the West Indies with her brother, Captain Zenas Bangs, master of the fruiting brig Dennis, she had a double purpose in view. The principal one, of course, was that the Captain would naturally have a care for Dan's welfare which a stranger would not feel. And the second, that as Captain Bangs was called a rather unpleasant ship master, her Dan might thereby become cured of his sea fever.

For though willing to yield her own wishes in the matter if it must be so, Mrs. Darling thought there were already enough sailors in the family. Her father was the oldest quartermaster in the navy; her brother Joe was a coast pilot; Zenas, as we have seen, was master of a brig; and her husband, Captain Darling, had been in the South Pacific trade without once returning home since Dan was eight years old, in which time the boy had shot up into a sturdy young fellow of fifteen, with good principles, considerable natural ability, and an excellent common-school education. And Captain Darling himself was sick of sea going. "At last I have a prospect of getting a charter for the States," he had written in his last letter from Calcutta, "and if I get home all right, I shall stay for good: I'm tired of living away from my family."

But, as I have said, Mrs. Darling, though wanting to keep Dan ashore if possible, was willing, if it must be so, to sacrifice her own wishes. And so she had consented to the experimental voyage, and with rather more than the usual amount of tears and blessings on the one side, and kisses and promises on the other, Dan left the comforts of home life for the discomforts of sea-life.

Now Captain Bangs, who was a genuine old sea-dog, surly and single, with a weather-beaten, peckery face the color of underdone beef, gray hair like a scrubbing brush, and a perpetual scowl, disliked all boys on general principles, and, from the very first day out, Dan saw that his berth in the Dennis's fore-castle would be anything but a bed of roses. Mind you, Dan was too sensible to look for favoritism on shipboard, and too manly to desire it. But he knew well enough that a boy who shows by his actions that coming to sea means business with him may not only be treated with ordinary civility by the officers without being "favored," but can also be given little chances of learning the nicer points of seamanship without its interfering in the least with his other duties.

Not that Dan was abused, but in common with the rest of the crew he had to stand any amount of harshness, which came, so to speak, second-hand from Captain Bangs through Mr. Dempsey, the chief mate, who was a coarse, loud-voiced Nova Scotian; and what was worse, Dan's uncle didn't seem to care whether he learned the rudiments of a sea education beyond the ordinary knowledge of how to "hand, reef, and steer" or not. When not thus employed, the most of his watch on deck for some four weeks of an uncommonly long passage was passed sitting aloft in a bowline swinging between sea and sky in company with a tar or grease bucket.

But by the time the Dennis had fairly entered the blue waters of the Caribbean Sea, Dan had learned to stow the flying jib or fore-royal unaided, was always first at the weather earing, could pick out the running gear in the darkest night, and took a very good trick at the wheel, Captain Bangs, who could not but help seeing all this, might, had he chosen, have given his nephew an occasional word of encouragement, if not of kindness; but whether it was that his nature was completely soured, or that he had taken a decided dislike to Dan above all other boys, certain it is that he never condescended him the slightest notice, excepting in the way of fault-finding. And when in rounding the outer headland of Kingstown Harbor, in the island of St. Vincent, the set of the current swung the brig's head off a point, Captain Bangs, whose long passage had made him more crusty than ever, soundly boxed Dan's ears as he stood at the wheel, the young fellow felt that this was indeed the last feather.

Letting go the spokes with a look more expressive even than words, Dan marched silently forward to the fore-castle, which he entered without heeding the Captain's angry recall. Ordinarily this would not have been allowable. But Captain Bangs, perhaps thinking he had gone rather too far, let it pass, and in the confusion of coming to anchor Dan was forgotten.

"Send Dan here to set me ashore," called Captain Bangs, who, after the sails were stowed and the decks cleared up, appeared on the quarter in a much-wrinkled go-ashore suit and an inflexible-looking stove-pipe hat.

"E went h ashore 'arf an hour since with 'is close-bag in the darky boat as brought h off the fruit 'n' vegetables, sir," called 'Enery, the cockney steward, from the galley.

Captain Bangs looked rather disturbed as he was being rowed to the landing by one of the men. "Wimmin are so plaguery unreasonable! I suppose his mother would blame me if—anything happened," he grumbled as he stepped ashore, where subsequent search and inquiry failed to throw any light upon the possible whereabouts of his nephew. For when Dan (whose open departure from the brig was unnoticed in the hubbub of anchoring) was set ashore with his clothes-bag, he did not meet a living individual on his way up from the beach, for the simple reason that it was Kingstown's noonday siesta; in other words, Kingstown was dozing in its own shade.

Under a cluster of the palm-trees bordering the main street, which itself follows the immediate curve of the harbor shore, was a large stone tank into which the water, conducted down by pipes from the mountain behind the town, was falling with a cool, refreshing sound—pleasant to the ear when, as on that particular day, the mercury indicated 98° in the shade.

Seating himself on the curb, with his clothes-bag at his feet, Dan, with a feeling of decided relief at his new-found freedom, uttered a pleased exclamation as he began looking about him.

What wonder? The still surface of the harbor reflected with the fidelity of a mirror the encircling gray-green cliffs rising three and four hundred feet in air. Dilapidated stone windmills, overrun with vines and creepers at different intervals along the face of the heights, had all the romantic effect of ruined castles. On the right-hand summit stood a fortress and barracks looking at the distance as though intended for a regiment of toy soldiers.

Overhead was a sky of no less dazzling blue than the outspread waters of the Caribbean Sea. Behind the sleeping town rose the slope of a mountain whose intensity of green verdure blended insensibly into a purple haze toward the summit, making a pronounced background for the cream-tinted flat-roofed houses and buildings which rose gradually above each other a short distance up the incline. The drowsy silence was unbroken save by the occasional monotonous cry of a cake or sweetmeat vendor in the almost deserted street, or the creaking of a heavy bullock cart toiling up the mountain road.

"What a lovely spot to live in!" mused Dan, happily unconscious of the ignorance, superstition, unhealthiness, and general moral and physical uncleanness hidden by the fair exterior. Not that Dan had come ashore with any foolish "runaway" notions in his head; he was far too sensible for that. He had simply resolved not to go back to the States in the Dennis, but find a chance in some one of the numerous vessels lying at anchor in the harbor.

"Unless I have to, I don't set foot on board of you again," muttered Dan, whose ears still tingled, and with the words, I am sorry to say, he shook his fist rather spitefully in the direction of the distant Dennis.

"You not much like those brig, eh?" said a smooth foreign voice so near him that Dan started. Turning about, he met the steady gaze of a pair of very sharp black eyes belonging to an olive-complexioned, middle-aged man with a heavy mustache (through which a set of even white teeth showed in an agreeable smile), who, sitting on the opposite curb, was rolling a cigarette skilfully between his muscular brown fingers.

"Why, I don't know," stammered Dan, staring with all his might at the stranger's picturesque attire, which did not seem altogether out of keeping with the man himself or his surroundings. For he wore a wide-brimmed Panama, a white shirt with a most elaborately embroidered front, white linen trousers belted with a crimson sash of silk net, low Spanish leather shoes, and scarlet silk stockings, and had a general air of having just stepped off an operative stage.

"Maybe p'haps you run away from vessel?" suggested the mysterious unknown, who, having lighted his cigarette, was calmly eyeing Dan and his clothes-bag through the thin clouds of blue smoke breathed through his lips and nostrils.

"No," returned Dan, not caring to enter into particulars; "I've only left her. I want to get a chance to the States in some other vessel; that's all."

"Um!" was the response. And then, after a short pause, in which the speaker seemed to be choosing his words with considerable care, he continued: "My name Capitan Manuel Despardo; my vessel there"—with an airy wave of his muscular fingers toward a handsome eighty-ton schooner painted white, with a bead of black following the graceful curve of her bows—"she boun' to-morrow, bime-by, for Bos'n. I want smart 'Merican fellow to make up crew, for dem black mans no good"—pointing disdainfully to a couple of negroes slumbering placidly in the shade—"so s'pose you get good pay, good grub, my schooner Donna carry you back home quicker than steamer."

It was the concluding sentence that did the business. "Blessed are the homesick," writes the German poet, "for they shall go home." And all at once it came to Dan that, beautiful beyond compare as were his present surroundings, it was as nothing compared with his mother's front door-yard. He glanced critically at the Donna. The days of "the long, low schooner, with raking masts and tapering spars," once familiar to readers of nautical fiction, are past, or Dan might have almost been inclined to question the peaceable calling of the schooner whose symmetrical lines and general appearance rather suggested the privateering or buccaneering vessels of other days.

"Coaster or trader, perhaps," thought Dan, carelessly, and dismissing the subject as of no particular consequence. As long as she was bound to the States, Dan made up his mind at once.

"I'll go. When do you want me aboard, sir?" he said, briefly.

"Oh, bime-by; send 'shore to the quay for you some lime 'fore dark," was the reply, given in an easy tone, though inwardly Captain Despardo exulted, as, being tolerably well known in Kingstown, he had always found great difficulty in completing his crew there.

Rising to his feet as he spoke, the Donna's commander, putting his fingers to his lips, executed the shrill whistle of the stage outlaw who thus summons his trusty followers to his side. In obedience to the signal a heavily built, wartho-faced fellow, in the universal tow shirt and trousers of the tropics, who had been sitting on the landing-stage steps, where the Donna's boat was fastened, made his way toward them. Giving him a brief order in a sort of mongrel Spanish, the fellow, after favoring Dan with a stare of unqualified astonishment, picked up the clothes-bag, and placing it upon his head, retreated therewith to the boat.

"Now I sure you come aboard," tranquilly observed Captain Despardo, as Dan looked a little surprised at this cool way of obtaining security, so to speak, for his appearance at the appointed time and place. And tranquilly lighting another cigarette, the Captain, with a curt adios, walked down to the boat, leaving Dan in a state of bewildered doubt as to whether he had not been a trifle hasty in his decision.

But it was rather too late for such reflections, and leaving the watering-place, he strolled listlessly across the street to the shady side, where some few signs of a gradual awakening from the noontide siesta were beginning to show themselves. Yet Kingstown has little of interest for even New England eyes. The one and two story houses were dreary jail-like-looking structures with iron-grated windows and a stable at the end of the spacious hall. The principal articles of traffic in the dingy shops seemed to be for the most part gaudy dress stuffs, cheap jewelry, baker's bread, cigars, and spirituous liquors. The passage along the irregular pavement was disputed by burly negroes in linen drawers, creole dandies in white linen, native soldiers in blue and buttons, droves of burden-bearing coolies, and ladies of color upon whose erect heads were balanced trays of various edibles. The heated air was redolent of the fumes of steaming soup from kettles cooking on charcoal braziers at the edge of the street, at one of which, by an outlay of fourpence ha'penny, Dan succeeded in satisfying the cravings of a very healthy appetite. He reached the landing-stage at sundown, just in time to miss meeting Captain Bangs, who, after an unsuccessful shore search, had been pulled back to the Donna's, where, sitting under the quarter-deck awning, with a cigar in his mouth, he was wondering what had become of "the young fool," as he called his missing nephew, and at the same time admiring the graceful proportions of the Donna, which, with her anchor at the cathead, and sails hoisted, was just catching the light land breeze as, forging slowly ahead, she passed close under the Donna's quarter.

"Good-by, Captain Bangs," called out one of the crew, stepping to the rail and taking off his coarse straw hat. "I'm going back to the States in the Donna. Sailing with a fellow's relations don't pay."

Captain Bangs sprang to his feet. "Going to the States!" he echoed. "Good gracious! Mr. Dempsey, that Despardo has managed to toll Dan aboard his vessel by telling him he's bound to the States. Dan! DAN!" he bellowed, running to the rail and gesticulating violently; but the schooner was beyond the reach of his voice.

UNCLE JACK'S HOBBY.

BY GEORGE F. JONES.

PART EE.

THE next day Walter rode on his pony down to the river, where his uncle's mill was. It was a little mill, as mills go, where they made flannel. He had been through it once, but he hadn't understood much of it.

He tied his pony at the gate, and went into the office, which was a little building separate from the mill. He found his uncle talking to one of the overseers—a stout man in a white apron.

As Walter entered, his uncle gave him three blue pictures, one of which was the one he had shown him the evening before.

"Sit down for a little while," said he, "and see if you can make anything out of these."

So Walter sat down and looked at the new pictures. Walter saw at once that Fig. 3 was a picture of the same engine, only with the cylinder—this was the syringe part—cut through so that he could see the piston and the piston-rod. Then the connecting rod and pin and wheel were represented just as they had been in the first picture.

The other picture, Fig. 4, he couldn't understand at all till his uncle, who had been watching him, came across

"THERE WAS AN OLD WOMAN WHO LIVED IN A SHOE"—
WHAT A VERY GREAT PITY SHE DIDN'T HAVE TWO!

the room and said to him: "That is a sort of map of the engine. It is just as it would look if you cut it through the middle of the cylinder and then looked at it from the top."

Then Walter saw plainly the piston and piston-rod and the connecting rod and the wheel and axle, but he could make nothing of a part marked S C on one side of the cylinder. He could see what looked like curved passages leading into the two ends of the cylinder, and he supposed that it was through them that the steam was blown in. But that was all he could understand.

His uncle was so busy with the overseer, however, that he didn't like to trouble him, and the clerks kept staring at him, which made him feel uncomfortable, so that the time passed very slowly, till at last the overseer went away, and his uncle called him and showed him another picture which he had been drawing himself (Fig. 5). Walter looked at it, and could make out two cylinders, each with a piston and a piston-rod, and the strange thing marked S C, but the piston-rods were broken off, and there were no connecting rods or wheels.

"I thought," said Uncle Jack, "that it wasn't worth while to put in the connecting rod and wheel again. You have them pretty firmly fixed in your head by this time, haven't you?"

"Oh yes, I think I understand them," said Walter.

"And you understand how the engine will go if only the piston moves back and forward, don't you?"

"Yes."

"Now, then, Walter, you remember about those rubber tubes that we fastened to the ends of the squirt?"

"Yes," said Walter; "you have put them in that picture, marked S W."

"That's right; S W stands for steam-way. Here they are made of iron, and you can see how they are curved up around the cylinder, so as to get their ends close together."

"Just as if I wanted to take both the rubber pipes into my mouth at once," said Walter.

"That's just it, my boy. Now you know there is a pipe in your throat that comes up into your mouth, and when you are blowing into one of these pipes you hold a good deal of air in your mouth."

"It comes out of your mouth with a flop when you lift your cheeks," said Walter. "And is this pipe my windpipe?"

"Precisely," said Uncle Jack; "and here it is a steam-pipe coming from the boiler into this iron box on the side of the cylinder. You can see the pipe with its top broken off in Fig. 3, with a little wheel on it."

"Is the iron box the thing marked South Carolina?" asked Walter.

"S C stands for steam-chest," replied Uncle Jack, severely, "and not South Carolina, in this instance. The steam is held in the steam-chest just as you hold the air in your mouth. Now these two steam-ways in the ends of the cylinder both lead from the steam-chest, as you see, and there is a passage between them that leads straight out into the open air. Have you ever when you have been passing a mill, seen a pipe coming out of the wall or of the roof, and steam puffing out of it?"

"Oh yes," said Walter.

"That's the pipe that leads from the middle passage. You can see the beginning of it in the picture, marked E, and it is called the exhaust."

"But if there are three ways that steam can get out of the steam-chest, and they are all open," remarked Walter, "I should think that the steam would just blow out through the middle hole, and the engine wouldn't go at all."

"So it would," said Uncle Jack, "if they were all open at the same time, but they're not. In fact, the valve, about which I spoke to you before, is so fixed that it can shut all the passages up at once; and though you can slide it so that you can open one of these steam-ways into the cylinder at a time, you can never open both of them at once, and you can never let the steam from the steam-chest into the exhaust passage."

"Then the valve is a sort of door," said Walter.
 "Yes," said Uncle Jack, "it is a sliding door and a sort of vestibule combined. But, as I said, it will only slide far enough to open one of these steam-ways at once."

"Is the valve in your picture?" asked Walter.
 "Yes; it is marked V."
 "I see," said Walter. "In this Fig. 5 it is pulled back, so that the steam can come in in front of the piston."

"That's it; when the valve is back, the steam pushes the piston back; then, if you pull the valve forward as it is in Fig. 6, the steam will come in at the back way and push the piston forward again. The valve is always moving back and forth a little ahead of the piston, and the big lumbering piston is always following it. For every little stroke that the valve makes the piston makes a big one."

"Well," said Walter, dubiously, "if the valve is just a door to let the steam in, what is it humped up in the middle for, like a measuring-worm?"

"That is to let the steam out of the cylinder," said Uncle Jack. "If you remember, you are so far only letting steam in with your valve. Now if you didn't let it out again, you would presently have both ends of your cylinder full of steam, and the piston wouldn't know which way to go."

"Besides," said Walter, "you said that the steam came out of the exhaust, and I said I had seen it coming out of pipes on mills."

"That's just where it does go out, and if you'll look carefully at Fig. 5 again, you will see how."

So Walter took the picture.
 "The valve is back," said he, slowly, "so the passage in front is open, letting steam in in front of the piston where those arrows are, and moving it back."

"Now where does the steam behind the piston go?" asked Uncle Jack.

"Why, it has got to go out of the back steam-way, I suppose," said Walter. "But the valve is shutting that. Oh no, it isn't; the steam can go right up into the hump on the valve, and come back through the exhaust passage."

"That's just the way," said his uncle; "you have the mystery of the hump now, and you can see how the steam gets into the air. Suppose you put in some more arrows to show just how the steam goes?"

So Walter put in the arrows that you see in the picture.

FIG. 4.

"But how does the valve move?" said Walter. "I don't see how you can get at it, all shut up in that box of hot steam."

"Why," said Uncle Jack, "the valve has a valve-rod fastened to it just as the piston has a piston-rod fastened to it. You can see it in Fig. 4, marked V R."

"It is bent," said Walter.

"Yes," said Uncle Jack. "Now this valve-rod is fastened to a valve crank-pin, just as the main rod is fastened to the valve crank-pin; but there is this difference: the piston moves the main rods, and they move the main crank-pin, but the valve crank-pin moves the valve-rod, and that moves the valve."

"I don't quite understand that," said Walter.
 "I am trying to say too much at once," said Uncle Jack. "You know how the piston moves the wheel. Now if you'll look at Fig. 4 you'll see that there is a little crank-pin fastened to the other side of the wheel, just as the treadle crank is fastened to the grindstone. It is marked V P."

"So the wheel has two cranks, just as the grindstone has," said Walter; "a big one on one side, and a little one on the other."

"Just so, and this bent valve-rod is fastened to the little crank. Have you ever noticed, Walter, how the treadle seems to go of itself when you turn the big hand crank on the grindstone?"

"Oh yes," said Walter; "the little crank makes it go."
 "Now," said Uncle Jack, "it is just the same here. Of course when the engine moves the wheel, this little crank will move the valve, just as the other little crank moved the treadle. So as long as there is steam in the steam-chest the steam will make the wheel go, and the wheel will make the valve go, and the passages will open and shut like Jack Robinson."

FIG. 5.

"Do you mean that the engine makes itself go?" said Walter. "And that when it once gets going the piston moves the wheel, and the wheel moves the valve, and then the valve moves the piston, so that it never stops?"

"Oh no," said Uncle Jack; "it doesn't run itself; the steam runs it. All the engine does is to open the door at the right time for the steam to walk in and push the piston."

"Then what does the engineer have to do?" asked Walter.

"He turns the steam on and off with that wheel there is on the steam-pipe in Fig. 3, just as you turn water on and off with a faucet. Then he keeps the engine clean, and oils her up, and that's all. Come down and see her."

So they went across the mill-yard to the repair shop. It was all quiet there except for an apprentice who was at work at a vise, whistling.

He stopped as they came up.
 "Where are all the rest of you?" said Uncle Jack.
 "They're all up in the weaving-room, putting up one of the new looms."

"All right," said Uncle Jack. "Just start up the engine for us; I want Walter here to see it."

So they crossed over to the other side of the shop. There stood Uncle Jack's hobby, in its bright black and shining steel.

"Start her up," said Uncle Jack, and the apprentice turned on the wheel on the steam-pipe a little at first as the rod came slowly forward, and then slowly back, and then he turned on more and more steam, until the wheel began to spin and the rods to fly.

And Walter stood and watched it, and wished it were he who was allowed to start it and stop it.

OUT OF THE POPPER.

BY JESSIE W. MORTON.

LUCY HAYES tipped out a popperful of corn just as her mother entered the room.

"How very pretty it is, mother!" she said, offering a heaping handful.

Her mother smiled and nodded. Then she went to the closet and brought Lucy two little packages, one of pink and one of blue sugar. "These were left from the last birthday celebration," she said. "There is not enough left to decorate a cake, but plenty to color pop-corn."

If well done, crystallized pop-corn is as nice as candy. Have your corn well popped, no hard kernels of unpopped corn in it.

Boil a cup of sugar in a third of a cup of water until it strings from the spoon. Drop in a little essence of any kind, and pour it all over the dish of corn, having some one else tossing it about with two forks while you do it. When cool, it should be dry enough to put in candy bags, each bursting, flower-like grain glittering with its sugar coating. The children made a dish of the white corn first; then colored half of the remaining candy with pink sugar, and half with blue, as their mother had suggested; then tossed them all together in a glass platter, and piled it high with glistening red, white, and blue.

"Give me a dozen of your largest ones," said Mrs. Hayes. "My embroidery scissors too, and the sharp penknife in my work-basket. Then bring me your paint-box."

She looked over the handful of pop-corn eagerly tendered her, and selected one with five petals, or branches, as you might call them.

The middle one turned up, and the four others made clumsy little legs to support the rounded top.

Two snips of the scissors, a little trimming of the sharp penknife, and the front of the popped corn looked something like a lamb's head. The legs were made more shapely too, and then a few touches of brown and pink paint made eyes and nose for a very small sheep indeed.

The children shouted, "Mother! how cunning!" and watched with eager interest as she made a dozen more, and set them in a little bunch together.

"You must make great flocks of them, children. It will take more than one rainy day to get enough. Part of you can work at the flock, and the rest must build sheds and pastures of those brown kernels that didn't pop well."

"But how, mother?" exclaimed Lucy. "See, they are as slippery as if they were varnished."

Her mother sent in to the kitchen for some flour and water, and mixed them into a stiff dough.

"This is our mortar," she said, gayly.

On a board she laid out a long, narrow shed with dough, gently pressing in the kernels of corn afterward. A tiny pinch of dough here and there, and the corns irregularly placed, laid endwise, sidewise, on end, and that, made a very pretty imitation of a stone wall. When finished, it was put into a slow oven until the dough was stiff and hard.

Roofing with pasteboard, with imitation shingles painted on it, and surrounding the open sheds by similar stone (?) walls to make yards, with pasteboard troughs and gates cut from pasteboard to imitate bars, made the whole thing a very cunning and accurate picture of their father's stock-yards.

The lambs and sheep were not so accurate, of course; but they did very well, and furnished amusement and occupation for many hours.

And the corn that was not made into balls, or sheep, or fences, or sheds, or crystallized, or eaten fresh from the popper, they put into the coffee-mill, and after it was ground they moistened it with cream and sweetened it with sugar to make no-cake. Ever eaten any? Try it.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HORSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE 21st of August was an exciting day for Ashfield. No trial had ever interested the place or any of its people so much as that of Sandy or Alexander Martin for the murder of young George Moxon on the night of May 30, fifteen months before.

The murder had no doubt been a cruel and revengeful one, but that was not the main reason for the general desire to bring the murderer to justice. Ashfield "society" would not have been so much interested but for the surrounding circumstances, the other events which had belonged to the same period.

Various small, but, as Mrs. Keith had expressed it, "annoying" robberies had been committed in the town, and the night of the 30th of May was marked first by the murder, then by an attempted robbery at Miss Emerson's house, and the complete plundering of a very fine private yacht whose owners were away, and which for the night had been left in charge of one sailor only.

Naturally enough, the constables of the town and detectives from a larger city were speedily at work; but the most curious part of it all was that the very men who had been most strongly suspected, and who had evidently been ringleaders in the general villainy of the night, could not be found. Job Martin, it is true, was tracked, but only at his death-bed; Ryerson and Tuckler were hunted down and imprisoned for as long a term as the nature of any offence proven against them would admit; but the one on whom all suspicion of being the murderer rested, Sandy Martin, had just been discovered in the mining country of Pennsylvania, and was now in Ashfield on trial for his life.

Sandy, of course, had protested his innocence, but at least a dozen witnesses had been called to prove the contrary, and among them these facts had been made very clear:

Sandy and young Moxon had been seen together quarrelling on the beach road at half past ten or eleven o'clock; various people testified to having heard the angry words and threats used by Sandy, and added to all this was the fact that the slung-shot used as a weapon by the murderer was proven to have been Martin's—one which he had purchased in Bayberry, the neighboring village, and which he had been heard to say would "make a corpse of some one in Ashfield before he was a week older."

That Sandy was one of a reckless, lawless family also told against him; that he had no friends among the better kind of people in the town was also hard; and when Miss Emerson had—privately, it is true—engaged a lawyer for his defence, she had not dared even admit as much to her aunt, nor to allow, even to herself, that her chief reason for so doing was because she felt almost sure of Sandy's innocence, and surer still that the course of the trial would bring something of her long-lost Jo to light.

For Faith had been convinced for a year past that Jo's fight had something directly to do with the murder. She had not in the least appreciated what the tortures of her twenty-four hours' imprisonment had been to the girl; not in the least understood the terrible impression made by her own parting words upon Jo's already overstrung and excited mind. How astonished, therefore, would she have been had she known that her own chance words at the Burnham festival gave Jo the first knowledge of Sandy's capture, arrest, or supposed crime. Equally surprised would Faith have been to know that on the morning of the 30th, while she and Miss Grace lingered at breakfast discussing the probable result of the trial that day, Jo was not half a mile distant, in the little upstairs sitting-room of good Mrs. Joyce's hotel, waiting for the appearance of Mr. Burton, who was to conduct her to court.

Jo could not have said why she felt so strangely still and silent. She had no doubts of herself. She felt sure she could answer whatever "they" chose to ask her; but for the present, until she had to move or speak, the girl could only keep very still.

"You'd better try and eat a bit more, my dear, I'm thinking," said the kind-hearted Scotch landlady, pouring out a large cup of tea and glancing regretfully at Jo's untasted breakfast. "It won't do you any good to go yonder fasting."

Jo was in the window, with her bonnet and gloves on, all ready for her summons, but she turned to Mrs. Joyce, shaking her head.

"I couldn't eat, thank you, ma'am," she said, quietly; and then continued to watch the sunny street for the first token of Mr. Burton's coming.

"I'm wondering what the creature 'll say in court the day?" said Mrs. Joyce, down stairs in her own parlor, to her lame daughter, who was her confidante, and so had understood that Mr. Burton brought this "Mary Brooks" as a witness for the defendant in the murder case so exciting to them all. "If she doesn't rouse up, there'll not be much good to be had out of her. There she sits, with those great mournful eyes of hers fixed and so sad-looking! Eh, but she makes me think of somebody, and I can't tell just who it is."

"What like is she, mother?" queried Jeanie Joyce, with much interest.

"Oh, a tall, well-made lassie, about sixteen year old, I should say; fairish, with pretty, glossy brown hair as neatly combed back as you please, and a nice, simple young face. But it's her eyes that puzzle me. I've met their look somewhere before. I'm bound to think it out." And Mrs. Joyce, who was determined to attend this all-important day of the trial, went about the work of her household with a perplexed air. Whose eyes were they?

Mr. Burton had been closeted an hour with Mr. Hogenecamp and Bertie that morning. The evening previous the old lawyer had put Jo through her story, and been convinced, as was Mr. Burton, of the entire truthfulness of what the girl said.

"I believe you are telling the truth, my dear," he had said, as Jo finished.

The young girl looked at him in quiet wonderment.

"Why, what else did I come here for, sir?" she said, softly.

To Jo it seemed strange that any one, even a perfect stranger and a fine gentleman like Mr. Hogenecamp, should suppose she would wish to put herself in such a terrible position if it were not for the sake of truth. But, as I have said, there was nothing "romantic" about Jo; she had no desire to be considered a "heroine."

Bertie Farnham's state of mind, as may well be imagined, was one of great excitement, but it was very hard not to be able to tell Faith at once; but Faith, not ill from any cause that she or the doctor could detect, must not, they all said, have any "shock" or excitement. Dr.

Wraxall, the old physician of Ashfield, as he looked at the sweet young face with its gradually fading bloom, its deepening lines, and ever-growing tenderness and softness, would shake his head, recalling the mother who had died when Faith was a baby; and the elderly people of Ashfield said among themselves that Faith never had been vigorous, never really strong, forgetting the many seasons when her step had been lightest and freest among Ashfield maidens, her voice gayest, her laughter that of healthiest, happiest youth.

No, it was to be broken quietly to Faith after the trial was over—told her in a careful way. Meanwhile, no one of the three people who knew of Jo's presence in Ashfield suspected for one instant what was really likeliest to happen—that quietly and from some secluded part of the court-room Faith would be a spectator of the summing up of a trial in which she had so keen an interest.

So Faith and Jo really set out unconsciously to meet each other at the same hour.

Mr. Burton came for Jo in a carriage, and as they were driven to the court-room he gave her a few words of general advice as to what she ought to do and say; but Mr. Hogenecamp and Bertie had both urged that the girl be left to give her testimony in her own way; and that Mr. Burton's most impressive remarks fell rather short of their purpose was proved by the way in which Jo turned and asked, seriously, "Will she be there, sir—Miss Faith, I mean?" showing that this seemed to her of more importance than almost anything else; but the fact was that Jo would have wished to spare Faith's beholding her public disgrace.

The usual crowd had collected about the court house, and Jo, had she thought of such a thing, would have recognized some of her old friends among them, but she saw or heard nothing clearly—all seemed in a sort of maze until she found herself in a room adjoining the court, and some one, it seemed to be Mr. Bertie Farnham, speaking to her.

"You mustn't be frightened, Jo," he was saying, his honest young face full of compassion. "You are to wait here, you know, until you are called in for your turn."

"Yes, Mr. Bertie," said Jo, quietly.

She took the seat they gave her, folded her hands, and waited.

The shuffling in of the crowd, the sounds that told of the opening of the court, the monotonous voices of the officials, reached Jo, as she sat there, like the voices and sounds of a dream. Then at last Mr. Hogenecamp's clerk and Bertie appeared. Jo rose at once to her feet, knowing instinctively that her time had come.

In another moment she found herself being almost lifted into the witness box, where for one instant she stood still, looking about her in a stony, terrified way. The faces of the crowd seemed swaying back and forth. The judge and jury, the lawyers and clerks and reporters, all seemed blending in a sort of mist, out of which Jo, trying to steady her gaze, gradually made out the yellow locks and freckled face of her old foe, Sandy—the lad whose life she had come here to save—who would doubtless jeer at her on her way to prison on the morrow.

One awful moment of a sort of despair came over her as she met his sullen though panic-stricken gaze. What might have followed, Jo used to wonder later, had it not been that almost at the same moment her glance shifted, seemed to drift across the sea of faces, to meet one look—an earnest, joyous, solemn look—straight from Faith's eyes into her own.

CHAPTER XXII.

FAITH and her aunt had found themselves compelled to take rather prominent seats among the audience in the court-room at Ashfield; but several ladies of the town were there, for young Moxon had once been an interesting boy to many good people in the place, and, moreover, the trial was of consequence, because it had brought to light various of the small robberies which had been puzzling the community for a long time previous to the famous 30th of May.

"YOU'D BETTER TRY AND EAT A BIT MORE, MY DEAR."

Mrs. Keith fondly hoped to recover—how she did not know—a long-lost enamel brooch with her great-aunt's hair in the back of it; and Bertie Farnham, anxious to have Jo's return create the proper sort of excitement, had assured her the day before she ought to be present. Also this ingenious youth had impressed the fact upon the Barkers, Applebys, and Colvilles, so that when Faith and Miss Grace entered, many of their North Street neighbors greeted them with that mixture of solemnity and disapproval which they considered fitting for such an occasion. Mrs. Keith leaned across Kitty Barker to whisper to Faith.

"Bertie Farnham says there is to be a new witness from Burnham, a very interesting one, too, a young girl who has something special to tell."

Faith smiled and nodded in reply. Then followed the usual opening of the case, the examination of some final witnesses for the prosecution, during which time Sandy's wretched countenance grew more and more dejected.

It would have been hard not to pity him, in spite of his misguided youth, his defiant, careless conduct. Brought to trial for his life, the lad was completely stunned and terrified, and for the first time in his remembrance a sense of disgrace had come over him, which, mingled with the fear of the scaffold, had wrought a change in every line of the boy's dull face. From the first he had no hope, for the fact that the "pleece" had actually caught him, that he was on trial for murder, that his record in Ashfield was so poor a one, was enough to convince one of his weak mind that every one was bent on hanging him, and there "wasn't no one as ud say a good word."

He had thought of Jo, but he knew that she too had escaped from Ashfield, and he rejoiced in the fact, for that she would do anything to help him out of trouble never once had occurred to his mind. Such generosity, and from a girl, he could not have understood. Had Sandy forgotten that, with all her rough, wild ways, Jo Markham had always been the "champion" of Sailors' Row? When had the distressed or imposed upon, be it child or dog or even half-starved cat, come to her in vain? And the childish days of Sailors' Row were past; the "new witness" who stood so still and white in the little box, gazing fixedly at poor Sandy, was another being.

Bertie had tried to give Faith a quiet word of preparation, as soon as he had perceived her between Kitty Barker and her aunt, but it had only bewildered her; then had followed the preliminary of introducing a new witness. Straining her gaze, Faith saw the little side door opened, and a tall girl come in at Mr. Burton's side; but a moment had gone by before she fully understood that the neatly clad young figure, the fair, thin face and large dark eyes, belonged to no other than her long-lost Jo.

 The dearest household pet
 That ever in the household chain
 Was like a jewel set.
 To her pet, Madam Pussy,
 Oft prattles by the hour,
 And thus I heard her thoughts about
 The morning-glory's flower.

"Hush, pussy—hush and listen!
 The fairies to and fro
 Are dancing on the dewy grass
 When morning-glories blow;
 They trip along the trellis,
 And pipe the sweetest things,
 And flit from airy bell to bell
 With shining, gauzy wings.

"If you'd be serious, Kitty,
I'd let you go with me,
And then, if you were very good,
A fairy you might see.
We'd peep into the trumpets—
I'd hold you up myself—
And wouldn't it be fun to find
A cunning little elf?"

"But, puss—my naughty pussy—"
She strokes the velvet fur,
And smiles as puss returns her love
With such a gentle purr.
"Now just be sober, pussy;
If you should spring away,
You'd frighten all the fairy troop
For ever and a day."

"And when the wind is stirring
So softly from the south,
We'd never hear the music from Each morning-glory's mouth;
The tiny, tiny trumpets,
We'd never hear them blow;
And that would be a dreadful thing,
My pussy—don't you know?"

Thus plays the childish fancy;
The morning-glory's light
Is on the sweet coquetish face,
So arch, so coyly bright.
God bless our little Gypsy!—
The dearest household pet
That ever in the household chain
Was like a jewel set.

Among the morning-glories
The merry footsteps stray,
Herself a morning-glory
As beautiful as they;
So made for smiles and kisses,
We write her sweet pet name,
And wreath her flowers around her,
A picture in a frame.

MARBLES AS PLAYED IN NEW YORK.

A TEXAS boy wrote to the editor of the New York Sun recently asking him to be so kind as to print in his paper the rules for playing marbles, and the following article on the various games played by New York city boys is what the Sun printed in accordance with the Texas boy's request:

"In playing the bull ring, a ring three feet in diameter is made on level ground. The marbles are grouped in the centre of the ring, or put in a small hole about two inches in diameter by one and a half deep. The player shoots from the edge of the ring, and is allowed to shoot as long as he knocks a marble out without sending his own marble over the line. If his shooter goes over the line, the next player takes his turn, and so on through the game.

"The Yank or Yankee game is also a favorite. It is played in a ring about a foot in diameter. Straight lines are drawn, quartering the ring. If there are two players, one marble is placed on the right and one on the left hand side of the ring. If a number of players take part in the game, the marbles are placed on the ring and cross lines. A mark is made about a dozen feet from the ring. The first player knuckles down at the mark and shoots. If he happens to knock out a marble, he shoots again, and so on until he misses, in each case shooting from the position which his marble has assumed. If there is a good opportunity, when the second player shoots he tries to hit the first player's marble. If he succeeds, he takes all the marbles the first player has knocked out of the ring. If he hits the first player's marble a second time, he puts the player out of the game. He then shoots for marbles in the ring, taking care not to leave his marble near the line or tie, so as to give the next player a chance to hit it. A player must always shoot across the ring on his first shot, and should keep his marble as far away from the other players' marbles as possible, so as to force them to a long shot. The other players are equally as wary, as neither wants to be forced from the game. They lay for each other until one ventures a shot. The game is thus played until only one player is left, unless all the staked marbles are knocked from the ring. The players combine against the one who has knocked the most marbles from the ring, and he, hard pressed, frequently bribes one of his antagonists to knock the last staked marble from the ring, thus insuring all that he has won. The game sometimes lasts an hour or more. Each player may win the marbles and lose them again before it closes. The player who gets put out first is the last shot in the ensuing game, and the one who gets put out second is next to the last, and so on.

"A game called the 'stand-up ring' is played with a ring two feet in diameter, and about half a foot from a house or fence. The marbles being placed in the centre, a mark is made about ten feet away, from which the players stand and shoot. They always stand up, and hold their shooters about two inches below the right eye. A player continues to shoot as long as he succeeds in knocking the marbles out.

"The Paterson or Fat game is played similar to the Yankee game, only a player is not put out when his shooter is hit.

"Another game, called 'm-in-a-hole,' is played with three holes about three feet apart, and so small that if a marble is shot with great force it will roll out of the hole. The player, in taking his first shot, knuckles down at the edge of the end hole and shoots for the middle hole. If he goes into the middle hole, he is allowed to take a span the length of his hand on the opposite side of the hole, and to shoot from the span. He shoots for the next hole, and so on until he misses. Then the next player shoots. If he goes in the centre hole, and the next player's shooter is near enough, he takes a span and shoots at his marble. If the marble is hit, he is allowed to place his own marble in the next hole. If they are playing for marbles, he wins one whenever he hits the other's shooter. He then takes a span from where his marble lies, and shoots back for the centre hole. If he misses this, the next player takes his turn, with better or worse luck, as the case may be. The idea of the game is to get 'king' first, which is done by going backward and forward in the holes three times. The player who does this first is made king of all the holes, and when any of the players miss going into a hole, the king is allowed to take one foot and a span from the first hole, two feet and a span from the second hole, and three feet and a span from the third hole before shooting at the other marbles. Sometimes he knocks them from fifteen to twenty feet from the hole. It is hard for the unlucky player to get near the hole again, as the king hits him every time he fails to make it. Another player may shoot and miss, and receive the same punishment. The game lasts until all are kings, or until it breaks up in a fight.

"Another game is known as 'followings.' The first player throws his marble in the street, and the second player shoots at it. If he hits it, he gets a marble and has another shot, and so on through the game.

"The 'bridge' is played nowadays more than any other game. In place of a ring a thin piece of wood is used. It is about a foot long and two and a half inches wide, with a handle at one end. Several square holes are cut in the lower edge of the stick, and numbered from one up, according to the number of holes. A player knuckles down several feet away from the bridge, and attempts to shoot through the holes. If he succeeds, he gets as many marbles as the number of the hole his marble passes through calls for; if he misses, he loses his marble.

"No matter what the game may be, these words are always heard: 'Histin's!' 'Roundin's!' 'Clerrin's!' 'Knucklin's!' 'Fen everything's!' 'Fen grinlin's!' 'Fen swipin's!' 'Fen punchin's!' 'Fen dubs!' 'Tribs!' and 'Fen babyin's!'

"A new game has recently been imported from France. Two players will contribute an equal number of marbles, anywhere from ten to fifty. These are taken by one of the players and thrown at a hole, which is usually a half-circle in the ground, against a house or fence. When the player throws the marbles he cries, 'Head' meaning that an even number of the marbles will stay in the hole. If he is right, he takes all the marbles, but if wrong, the other player gets them all."

BY HOWARD PYLE.

THERE were three brothers who went out into the world to seek their fortunes. The two elder lads were smart fellows enough; as for Peterkin, why, nobody thought much of him.

By-and-by they came to a great black forest, where hunger met them, and that was the worse for them, for there was nothing at all to eat. After a while, what should they come across but a little gray hare caught in a snare? Then, if anybody was glad, it was the two elder brothers.

But Peterkin had a soft heart in his breast. Said he, "It would be a pity to take its life, even though our stomachs do grumble a bit."

So he begged, and begged, and begged, until at last the two others said that they would let the little gray hare go free if Peterkin would give them the two pennies that he had in his pocket. Well, Peterkin let them have the pennies, and they let the hare go, and glad enough it was to get away, I can tell you.

"See, Peterkin," said the hare, "you shall lose nothing by this. When you are in difficulty, whistle on your fingers, thus, and perhaps help will come to you." Then it thumped its feet on the ground, and away it scampered.

So by-and-by they came to the town, and there Peterkin's brothers went to a good inn, for they had the money. As for Peterkin, he had to go and sleep in the straw, for one cannot spend money and have it both. So the brothers were eating broth with meat in it, and Peterkin went with nothing.

"I wonder," said he, "if the little gray hare can help me now?" So he whistled on his fingers just as it had told him. Then who should come hopping along but the little gray hare itself. "What do you want, Peterkin?" it said.

"I should like," said Peterkin, "to have something to eat."

"Nothing easier than that," said the little gray hare; and before one could wink twice, a fine feast fit for a king was spread out before him, and he fell to as though he had not eaten a bite for seven years. After that he slept like a flat stone, for one can sleep well, even in the straw, if one only has a good supper within one.

When the next morning had come, the two elder brothers bought them each a good new coat with brass buttons. But Peterkin knew a way out of that. Back of the house he went, and there he blew on his fingers.

"What will you have?" said the little gray hare.

"I should like," said Peterkin, "to have a fine new suit of clothes."

"Oh, that is an easy thing enough," said the little gray hare, and there lay the finest suit of clothes that Peterkin had ever seen. So he dressed himself in his fine clothes, and you may guess how his brothers opened their eyes when they saw him.

Off they went to the King's house, and the King looked at Peterkin, and thought that he had never seen such fine clothes. Did they want service? Well, the oldest brother might tend the pigs; the second might look after the cows. As for Peterkin, he was so spruce and neat he might stay in the house and open the door when folks knocked: that is what his fine clothes did for him.

So Peterkin had the soft feathers in that nest.

Well, one day who should come to the King but the two elder brothers. There was a giant over yonder, they said, who had a gray goose that laid a golden egg every day of her life. Now Peterkin had said that he could get the gray goose whenever the King wanted it. This tickled the King's ears; so off he sent for Peterkin, and Peterkin came.

Hui! how Peterkin opened his eyes when he heard what the King wanted. But it was of no use for him to talk; the King wanted the gray goose, and Peterkin would have to get it. If he brought the gray goose, he should have two bags of gold money; if he did not bring it, he should have a good whipping.

"Perhaps," said Peterkin to himself, "the little gray hare can help me." So he blew a turn or two on his fingers, and the little gray hare came hopping and skipping up to him.

See! the King wanted him to get a gray goose, and Peterkin knew no more about it than a red herring.

Oh, well, just let Peterkin go to the King and ask for three barrels of soft pitch, a bag of barleycorn, and a pot of good tallow, and then they would see what could be done.

Well, the King let him have all that he wanted, and then the little gray hare took Peterkin and the three barrels of soft pitch and the bag of barleycorn and the pot of good tallow on its back, and off it went.

After a while they came to a river, and then the little gray hare said, "Brother Pike, Brother Pike, here are folks would like to cross the wide river."

Then up came a river pike, and on his back he took Peterkin and the little gray hare and the three barrels of pitch and the sack of barleycorn and the pot of good tallow, and away he went till he had brought them from this side to that.

Then Peterkin took the barrels of soft pitch and made a wide pathway of it. After that he smeared his feet all over with the tallow, so that he stuck to the soft pitch no more than water sticks to a cabbage leaf. When he had done this he shouldered his bag of barley-corn and went up to the giant's castle. He hunted around until he had found where the gray goose was; then he scattered the barley-corn all about, and when the gray goose saw that, it came and began to eat the grains as fast as it could gobble. But Peterkin did not give it much time for this, for he caught it up and off he went as fast as he could scamper. Then the gray goose flapped its wings and began squalling: "Master! master! Here I am! here I am! It is Peterkin who has me!"

When he had

Out ran the giant with his great iron club, and after Peterkin he came as fast as he could lay foot to the ground. But Peterkin ran over the pitch road as easily as though it were made of good stones, because his boots were smeared with tallow. As for the giant, he stuck to it as a fly sticks to butter.

Then the hare took Peterkin up on its back, and when it had come to the river the pike took them on its back, and away they went till they came to the other side.

So the King got the gray goose, and was as glad as could be. And Peterkin got the bags of gold, and was glad also. And now it was Peterkin here and Peterkin there, till Peterkin's brothers were as sour as bad beer over the matter.

So one day they came to the King and said that the giant had a silver bell, and every time that the bell was rung a good dinner was spread ready for the eating. Now Peterkin was saying that he could get that bell for the King just as easily as he had gotten the gray goose. At this the King sent for Peterkin to come to him, and Peterkin came.

See, now, the King would like Peterkin to get that bell for him, for he wanted it.

Peterkin talked, and talked, and talked; he had never said anything of the kind. But it was no use; he only wasted his breath; the King wanted the silver bell, and the King must have it. If Peterkin brought it, he should have half of the kingdom to rule over; if he did not bring it, he should have his ears clipped, so there was an end of that talk.

Off Peterkin went and blew on his fingers, and up came the little gray hare.

"Well," said the little gray hare, "and what is the trouble with us now?"

Why, the King was wanting a little silver bell over at the giant's house, and he had to go and get it for him; that was the trouble with Peterkin.

Well, all that was wanted was a little wad of tow, and that was not much. So Peterkin got the wad of tow, and then he sat him on the little gray hare's back, and away they went till the wind whistled behind his ears. When they came to the river, the little gray hare called on the pike, and up it came and carried them over as it had done before. By-and-by they came to the giant's house, and this time the giant was away from home.

Peterkin climbed into the window and hunted till he had found the little silver bell. He wrapped the tow around the clapper, and away he scampered to the little gray hare. He mounted on its back, and off they went till the wind whistled behind his ears.

Dear! dear! but the King was glad to get the silver bell; as for Peterkin, he was a great man now, for he ruled over half of the kingdom.

But now the two elder brothers were less pleased than ever before; and the upshot of the matter was that they went to the King for the third time. Peterkin had been bragging and talking again. This time he had said that the giant over yonder had a sword of such a kind that it gave more light in the dark than fourteen candles, and that he could get the sword as easily as he had gotten the gray goose and the little silver bell.

After that nothing would satisfy the King but for Peterkin to go and get that same sword. If he could bring it to him, he might have the Princess for his wife; if he came back empty-handed, he should have a good thong of skin cut off of his back from top to bottom. That was what the King said.

So there was nothing for it but for Peterkin to whistle on his fingers for the little gray hare once more.

This time Peterkin must borrow one of the Princess's dresses and her golden comb. So Peterkin went to the King and said that he must have the dress and the comb, and the King let him have them. Then he mounted on the little gray hare, and—whisk!—away they went as fast as before.

Well, they crossed the river, and came to the giant's house once more. There Peterkin dressed himself in the Princess's dress, and combed his hair with her golden comb. And as he combed his hair it grew longer and longer, and the end of the matter was that he looked for all the world like as fine and strapping a lass as ever you saw. Then he went up to the giant's house and knocked at the door. The giant was in this time, and he came and opened the door himself.

Perhaps the pretty lass would come in and sit down for a bit, he said.

Oh yes; that suited Peterkin. So in he came, and then he and the giant sat down to supper together. After they had eaten as much as they could, the giant laid his head in Peterkin's lap, and Peterkin combed his hair until he fell fast asleep. Then Peterkin rose up softly and took down the sword of light from the wall. After that he went out on tiptoes, and mounted the little gray hare, and away they went till the clumps flew behind them.

By-and-by the giant opened his eyes, and saw that Peterkin was gone, and what was more, his sword of light was gone also. Then what a rage he was in! Off he went after Peterkin and the little gray hare, seven miles at a step. But he was just a little too late, though there was no room to spare between Peterkin and him.

"Is that you, Peterkin?" said he.

"Yes, it is I," said Peterkin.

"And have you stolen my sword of light and my little silver bell and my gray goose?" said the giant.

Yes, Peterkin had done that.

"And what would you do if you were me and I were you?" said the giant.

"I would drink the river dry, and follow after," said Peterkin.

"That is good," said the giant. So he laid himself down and drank, and drank, and drank until he drank so much that he burst with a great noise, and there was an end of him.

The King was so pleased with the sword of light that it seemed as though he could not look at it and talk about it enough. As for Peterkin, he got the Princess for his wife, and that pleased him also, you may be sure. The Princess was pleased too, for Peterkin was a good smart tight bit of a lad, and that is what the girls like. So it was that everybody was pleased except the two elder brothers, who looked as sour as green gooseberries. But now Peterkin was an apple that hung too high for them to reach, and so they had to let him alone.

Two O'clock

The Black Cock crowed,
The Moon was bright;
The Red Cock answered
Through the night.

Big Gretchen, sleeping, Turned in bed,
And tossed her arms
Above her head.

The old Hound stretched,
And brounding deep,
He settled down
Again to sleep.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

PORT STANTON, NEW MEXICO.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a boy ten years old. I live on a "dairy ranch," three miles from and thirty five miles from the Indian agency of the Mes. Apache Indians. We sometimes see some of them when they go to the fort or come here to sell baskets made of "soap weed." There are four or five companies of soldiers at the fort, and they occasionally go out on an expedition if the Indians are restless and troublesome. Only the cavalry go out; the infantry stay at the fort. It is a pretty place, about one hundred miles from the railroad, but we have a daily mail, and there is a telegraph line, so we do not feel so far away, though it is a long stage ride. I have an Indian pony, on which I ride after our cows, taking my dog with me, and we have fine fun. Sometimes I see coyotes or other animals. I have no neighbor boys there are some at the fort, but two sisters and a brother keep me company; once the sister and the brother are twins, four years old. I used to live in Denver, Colorado. I get HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE in our Sunday mail. WENDEL P. C.

PORCUPINE, ILLINOIS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—We are two little girls eleven years old. We go to school together, and are great friends. We live near the Giant's Causeway, and have been there a great many times. A great number of people come to Portrush in the summer, but it is very dull in the winter. There are some islands lying about three miles from the land, which are called the Ben Bulbin, and on clear days you can see the Highlands of Scotland and Donegal Mountains. A steamer was wrecked on the rocks which are near the Ben Bulbin mountains. One day in the summer, at ten o'clock, we drove through the glens of Antrim to Cushendall, where we had lunch, and when we had finished we again proceeded on our journey to Carnbeg, where we had tea at a hotel. We then went up to see Carrington Tower, which is a beautiful place that is called the Londonberry. After we had looked through a few of the rooms we started for home, and arrived at half past nine. We had a very pleasant drive. KATHIE D. and MAGGIE S.

FLEMING, ULSTER COUNTY, NEW YORK.

I am eight years old. I attend both the Sunday school in the summer; I study reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. We have a dog, two cats, a canary-bird, three horses, two colts, one calf, and three cows. I have a sister and a brother. My brother Ernie is six years old. My name is my sister's name; she is twelve. I live on a farm about seven miles from Kingston, on Wednesday, February 10, papa took mamma, grandma, sister, brother, and me down to the Hudson River to see the ice companies gather ice. There are two ice-plant close together; papa says that one belongs to the New Jersey Ice Company, and holds 16,000 tons, and the other to the Newark City Ice Company, and holds 28,000 tons. We went out to the pond, where we saw them punch the ice in squares so as to make them bar or break easily into cakes. We saw the men saw the ice and bar it off in large blocks, they float the fields to the large or main canal, where they take a horse and tow a number of these fields to the house. We saw a sail on one of them. I think it was a delightful fun—did you too?—to take a sail on a field of ice in the winter time. When we were quite near the house we got off, and saw them break these fields into smaller cakes and push them to smelt ovens. Then the men push them to a man near the elevator, called the feeder; then the cakes are carried up by the elevators into the different rooms, where the men store it. Uncle Frank, one of the State Senators, sends me this paper, and I like it very much; I can hardly wait from one week until the next. This is the third year my uncle has taken it for me. My sister reads M. Nicholas. NADIE F. H.

St. JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

I am a little boy nine years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, geography, arithmetic, language, and spelling. My sister is writing this letter for me, as I do not write very well. I like this paper as one of my friends, and my sister took it last year. I hope my letter will be printed, as I never wrote to you before. Although I am so young, I have worn glasses for two years, as I do not see very well without them. A good many people call me Professor. Don't you get tired of getting so many letters?

G. B.

Not at all; especially when they are written so legibly as yours, little Professor.

CLACKINGTON, YORKSHIRE, ENGLAND.

I send you a valentine, and I hope you will put my letter in the box. I have such a kind good-guess, she never scolds me except when I am a naughty girl. I am doing this letter all by myself. I am seven years old, and I shall be glad if any of the little girls will write to me. My auntie reads the letters in your paper to me, and she tells me that I like very much. With much love from LAURA.

I am sure your goodness very seldom scolds you. Thank you for the valentine. If any girl wishes to write to Laura, she may send her letter, with a five-cent stamp upon it, enclosed in one to the Postmistress, who will complete the address and forward it.

SHARROW, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—My little brother has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for more than a year, and how he has had the best of the bound, and is very proud of it. Should you ever come to Sheffield, I do not think you would be very chagrined with the town. We have no very nice buildings, and not many places of public amusement. The parish church is a fine old place, but it has been so many times restored that not very much of the older part remains. The executioner of Charles I. is supposed to be buried here. We have also the prison where Mary Queen of Scots was confined during part of her imprisonment, and a great part of the town built on what used to be the park in her time. Ruskin's celebrated museum is just out of Sheffield, and to get there is a very nice walk. Do not you think it would be very nice if we had a reading club, so that every member might have to read an instructive book for a given time every day? R. G. W.

To read a little in some instructive book every day would be a good exercise for you all, and I think might be managed without a club, which would be rather too large if composed of all the correspondents and their friends.

MATLOCK BRIDGE, DERBYSHIRE, ENGLAND.

I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. My brother takes it, and he lets me read it. I have a little baby sister, who was born on the 3d of November. I have a little kitten, and my brother has a rabbit. My eldest sister teaches me, and I study geography, grammar, history, arithmetic, and French, etc. I am thirteen old. One of my sisters and a brother are writing to you. I have three sisters and two brothers. I would like to very much to be in a reading club, so that every member might have to read an instructive book for a given time every day. THIRIE K.

LA FLAIDE, DINARD, ILE-FRANCAISE, FRANCE.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am a boy eleven and a half years old. I study my lessons at home, but perhaps I shall go to school next summer. My home is in London, but we have been nearly two years. I hope you will print my letter, as it is the first I have written to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it very much, and I have only just begun to take it this Christmas, but on Christmas my brother had last year's volume, bound. BETTY C.

BEAUTIFUL SNOW.

Slowly and softly the snow came down,
The beautiful, beautiful snow.
To wrap the earth in a pure white gown,
Came the beautiful, beautiful snow.
Faster and thicker, like an angel it came,
Wrapt in the purest of white;
Spotless and pure, so free from stain—
Oh, 'twas a charming sight!
Still faster, still thicker, more lovely to me,
Came the beautiful, beautiful snow,
'Till the scene was one charming to see,
Made by the beautiful snow.
Then thicker and faster still it came,
'Till it gently slackened its pace;
Then finly stopped to gain
Breath, as if running a race.
Then the earth lay robed in her whiteness—
The whiteness of beautiful snow—
And the sun shined in its brightness,
To gleam on the beautiful snow.
Emblem of purity, stainless and white,
Oh that my heart were but so!
Spotless from sin, from wickedness' stain,
Like the beautiful, beautiful snow!
ETHEL HARRIS.

A LITTLE RUNAWAY.

"Yes, I must go away, because papa and mamma are too poor to keep me. Of course they must not know till after I am gone, and then of course they will miss me. If they knew I was going, they would let me go. Oh, how I wish such fun to run away, as Uncle Frank did! I must go away before mamma gets up."
Flora Graham was ten years old, and lived a few miles from the village of C. It was between four and five in the morning when Flora woke up and was thinking this. So she sprang out of bed and dressed as quickly as possible, got her little basket, and started off like "Uncle Frank," of whom she had heard.
Flora ran on and on until she came to the village, and then she stopped, for she was hungry, and began to think about mamma's nice breakfast, when a lady said:
"Here, little girl, take this message down to that house over the corner, please, and I will pay you."
"Yes, ma'am," cried Flora.
The lady gave her a silver piece for doing the errand, and this filled her basket with bread and fruit. Then she thought, "Oh, if mamma and papa could only have seen me this!"
Flora put her right "back home again." So she turned her steps, as she thought, homeward, and travelled on and on till the afternoon; then she sat down on a bench, and she was so tired, and her feet and feet sore, she was lost!
"Oh, how late it is!" What shall I do?" Then she cried, bravely, "I'll just keep it on till to-morrow, then I will go home." So she started on once more. Presently she saw a gentleman coming toward her. He laid his hand kindly on her shoulder, and said:

"My little girl, what is the matter, and what is your name?"

"Flora looked up, and said, "I am lost, and my name is Flora Graham."

"There is no room for the remainder of Edith T.'s pretty little story, which concluded very happily for her finding the very same doll, and taking her safe home."

All the same, she was a naughty girl, and deserved to be punished for running away, and making her poor mother anxious.

ROCOMBE, TORQUAY, ENGLAND.

In reading a book about birds I came across an anecdote which very much interested me, and which perhaps it might please the readers of Our Post-office Box.

On the Cheshire side of the mouth of the river Deane runs a ridge of three small rocky islands, and at the southern extremity, at a somewhat greater distance, forming the termination of the ridge, a small island called the Little Eye. A small water hole between these rocks and the mainland is extremely dry. At this time it is therefore a resort of duck-shooters who cared to take the shot. They look upon it as a very interesting position of a sort of excavated level, where, under cover of a few stones piled together, they waited until high tide, when, if they were fortunate, a floating flock of sea-fowl might drift within reach of a shot. On one of the expeditions a duck-shooter met with a perilous adventure. Mounted on his gun, and observing that a number of the numerous ooze plains, and being intent only on his game, suddenly found the water rising with the tide. His retreat was cut off; he was surrounded with the flowing sea, and death stared him in the face. In this desperate situation an idea struck him which might be the means of his preservation. He observed that a small stream of the mud desert was higher than the rest, and hastening toward it, he fixed the stock of his long gun into the ooze, resolving to hold fast by it as a prop to secure himself against the buffeting of the waves, which had already reached his feet, hoping that even if he could not endure the cold of six hours' immersion, his body might be kept above the surface of the water, and he could wait to seek him; for the tide, he had reason to suppose, would only reach his waist. Unfortunately he was mistaken. He had not counted on the waves, which not only brought the waters up more rapidly than usual, but also added to their height. After having first felt the chill and deadly sensation which after rising now covered his feet, then bathing him knee-deep, then advancing beyond his waist, he was horror-struck at finding that, instead of receding, it still advanced, and reached his shoulders. The spray burst over his head. On another minute's rise or fall of the tide his life depended. In this awful moment of suspense, and feeling down, he thought that he saw the uppermost button of his waistcoat beginning to appear. At length hopes gave rise to certainty; but on a further rise into air, the top of the tide was over, and now on the ebb. This welcome promise cleared his drooping spirits, though chilled with cold and almost fainting, and acting like a cordial, enabled him to endure the remaining hours of his fearful imprisonment.

SHARROW, SHEFFIELD, ENGLAND.

I am ten years old, and go to school, and I study history, grammar, scriptures, geography, arithmetic, the writing, and drawing. I have four sisters and two brothers. We are named two mice (their names are Honoria and Caius), two birds, and two cats (the latter are named Selwyn and Spilpin).

PAUL E. W.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl ten years old. As I am in bed with a cold, and it is a pouring wet day, I thought I would write to you. I think the new serial story, "Jo's Opportunity," is lovely, and I only wish that it came out oftener than once a week. I can hardly wait till Wednesday evening for this lovely paper to come home. I want to know so much what Jo is going to do, and I am so sorry for her. I hope it will turn out all right. I am very fond of reading. My school-books are "A Little Country Girl," by Susan Coolidge; "The Gypsy Breyton Books," by Phelps and May; and "The Cuckoo Clock," by Mrs. Jonesworth. I have two bound volumes of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I am never tired of reading them.

MARGARETTA W. H.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY.

In reading over the letters in this delightful paper, I see some of the little house-keepers want a good receipt for molasses candy. As I have one which is much liked by the dear little ones, I will send it. If the Little House-keepers try it, will they please write and tell me how they succeed? I will watch in the Post-office Box for their letters. I would like to know the dear Postmistress, for I think she must be lovely, she writes such sweet things in the Post-office Box to her readers. I hope she will accept much love from me.

RECIPE FOR MOLASSES CANDY.—Three cups of molasses, one and three-quarter tablespoonfuls of vinegar, eight lumps of sugar, and butter three-quarters the size of an egg. As it begins to boil, if the sugar does not melt, push it down with a spoon. This, if hard when dropped in cold water, is to be flavored to your taste, and may be made a very large quantity and will be doubled. Put it in buttered tins to cool. When quite cool, pull until white with the tips of the fingers. It is best to pull it out into a long string, and cut into little pieces. Do not twist while pulling, as it too soon becomes hard.

Yours devotedly,

The Postmistress returns your affectionate greeting most cordially.

HOT SPRING, ARKANSAS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I send a copy of a letter which a Chinaman wrote us, and which will, I think, interest some of the little people who read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Tom is a poor man who earns his living by washing. He washed for us three years, and in that time I learned to be very fond of him and to respect him. A little more than a year ago he went home to China on a visit. We sent him a letter while there by another Chinaman who was going to the same place. He tried to answer it in Hong Kong, but he had no pens, and found it very hard to make the letters with a camel's hair pencil, which is what the Chinese use in forming their characters; but when he got to San Francisco he wrote us this letter. The handwriting is beautiful, but the spelling is sometimes a little peculiar. All the instructions you met was what he could get from one hour Sunday nights, when a kind lady taught him and some other Chinamen. I wonder how many of our little readers would do so well as Tom, if they had not one hour of school in a week, and even that not regularly.

JULIA A. S.

Here is Tom's letter: SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, JANUARY 10, 1886.

My dear English people, I would like to write a letter to you, and tell you all about it, since I went back to China, but I am not study long, not spell and write very well, how can I do it, but I try. I can read a few words, and you know the Hong Lee in Hong-Kong, he give it to me. I am read the letter very well, and very glad to hear from you. I had time to do a little of the paper with a few words, and you China letter in envelope, do you get it. I am very sorry Mrs. S. she like me well, but I hope she be back to some day. I hope she be back to some day. God will bless her, for she was very kind. I not able to write in any more. I will close up this time, if you get this letter I hope you answer. Wish you happy new year and well. Good-by.

Your friend,

EDMUNDO, SCOTLAND.

I live in Edinburgh, but we spent this winter in Bournemouth, in the south of England. For pets I have a little black terrier dog called Ben, which I love very much. I hope my letter will be printed, as I have never written to you before. Good-by.

H. L.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have just begun to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. I enjoy "Jo's Opportunity" immensely, but it sometimes stops in the most exciting places, and you can hardly wait for the next issue. Last night, at about eleven, I woke up with a start, and a strange feeling came over me; what I could hear my little brother crying in the next room. I jumped up and ran in there to see what was the matter, and found his head was under the pillow. When I pulled him out and asked him what was the matter, he said burglars had tried to get in the room, and were searching at the door. As soon as I went in the hall I felt something jump on me. Of course I thought I was going to be killed, and gave a yell. Then out came my brother Gulon the is fifteen, and just the age to think he can do anything, and running into the room, he said, "I am not in bed, my only dog Prince, who wished to get in, and had scratched at the door. I fear I shall nevermore have peace, for Gulon is as big as time saving." "Poor little thing," was she frightened?" I tell him, "I fancy you would have been frightened if you had gone out in the dark hall and felt Prince come against you with all his teeth." GLADYS C. (13 years old).

TRY my glasses, Baby, would you,
While the morning bath yet lingers?
You could see me better, could you?
Break the cord, you mischief, would you,
Pulling with impatient fingers?

There! your bonny brow upturning,

On the daintiest of noses Put them. What a look of learning

For that dimpled face upturning
Its cherubic smiles and roses!

Peep with starry glances through them,

Laugh and kick and crow with pleasure.

Do you take so kindly to them?
Looks the sunshine brighter through them?

Am I fairer, too, my treasure?

Ah! you think it most amusing,
Wearing glasses; don't you,
Baby?

When their aid there's no re-

Then, my pet, this game, amus-

Will not be so funny, maybe.

PUZZLES FROM PARIS.

LAST week we amused ourselves with some French enigmas. This time we will try charades. I wonder who can tell just what the distinction is? An enigma is a word puzzle the answer to which is contained in a single word or thought; a charade is a word puzzle in which each syllable contains an enigma. This seems much more difficult when we think of the foreign language in which we are working. Yet
I fancy many wise little heads will guess the following char-ades with very little trouble.

CHARADES.

Whoever can make a nice salad will guess this:

(1.) Quand mon premier est mon dernier
Il a le goût de mon entier.

What patriotic symbol is this?

(2.) Mon premier sert à vêtir;
Mon dernier à vous rafraîchir;
Mon tout souvent conduit à la victoire
Celui qui suit le chemin de la gloire.

Of this let boys who want to go to sea beware:

(3.) On a vu mon premier flanquer des citadelles;
Mon dernier est métal;
sur mer les vents du nord au pilote rebelles
Fout souvent mon entier.

Whoever loves pet birds will guess this:

(4.) Mon second est deux fois en terre;
Mon premier est un bon gâteau;
Mon troisième est dans la rivière;
Et mon tout est un tendre oiseau.

Here is a lesson for some great statesman of the future:

(5.) Il est rare qu'en politique
De sincérité l'on se pique, souvent aussi dans mon entier
L'orateur qui fait mon premier
En même temps fait mon dernier.

One of our future major-generals will guess this:

(6.) Mon entier pour le militaire
Est un effet d'équipement;
On voit dans mon premier
Plus d'un vaisseau de guerre;
Dans mon second la femme serre
Son mouchoir et son argent.

Here is an opportunity for some wise mathematical head who shall bring all nations to use the same weights and measures:

(7.) Avant qu'on fit en France l'invention
Du système décimal
Le fruitier mesurait le charbon
Au moyen de son total;
Le stère du nouveau système
Mesure aujour d'un mon premier,
Et le décaltre lui même
Doit remplacer mon dernier.

YOU CAN'T TELL HIM ANYTHING.

"SEESAW!—MARGERY 'DAW!"

THAT DISREPUTABLE CAT.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

Nobody knew where he came from, and certainly nobody invited him to come. He walked into the dining-room one summer evening through the open window, and flapping one mangled ear, or rather the fragment of an ear, which remained a silent witness of many a hard-fought battle, he surveyed the family calmly, and, curling up on the sofa, went to sleep.

"Look at that disreputable cat!" exclaimed mother, and the entire family joined in a chorus of "Scat!" But he did not "scat"; he simply opened his remaining eye, winked good-naturedly, and went to sleep again. His impudence was so cool, so determined, that we were speechless, and he was allowed to remain until we had finished dinner, when father said to Tom: "Take that disreputable cat out into the back yard and give him something to eat and let him go."

But the disreputable cat had no idea of going. He had come to stay. When the servant opened the door in the morning, he walked calmly in and took up his place on the sofa, where we found him when we assembled at the breakfast table. As the various members of the family entered the room, his catship was treated to a shower of "scats" and exclamations which would have disconcerted a less self-possessed cat. But it had not the slightest effect upon him; he simply yawned, winked blandly with his single eye, and went to sleep again. The fact that he was unwelcome, or that his general appearance was not such as to warrant an enthusiastic reception into a respectable family circle, never seemed to strike him, or, if it did, he did not mind. He hung around the house for a day or two, until one morning mother gazed at him, asleep on the sofa, and exclaimed, in despair:

"What are we going to do with that disreputable cat?"

"What is he going to do with us? you'd better say," replied father, sarcastically. "He's taken possession."

"But he looks so much like a tramp," objected mother, faintly.

"He does look like a hard case," replied father, laughing. And there the subject was dropped.

The cat had won by his impudence; and from that day he was recognized as a humble member of the family. We tried to christen him, and called him Tom until our own Tom objected, then it was Mose and Rough and Tramp and half a dozen other appropriate names, all of which he accepted with the same easy philosophy which distinguished all his actions.

But, after all, we found it easier to refer to him as "that disreputable cat"—a title which he recognized by blinking his lone eye and pricking up the fragment of ear in a most ridiculous fashion. He grew fat and healthy, but no amount of prosperity, of good dinners, and comfortable naps could restore his lost eye or ragged ear; he only looked more like a tramp. He never seemed to have any desire to be petted, though he endured stroking from members of the family, blinking in a half-contemptuous way at any evidence of kindness on our part. He slept most of the time; in fact, I never saw a cat which spent so much of its life in dreamy repose.

He would dream too, and often surprised the family by suddenly starting up from the sofa with most unearthly howls, and then calmly turning over to sleep again. Prosperity, however, developed two annoying traits of character in "that disreputable cat." One was a most decided objection to being put out in the yard at night (and he would quietly sneak off and hide in the most unheard-of places when bed-time came); the other was a most intense hatred of any one outside of our own family. When visitors came, he would arch his back, fluff out his tail, and spit and growl at them, and several times it was with the greatest difficulty that he was restrained from flying at them.

Beggars were his especial aversion, or, in fact, any one who did not come up to his standard of elegance of attire. This trait was sometimes funny, but oftener annoying, and we daily debated plans for getting rid of him.

Finally, one afternoon when we could stand it no longer, Tom and I bundled him into a basket, took him far out beyond the Park, and let him loose. He gave us one reproachful look from his single eye as he jumped from the basket, and sped across the fields, and we returned home feeling triumphant, but somewhat guilty.

As we went in to dinner the cook said, "Master Tom, I thought you tuck that cat away this afternoon?"

"We did," replied Tom, shortly.

"Well, I think it was about an hour before you got home that I saw him shoot in through the back door and up the stairs."

A search was made. No sign of the cat was found, and it was decided that cook must be mistaken.

That night, about twelve o'clock, a slight noise was heard upstairs, followed by a most unearthly yowling, mingled with muttered oaths. Father, Tom, and I appeared in the hall at the same moment, and saw a man dashing down-stairs, about six steps at a time, with "that disreputable cat" clinging tightly to his shoulders, scratching and spitting and growling with all his strength. He was nearly at the bottom, when he gave a yell of pain and fell. We ran down, secured him, called for the police, and had him taken to the station-house. The next day, in court, he explained how he had effected his entrance through the scuttle, and was softly descending the attic stairs, when something suddenly landed on his shoulders with a horrible yell, and began to make vicious scratches at his eyes. He was trying to escape, when we caught him. The cat had bitten through his ear, and the pain caused him to stumble and fall.

That night the "disreputable cat" was asleep, as usual, on the sofa in the dining-room, and took all our expressions of gratitude with his old philosophical indifference. From that time, however, no thought of getting rid of him was ever expressed. He is getting older and fatter and lazier now, but not a bit more respectable in appearance. Despite a good home and all the comforts the most luxurious cat could desire, he preserves his tramp-like appearance and air of cool impudence. He will never be anything but "that disreputable cat."

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.—(Continued.)

EVERY eye was fixed upon the girl as she stood there, with that mute appeal in her gaze, which, however, no one understood as coming from her fear that she would not be believed; but only Faith's eyes met hers with recognition.

The questioning began. What was her name?

Jo faltered an instant, but said, in a low, clear voice, "Josephine Mary Brooke."

"How old?"

"Sixteen last month, sir; born in Bayberry. Father was in the United States navy; both parents dead" (in answer to questions).

She was to state, if she pleased, her knowledge of the events of the 30th of May, 187—.

The color flamed into Jo's face for an instant, deep as the very heart of a damask rose, and as quickly faded.

leaving the girl whiter than before; but her voice, low as it was, faltering sometimes, and with that suppressed note of a sob in it once or twice, went on, reaching every listener: her eyes gradually drifting—as they all remembered later—for the most part away from Faith, away from the audience, judge, and jury, toward the open window, beyond which was a stretch of the lovely country and the line of the shining summer sea.

"Miss Emerson knows, I think, sir," Jo said, looking for a moment at the lawyer who had questioned her, "that I went to her school a long time, and she was very good to me, and I was sick once for five weeks, I think, at her house. So I knew all the ways of the house; that is, where her rooms were, you know.

"I was up there one day—it must have been that 30th of May you were talking about, sir—and I was with Miss Faith in a little hall where she had shelves for different things. I had been helping her put labels on some jars. We were talking, and I remember"—for a second Jo's glance sought Faith's, resting there while she smiled faintly—"she said I was very small for my age. I was working at the window-sash at the time, and I said it seemed very loose."

"Did any one interrupt your conversation?"

Mr. Hogenkamp put this question.

"Yes, sir; Mary, the cook, came and talked about the dinner party. I don't remember much more of that day, except that we put flowers in the dining-room, and I saw Miss Faith dressed for the party."

Jo paused, with a slight quiver of her lip.

"At what hour do you think you left the house?"

The lawyer put the question very gently.

"It was about six o'clock, I think, sir, for I know I met some of the mill-hands going home. I met George Moxon."

The very mention of the name sent a thrill through the whole court-room.

"I met him at the corner of the bridge."

"How did he seem?"

"He was in a bad temper, I thought. He stopped me and asked me if I knew where Sandy Martin or his father were. I said I didn't. I remember his saying he'd find Sandy before night. I was in a hurry, and I went right on. Shall I tell you, please, just as I did Mr. Burton?"

"Go right on; tell all that you remember from that point until the next morning."

Jo steadied herself, putting one hand on the railing before her, and then went on.

"When I got home I glanced in the window, and saw three men at the table talking. My grandfather was in his own chair by the fire. I knew the men; they were Ryerson and Tucker and Job Martin. I knew they couldn't mean any good. I can't remember just what I heard them say; it was something about 'to-night being the best for the game.' I slipped around to the back of the house until they went away, and then I went in, and asked grandfather what he let them come there for. He put me off, but said something about Miss Emerson having fine jewelry and silver and such like, and somehow it frightened me. I felt almost sure harm was meant. I was upstairs in my room all the evening. I heard the men come back, and they talked a great deal, and I heard them ask if grandfather thought I'd 'help the job along,' and he said no—he knew I wouldn't. Then he said he'd go upstairs and see if I was asleep. I got in under the clothes, for I was afraid if he found me up something dreadful would happen. He came to the door and looked in. I kept my eyes shut, and—and prayed he wouldn't catch me or beat me. He went down, after looking in for a minute; and then, I don't know how it was, I turned sick and faint, like I used to get up at Miss Emerson's. Seemed as if I must have fallen asleep or something."

"When I did rouse up it was a great deal later. The men had gone and come back again. I knew they meant mischief for Miss Emerson, for I'd heard words about the party going on there. I watched out of the window in my room, and when I saw them all stealing out of the house I slipped down and out of the door, and I crept after them."

Jo paused again. It seemed to her as though she was once more speeding along in the darkness of that long-ago summer's night; once more trembling as she shrunk into a doorway, or watched the three figures stealthily walking on ahead of her.

"They went up the old beach road," Jo continued, "and I followed as near as I dared. Just before they reached the corner where the road goes down the cliff, one of the men stood still. It was Job Martin. I was afraid he was going to turn back, but he only stood still while the others went slowly on. I hung back, afraid of Job's seeing me. Then I saw he was waiting for some one. It was a bright night, and where I stood I could see everything plainly. I saw George Moxon and Sandy Martin come up the cliff together."

The silence in the court-room was such that the sound of Jo's voice seemed to grow more and more distinct. The sunshine outside and the distant eaves from the street, the shadows flickering from a maple-tree near the window at one end of the room, all seemed fixed afterward upon Faith's mind as belonging to just that moment; and when she thought of it there seemed to her something solemn in the face and figure of the girl who was making this anxious silence; for all of Jo's heart and soul seemed to come into her voice and eyes as she went on, only striving to make her story believed and to save Sandy's life.

"Sandy spoke to his father. I could not hear all that he said, but he spoke of some yacht, and Job answered, angrily, I think, he hadn't anything to do with it. I distinctly heard Moxon say, 'You're bent on other game,' and Job seemed to draw him one side to whisper. They went down the cliff together."

"And Sandy Martin?"

"Sandy stood still a moment, and then joined the others. I knew, from what I heard them say later, that Job had told him to tell them to wait at the cross-roads for him."

"Did they wait?"

"I think they may have waited two minutes—not more."

"Did anything happen?"

"I thought I heard low voices below the cliff, and I ran on a little way. I thought I could get around by the side road ahead of the men and alarm the house, but as I was turning off, my foot caught in something, and I fell. The men saw me. It took about a minute for me to get up again, and—I don't know how it came into my head, but I thought all of a sudden of a plan."

Jo looked at Faith, and quickly away again.

"I remembered the loose window in the hall. I tried to speak in the roughest way, like they were used to with me, and I said I could help 'em into the house a better way than they had thought of."

Any one watching the prisoner's face would have seen, by the way it lighted from time to time, that his memory confirmed every statement Jo made; but the eyes of the two rarely met. Jo went on, a little hurriedly: "I thought if I got into the house, you see, any sort of way, I could rush and alarm every one at once; so I went on, and kept pretending to be friendly. I was friendly even to Sandy." The color came and went again in Jo's white cheeks. "Every one knew how I fought with him; we were never good friends; every one in the Row knew that. I told them of the window, and I said if they'd help me in I could unfasten the side door. I remember I laughed, and said it was a good thing after all I was so little of my age. We were near the orchard gate then, and once in a while

"EVERY EYE WAS FIXED UPON THE GIRL AS SHE STOOD THERE."

Sandy spoke to me or I to him. Once, I know, he said it was a mean job, and he wouldn't have anything to do with it, if he was me. I remember what he said particularly," continued Jo, looking intently at Mr. Hogencamp's anxious, kindly face, "because it made me feel so horrible even to seem to be doing anything mean or to hurt her. I said to Sandy, why didn't he give it up, and he said he would only be was afraid of his father. I remember he said he had tried to get off, but he daren't show his face to his father if he did; but he declared he wouldn't touch a thing once we were in the house."

As Jo spoke, it was strange to all the rest to see the face of her old enemy grow pale and red, and soften in a way that, had she seen it, would have helped her; but, as I have said, Jo rarely looked at him. But if any one doubted her words, they had the confirmation straight before their eyes in the changes passing across Sandy's haggard countenance.

"When we got to the window," Jo went on, hurriedly, "they easily opened it. I was in great haste to be in; but we were startled by the striking of the stable clock."

There was a pause, a breathless silence for an instant, until Mr. Hogencamp said, bending eagerly forward, "What hour did it strike?"

"One o'clock; I remember it was just one stroke."

"And then?"

"The next thing I remember is Ryerson lifting me in the window, and seeing Peters come in the door at the end of the passage."

Jo waited. She knew well enough that the main point of her evidence in Sandy's favor had been given. While the lawyers talked together, while a low murmur of comment, suggestion, exclamation, etc., went around the courtroom, she sat down in the chair placed for her and rested her head upon her hand. She wondered, in a dreary sort of way, what was to come next. They knew, she supposed, how no one of those who had crowded around her that night would allow her to speak—how she had been hurried off to jail. Was it necessary for her to tell the rest?

Jo raised her eyes, and, looking for the first time to the left of the courtroom, met an unexpected sight.

Mrs. Dawson and Rachel and Mrs. Burton sat together—anxiety, interest, on all three faces; so far no horror or contempt of her. But oh, now came the worst of all. Must she go on, and be to these dear friends disgraced forever?

CHAPTER XXIII.

"WHERE, then," said the voice of Mr. Hogencamp, bringing Jo back to her task again—"where did you last see Alexander Martin?"

"He was by the window among the men, but he had disappeared before they took me away. I believe no one at Miss Emerson's knew he had been there."

"Do you remember giving him anything to hold for you?"

Jo reflected. "As I was being lifted in," she said, slowly, "I think the handkerchief I had tied around my ankle, where I hurt it, came off. I think I remember Sandy's picking it up."

"Describe it."

Jo did so. The lawyers exchanged glances.

"Exactly as he describes it," assented one of the jurymen, who had been listening with great enjoyment and interest to Jo's story.

"He was gone," Jo went on, in answer to a cross-examining question. "I never saw him since until to-day."

"I believe"—this from the State lawyer—"I believe you spent the next day in jail?"

Jo spoke clearly, but in a low voice. "Yes, sir. She came—Miss Emerson. I told her I never meant to harm her. I told her how it was." There was a silence; then Jo said: "She promised to believe me, but said no one else in all Ashfield would."

"And so, when Miss Emerson obtained your release, you ran away?"

Jo could not lift her eyes. She said, "Yes, sir." And then added: "I knew I'd only bother and vex her. I couldn't stay and be in jail, and know I'd never meant to hurt her; but that every one would laugh at her and bother her for being good to me." The dark sad eyes of the girl were raised now. They seemed to hold burning tears, though none fell on her white cheeks. "I couldn't do it. I thought it would be better to go away where she'd never, never need to know."

"And did you hear nothing of Moxon being murdered?"
 "No, sir. The day they let me out of jail I didn't stir from the house. That night I ran away."

Again came one of the pauses during which sounds and sights grew painfully bewildering. Had Jo understood the case, known more than that the main point at issue was the proof that Sandy Martin, and not his father, was with the burglars at one o'clock that night, she would have understood that they were all favorably impressed, and discussing what should be done next; that a general air of relief pervaded the court-room; that some one had leaned over and whispered a word in Sandy's ear which made the young man's rough face kindle with joy. But to Jo it all seemed only a painful waiting for some sort of sentence to be pronounced upon herself.

It was something of a relief when she was told to leave the box, when some one led her out into the next room.

She went instinctively to the window, sat down, and being left alone for a moment, crossed her arms upon the sill and leaned her head wearily upon them. All that she cared for now, it seemed to her, was to be taken away soon, to have it all over, to know the worst. But her head ached; her eyes were tired with the confusion of faces, the glare of the sun, the holding back those hot tears which hung upon her eyelids, now were all but falling down her cheeks.

When she was summoned back for a slight further cross-examination she saw at once that Faith and Miss Grace had disappeared, and it was harder to speak without the protecting sense of her nearness; but the fact was that the day had proven almost too much for Faith. When Jo was dismissed the first time, Miss Emerson had been called upon for such testimony as she could give which would confirm Jo's story, but immediately afterward Dr. Waxall had ordered her home.

The time of waiting seemed endless to Faith. Bertie had promised to bring her the earliest news of the verdict, which, it was supposed, would be given without difficulty that day; but the afternoon was well advanced before Faith, lying on the sofa in the library, heard her cousin's step, quick, elastic, impatient. Almost before he entered she knew what he had to say.

"Not guilty, Faith!" he exclaimed, joyfully. "And oh, isn't it fine? As you said once, our Jo did it."

And Bertie turned away toward the window, half ashamed of the tears that sprang into his eyes.

DING-DONG BELLS.

PARLOR PARTERRES

BY GEORGE A. BARTLETT.

VERY enjoyable performances can be prepared without trouble in any room, and with the simple materials which any house can furnish, and they will give as much pleasure in their preparation as in their performance if some one directs them who has taste and skill in such matters. Many a cold or stormy day may be thus turned into sunshine for the little ones, who can easily carry out for themselves the simple directions that I shall give below.

The costumes and furniture will be described with each scene, and nothing will be called for which cannot easily be obtained with little trouble or expense.

THE FLOWERY BANK.

This lovely scene represents a green bank covered with bright flowers through which the laughing faces of little children are peeping. It is made by placing across the back of the room a large dining-table with a box on it at the middle, and a second box upon the centre of the first. Little girls stand upon the table and boxes in a row, which will of course be higher in the centre than at the sides. Two strips of wood are sawed just long enough to reach the ceiling, and a curtain of green cambric is tacked upon them across the room between the table and the audience. As many little girls as possible crowd together on the floor and upon the table, kneeling, standing, or lying down. Holes are cut through the cambric, through every one of which a child's face is thrust, and around it petals or flowers are painted or sewed, of cloth or paper, from which they can be cut very easily, as the roughest imitation will produce a very fine effect. Sunflowers, roses, or any large flowers are best for this purpose, and the closer they can be placed together the better. A little taste in color will enable children to blend them effectively, and where a space occurs the outlines of leaves can be drawn in chalk in imitation of any common leaf. The tables and boxes are placed as close behind the green curtain as possible.

DING-DONG BELLS.

A row of bells are seen, the heads of which are those of little girls, who sing and march about, forming a very funny as well as a pretty performance. They may be of graduated heights if convenient, and of any number from three to seven. The songs may be found in any collection of nursery airs, or may be of a more serious nature, according to the taste of the singers. The bells are made very easily by first making two rings of wire, one about two and a half and the other three and a half feet in diameter, which may be varied to suit the heights of the children. The smaller ring hangs from the shoulders of the child, the arms being held close to the sides; the other ring hangs from her belt by four cords. A cover of bronze or dark green cambric is cut in gores to form the sides of the bell. The tones of the bells may be made outside by striking a bar of steel, or by a glass globe which is struck by a stick covered with cloth. These costumes are also very useful for a fancy dress party, or any occasion where a quaint disguise is desired.

HONOR TO ART.

Three girls, dressed in white cheese-cloth arranged with baby waists and clinging skirts, are bearing upon their shoulders a marble bust. Two of the bearers stand with faces toward the front, and the third stands between them a little in advance, with her face turned over her right shoulder. The bust is personated by a young lady whose head and shoulders alone are visible above the round board which she holds on her forearms and the flat of her hands turned upward. This board must be light, and covered with white cloth on top, and have a piece of dark cloth tacked on the front edge long enough to touch the floor and hide the young lady who stands behind it on a box high enough to make the board seem to rest on the shoulders of the bearers. This board has a hole on the back edge large enough to fit around the shoulders of the bust when the arms are held close to the body. The shoulders of the lady who personates the bust are draped in plain folds of white cloth, her face is chalked white, and her hair covered with white cotton wadding, with coils and braids of the same material. A dark curtain or door behind the bust adds to the effect, which is very fine and easy to produce.

"Zephyrs bright on breezy wing Change chill winter into spring."

A table across the room is first covered with green cambric, over which a fur-lined cloak or a fur robe is thrown to hide the green. Upon this throne a figure stands draped in a long cloak, the head covered with a felt hat, and snow made of cotton batting is plentifully scattered over the throne and its occupant, who stands leaning on a staff, his long hair and flowing beard (which are both fastened to the hat) being made of yarn or flax. Four little girls, each dressed in tarlatan muslin of various colors, enter, one from each corner, and circle around him, blowing with all their might long trumpets of card-board covered with silver paper. Soon Winter melts away, and in his place a little girl is seen dressed in white muslin adorned with pink roses. Winter's cloak and hat being thrown off together, fall behind the table, the cover of which is at the same moment pulled off in front by a boy who has been concealed under it, and who draws it beneath the green as quickly as possible. The little girl upon the table strikes an attitude, bending forward and pointing upward with her right hand, in which she holds a lily, which was fastened in her belt. Then the four Zephyrs advance and kneel in homage.

HIS FIRST CRUISE.

BY FRANK H. CONVERSE.

Part II.

THE Donna, with everything set and drawing, was heading well out to the open sea before Dan Darling had much opportunity of looking about him.

Two or three things rather out of the ordinary caught his attention at once. The schooner herself, which was in ballast, appeared of much broader beam and lighter draught than he had supposed. Through the open hatch he caught a glimpse of a great mass of rigging of all sizes and kinds lying on the ballast below—immense purchase blocks and heavy ground-tackle, hawsers and mooring chains in endless variety. Instead of the ordinary ship's boat, the Donna carried two long, sharp whale-boats—one slung at the stern davits, the other upturned on the main-deck.

"And thirteen—fourteen men," he mused, glancing at the motley dark-skinned crew of hardy-looking French and Spanish creoles who were grouped here and there, gesticulating and chattering in a peculiar patois, while one or two of them would turn their restless black eyes in his own direction from time to time.

Supper was duly announced by a gigantic negro cook, and Dan was not long in joining the port watch, into which he had been chosen, as they gathered about the windlass in the soft on-coming twilight, every man being provided with the sailor's tea equipments of tin pan, pot, and spoon. There was the usual coffee, sweetened with molasses, and a large wooden kid containing an olla podrida of beans, salt fish, Chili peppers, yam, plantain, garlic, and sweet oil stewed together into one savory whole. Dan was too hungry to be critical, and the relish with which he ate his own share of the repast seemed to please his new shipmates, who smiled approvingly as he helped himself to a second portion.

"Say, Juan," said Dan to the young creole sitting next him, "what is the Donna—a trading vessel?"

The creole stared, shrugged his shoulders, and without replying, repeated the question in his own language to the others. More staring and shoulder-shrugging, followed by a general laugh.

"Quien sabe?" (who knows?) was Juan's characteristic answer.

But old Matteo, a scarred sailor with a fiercely twisted gray mustache, was more communicative. "No; no coasting. El Donna what you 'Merican call 'wrecker,' " he briefly explained, to Dan's excessive surprise and alarm.

And yet it was possible that Captain Despartido might have business in the States, for all that. He surely could not have lied to him so coolly. But when, on the following morning, Dan took his first wheel from eight to ten, a glance at the compass not only dispelled his lingering hopes, but deepened his feeling of alarm. S.S.E. was hardly the course for the Florida capes; yet the Donna, close-hauled on the wind, was thus heading, and Dan looked up inquiringly into the face of Captain Despartido, whose gay attire of the previous day had been laid aside for a flaming red shirt, dingy duck trousers held in place by a sailor's belt, with knife and sheath attachment, a dilapidated slouch hat, no stockings, and faded carpet slippers.

"No talk; watch you steering!" growled the Captain, who had evidently laid aside his smooth shore manners with his fine clothes. And Dan was obliged to cloke back his words, which, after all, would avail nothing. Here he was, and here he must stay till the Donna put into port, and then—

But unfortunately the days drifted by, and there were no signs that the vessel was seeking a port of destination. With a lookout kept continually aloft, Captain Despartido sailed the swift-winged Donna hither and thither over the blue of the Spanish main, very much as his possible ancestor, Captain Brand, of the freebooting schooner Centipede, had done something like half a century before.

Fair weather or foul, apart from the necessary duties of taking in, making, or trimming sail, the Donna's crew led a listless, idle life. They lay about deck, or in their berths below, smoked, slept, played cards, or squabbled at their pleasure, unchecked by the officers, who during the day took turns with a powerful glass in the topmast cross-trees.

Some twenty-five miles from Six-point Key Light lies a small, low group of coral keys, called Los Palmas, presumably from the fact that a solitary palm-tree on the larger of the group is a notable landmark for navigators.

in that vicinity. Inside, or to the westward, the water shoals from five fathoms to breaking reefs; outside, a deep-sea lead can scarce find bottom.

The sun was hiding its flaming face in a cloud study of purple and old gold as the Donna, with the dropped peaks of her sails swaying leisurely in the declining sea-breeze, lay hove to, gently rising and falling on the long, lazy swells, a cable's length or so distant from Los Palmas. Several of the crew, among whom was Dan, stood idly at the rail, watching with evident interest three of their number who, having landed from the whale-boat on the largest of the group, were standing together under the tall palm-tree, into the leafy top of which a fourth had ascended by the aid of a pair of climbing irons, and was attaching a block through which a line was rove to the end of a broken spar projecting arm-like from among the broad leaves. Having brought the end of the line down with him, a large signal lantern, with a red glass front and powerful radiator at the back, was lighted and run aloft, where, moved by a clock-work arrangement in the base, it began very slowly and deliberately to turn round and round.

"For signaling some vessel, eh, Matteo?" carelessly asked Dan, with a vague hope that in some way it might presage a return to port.

"Sig—nalize! Oh si, Americano; certain," replied Matteo, with a short cough, as the four men returned with the boat, which was left towing astern, and the Donna, with her sails flattened down, was put off on the port tack, while Captain Desparlo, who had been aloft nearly all the afternoon watching the upper sails of a square-rigger bound to the northward and westward, slowly descended, and went below for another look at the chart.

The short tropical twilight gave place to a soft darkness, against which overhead the stars glistened like diamonds against a background of bluish-black velvet. Astern, the dull red glow of the signal lantern alternately appeared and disappeared, and as Dan took the wheel at eight bells the thought suddenly occurred to him that it would be both natural and easy for a vessel to mistake it for the red revolving light on Six-pound Shot Keys; and with this thought came another, which made him turn suddenly pale and catch his breath at the mere supposition.

But ridiculing himself for his folly, he turned his attention to his duty, which really, with the smooth sea and light southerly breeze, the Donna needed only the merest touch of a spoke now and then to keep her on her course.

Ricardo, the mate, nervously chewing at the end of an unlighted cigar, stood with Captain Desparlo staring intently over the quarter rail into the darkness, neither of them speaking for a long time. Suddenly, with a muttered exclamation, he brought his hand down heavily on the Captain's shoulder.

"She is trapped—by the bones of St. Anthony, Capitan!" he exclaimed, exultantly; and as with a muttered response in Spanish Captain Desparlo hurried forward, followed by the mate, Dan, across whose mind flashed the possible meaning of the exclamation, quickly turned his eyes in the direction indicated. Broad on the starboard beam of the schooner, which was heading about E.S.E., two tiny pencil points of light—the one green and the other red—appeared against the background of darkness. Then all was plain to the quick-witted young New-Englander.

"The square-rigger we saw at sundown," he said, under his breath, as he glanced back at the compass, "and running straight for the shoals inside that false light."

"Keep full there!" interrupted the deep voice of Desparlo, who, with the entire schooner's company, was standing on the main-deck intently watching the approaching sail.

"Ay, ay, sir!" was the reply, as, pushing the wheel up a spoke or two, Dan proceeded with a fast-beating heart to act upon a sudden thought which had come to him like an inspiration. Slipping his feet out of his shoes, he stepped softly to the taffrail, where, grasping the painter of the towing boat, he lowered himself over the stern and slid down into the boat itself with inconceivable rapidity. Cutting the line with his sheath-knife, Dan, as the boat drifted astern in the shadowy gloom, shipped the rudder, stepped the light mast, shook out the sail, which set with an ordinary sprit, and springing lightly into the stern-sheets, trimmed aft the sheet, seized the tiller, and in another moment the boat was standing off on the opposite tack in such a way that a few short tacks would enable Dan to intercept the coming vessel if—

Out of the darkness sounded a hubbub of voices, followed by the slatting of sails, some angrily shouted commands, and a moment or two later a great splash in the water, as though the remaining whale-boat had been picked up bodily and tossed over the side. Then came the noisy ejaculations of the men, and the clattering of oars in the rowlocks. For one brief moment, as he listened to it all, and heard the exulting yell which a little later followed, as probably they caught sight of the whale-boat's sail, Dan's heart sank within him.

But the Yankee boy was fertile in expedient. "They haven't caught me yet," he muttered between his teeth, as, putting up the helm and slacking the sheet a bit, he let the boat's head fall off till she had the wind abeam, when, setting the tiller in its notch, he slipped noiselessly over the gunwale, and as the boat went dancing off unguided, Dan, in his linen shirt and trousers only, struck boldly out for the bark, which was now near enough for him to make out her rig.

Five minutes of easy swimming brought Dan alongside, and as her progress was slow, the sea smooth, and the bark deep in the water, he easily caught one of the mizzen chain-plates, and, assisted by the upward "send" of the swell, Dan lifted himself into the mizzen channels, from whence he sprang into the quarter gangway, dripping like a young sea-god, and panting for breath.

"Mermaid come aboard, sir," said Jerry Allen, the helmsman, in a matter-of-fact voice to the tall, gray-bearded captain, who, with a rather puzzled expression on his face, was watching the slowly revolving light, now a couple of points on the weather bow.

But before the master of the bark, who wheeled suddenly round, could speak, Dan, recovering his wind, exclaimed, excitedly,

"That's—a—false—light—sir—the wrecking schooner—"

"Ah," interrupted the Captain, sharply, though with no outward show of excitement—not being given that way—"Jerry, hard over your wheel quick—keep her off N.N.E.!" Springing to the break of the quarter, he continued, in the same breath:

"All hands to starboard braces! Mr. Martin, slack away to port, fore and aft! Round in lively, lads—LIVE-LY! Well that—well all! Belay!"

It being the dog-watch nearly all hands were on deck, and as the bark's head fell off, the yards were swung like magic, but before the rattle of blocks and creaking of truss-arms had died away, Mr. Martin, who was excitable, sprang into the fore rigging.

"Hard up! hard up!" he yelled—just one moment too late! The schooner Donna, whose boats had just come alongside, was lying without side lights directly in the changed course of the deep-loaded bark, which struck her a glancing blow, or the schooner would have been cut to the water's edge.

"Cra-a-a-ck!" and one of the boats was smashed like an egg-shell. "C-r-r-r-rash!" and the schooner's bowsprit snapped inside the cap like a pipe-stem, and with another crash down came the foretopmast, gaff topsail and gear hanging in hopeless wreck, while the bark's fore-yard, poking through the Donna's foresail, tore it into shreds.

For some twenty minutes or so the dire confusion attendant upon a collision at sea, even under the most favorable conditions of wind and weather, ensued. On board the Donna was a perfect chaos, as every one was giving orders at once. But on board the bark braces and running gear were let go, men ran out on the yards, systematic orders were given, and the two vessels began to swing slowly apart. An inquiry from the quarter as to whether the schooner wanted assistance was met with a surly, not to say savage, negative from Captain Desperdo, to whom Dan called out politely from the quarter:

"Adios, Capitan: guess you won't make much out of this cruise"; to which Captain Desperdo, banging his hat madly down on deck, yelled back something that sounded very savage, though fortunately it was in Spanish, and in another moment the Donna was swallowed up in the darkness.

"It's the wrecking schooner that hung out the light, sir," Dan explained, as, obeying a sign from the tall Captain, he followed him down into the cabin, where, while the latter, without answering, began to pull out some dry things from the slop chest for the still dripping newcomer, Dan, with eyes as big as gooseberries, stood staring at an oil-painting of a pleasant-faced lady screwed against the wall of the cabin.

"Good gracious!" said Dan, half aloud, "that's mother!"

The Captain, hearing the exclamation, but not distinguishing the words, rose to his feet, with a couple of shirts and a pair of trousers over his arm, and seeing Dan's astonished gaze fixed on the picture as he stood staring at it with parted lips, he observed quietly, by way of explanation:

"My wife. Native artist in Calcutta copied it from a photograph. Nice picture, eh, youngster?"

If Dan had yielded to impulse, I should here have to record that "throwing himself upon the breast of the astonished Captain, he exclaimed, in a voice choked with sobs, 'Father, oh, father!'" etc. But suddenly recalling the coolness and self-possession so important to the seafarer, Dan pulled himself bravely together and nodded.

"Exactly so, sir," he said, steadying his voice with a tremendous effort; "and it's my mother too, for I'm—"

"Dan!" interrupted Captain Darling, dropping the clothes on the floor and himself into the nearest chair. And then, forgetting himself for a moment, two tears as large as marrowfat peas rolled down his weather-beaten face.

Surely there is no life like that of the seafarer for strange coincidences. When, some fourteen days later, the bark Gladys, Darling master, arrived safely in Boston from Calcutta via the Windward Passage, with a cargo valued at over a hundred thousand dollars, the first man to step on board was Captain Zenas Bangs, who, while shaking hands with Captain Darling, uttered a fervent "Thank the Lord!" (for the first time in his life), as Dan suddenly bobbed up through the after-companionway, like the ghost in Hamlet. And Dan concluded the story of his adventures by remarking to Captain Bangs:

"On the whole, Uncle Zen, sailing with a fellow's relations does pay."

For very much to Mrs. Darling's disappointment, her husband, who himself proposes to retire from a seafaring life, thinks it better that Dan should follow the calling for which he seems so well adapted; and when the Gladys again sails, Dan goes with her.

A SCAMPER ACROSS COUNTRY.—DRAWN BY A. G. COMBOLD.—SEE PAGE 320.

IN THE SADDLE.

BY COLONEL THEODORE A. DODGE, U.S.A.

Part I.

I CANNOT remember the time when I was first put upon a horse. At six or seven years old, when riding became an every-day duty, I was already familiar with what a big horse felt like between my tiny legs. I lived with my grandfather, a clergyman, near Lake Winnepiscogee. Twice a day the mail had to be fetched from the post office, a mile and a half from the parsonage. Old Prudence was a Morgan mare, worthy her name when between the thills of the old-fashioned shay, but keenly conscious of her pedigree if you showed her the veriest tip of a birch twig. She knew her duty well when the venerable pastor gathered up the reins and spoke to her in his gentle voice. But I fancy she relished not less the companionship of his livelier grandson. I used to climb into the manger and sit and fondle her, and tell her my dearest secrets by the hour together; and many's the apple Prue and I went halves in. I quite believed that she could climb the apple-tree I often reached by standing on her back, if she but tried; it is certain that she would rear up to reach the coveted fruit I held down from above, sometimes till she stood all but perpendicular. She would follow me anywhere, and I used to wake up in the night and wish I could cuddle up to Prue. For the dear old mare had comforted me many a time and oft, and floods of my salt tears have trickled down her nose when I sought relief from boyish tribulations by laying my cheek against her broad and kindly face.

From the manger it was, too, that I always took off her halter and bridled her; then she would follow me out to the wood-shed, where a convenient girder enabled me to mount. Upward from the parsonage ran the pretty road a little stretch; then the brow of the hill concealed us. Prue knew that till then she must be sedate, lest the master's eye should see her unclerical pranks. But no sooner there than she forgot her years, if she was really old—as I doubt—and a lively enough scamper we had of it till within sight of the rambling village store, whose owner was everything from postmaster to justice of the peace. I have always believed that my secure seat is traceable to old Prudence's bareback lessons. Other instructors than horses—and horse books—I have never had.

In the South boys learn to ride, and girls too, bareback and without even a bridle. A mere stick to guide the horse with, and equilibrium often as clever as a rope-dancer's suffice. Most Southern boys and girls would laugh at the idea of learning how to ride. They never know how or when they learn. It is part of their lives.

The first advice an old horseman can give you boys is to learn bareback. The best as well as the most artistic seat on a horse in the world is shown in the procession on the frieze of the Parthenon, sculptured more than two thousand years ago, when every man rode bareback.

An old English huntsman's advice to his young master, just taking his first lessons in fox-hunting, condenses into its blunt phrase all the science of riding. "'Ands and 'eels low, 'ead and 'eart 'igh, Master Fred, and you'll soon ride like 't old squire, rest his soul!'" Now if you have ever ridden bareback, you will remember that though at first you may want to clasp your horse with your heels, you soon find out that comfort and safety make you settle down in a sort of loose way, and let the leg below the knee hang naturally, and that if your horse shies or jumps, you grip him, not with the heels, but with the knee and the upper part of the calf; to do which best you have to get your heels well down. And this is not because you have stirrups to keep your feet in place, but because it is the natural way to get a stout hold. This bareback seat is the one for you to learn and stick to. The less you forget of it when you get into the saddle, the better rider you will be. This is the old huntsman's "'eels low."

When you feel entirely at home on your bareback mount, you should use a doubled up blanket or strop for a few weeks, and later on a saddle with the stirrups taken out. You will think that it is a mighty slippery business at first, this sitting on a pig-skin saddle, but after a day or two it will grow to be natural enough. Don't put in your stirrups too soon—not until you can ride at every gait, and rise to a trot with perfect comfort, without them. It is better to sit down to your trot for many weeks before you begin to rise to it. It settles you into your seat, i. e., gets you close to the horse. When you put your stirrups in, let them be long enough not to alter this seat, with heels well down and the ball of the foot in the iron. Sit in the middle of your saddle. Only a steeple-chaser needs a very long seat.

I always like to see a boy in a saddle without leathers. I can see a capital horseman growing. For his position is natural and unconstrained, and not stiff, like the young swell who thinks he needs no such teaching. A boy may learn to ride by beginning with a full rig, and he may not. But I never knew a brave boy who did not make a good horseman if he learned my way. Besides, this is the one way to learn to hold on only by the thighs and knees. There is nothing so unhorsemanlike as to hold on by the lower part of the leg, and show daylight under the knees. Remember this. "'Eels low," then, means an easy, secure seat close to the horse. This should never be altered, except in rising to a trot.

Now as to the "'ands low." To stick to a horse is only half the battle. You must make the horse subject to your will. The first rule in doing this is patience. Never lose your temper with a horse; or if you lose it, never let him know it. The next rule is patience. Be sure your horse understands what you want before you expect him to do it. The third rule is patience. If your horse is awkward or blunders, don't scold; try again. Strong and nervous as a horse is, he is one of the most affectionate of animals. Gain his affection, and he will do anything and everything you want him to do. He must get a clear idea of what you want, but when he does get it, he will do it always and at once, and will take pleasure and pride in doing it. But you might as well try to mop back the Atlantic as to force him. The tricks many horses have almost always come from loss of patience and attempts at force.

Of course I cannot tell you much of how to train a horse. You will learn that when you are older. You have probably been given a well-broken pony or small horse to ride. Suppose we call him Don. If you cannot have a pony, you can learn on any horse. And a big one has some decided advantages over a little one. Don, I have no doubt, knows how to walk, trot, and canter at will.

When you feel perfectly at home on Don's back, so that you do not hold on by the reins in the least degree, you have learned the first lesson, and can come to the next one—how to manage him. But you must bear in mind that you will never be a horseman if your seat is not strong and secure at any gait with the reins lying on his neck. You ought to ride at first with a snaffle-bit and single rein. Perhaps Don pulls on your hands. This is unfortunate, because it is apt to get you in the habit of pulling on his mouth, and you may grow to be a "three-legged rider." A soft-mouthed pony is much better for you to learn on.

There are two ways for you to guide Don. One is to hold a rein in each hand, using them just as you do in driving. This is very simple. You can also learn to do this with the reins in one hand, turning the wrist to draw either rein. The other way is to teach Don to guide by the neck. This is what the cavalryman does, because he must keep his right arm for his sword. If Don knows both ways, you can ride with one or both hands, as you like. Still it is well to use both hands a good deal, because this keeps your shoulders square. But don't pull Don's head too far round to turn him. Teach him to mind a slight pull, and keep your hands close enough together to shorten rein readily.

The place for your hands is just above the pommel of the saddle. Only by keeping your hands low can you possibly control Don to advantage. If you throw up your hands when he starts or plays, you will lose control of him. Always remember this—your hands must be light and low.

There are two other means of guiding Don—the voice and the legs. If you accustom Don to listen to your voice, he will get very fond of it, and pay a great deal of heed to you. I discuss all manner of knotty points with my Patroclus and Diomed and Penelope. They are capital listeners, and very helpful. You have no idea how much Don will understand. If he shies or is playful, talk to and laugh at him. Never strike him in anger. He will learn to be much more safe and companionable by kindness. I assume, of course, that Don is a lively little fellow. There are some ponies who have no more life than pigs. But you might as well expect to become a bold rider astride the saw-horse.

Your legs can be made of more use than your hands in guiding your pony. Your seat only requires your leg down to the knee; and if your leg hangs easily below the knee, you can use that part of it to guide and control Don. I will tell you how by-and-by.

"Ands low," then, means not only that you must keep your hands well down, and not pull on Don's mouth for your support, but that you must try to keep control of him without allowing him to pull on you; and use your voice and legs besides.

"Ead 'igh" means that you must neither lean forward, nor back, nor one-sided, but sit straight in your saddle, without being stiff. A man who is stiff can never ride. You must sit as easily as if in a chair, and not let your grip disturb the close seat you learned bareback. Your backbone must be erect, but not rigid. Your arms must hang quite naturally, and your whole position must be so easy that you can lean back far enough almost to lie upon the horse, or can move sidewise or forward on the waist, with perfect ease. You should be able to put either leg up in front of you on the pommel, and, in fact, do anything you could do in a chair. "Ead 'igh" means perfect ease, security, and confidence in the saddle.

Last, but all-important, is the "cart 'igh." No coward ever rode well. You may be timid for a day or two if you have never been on a horse. But you will soon find that riding is easy and natural. And unless you are quite fearless, you may be sure that Don will know it, and never obey you. Of course any boy can mount a pony who is perfectly quiet, and ride a few miles without falling off. But to become a horseman a boy must feel sure that he is stronger and more able than his pony, and can manage him and make him do anything within reason. Then he will learn fast. If he is timid he will never learn. And remember that it is not the bragging, bullying, fighting boy who is always brave. I have been where true courage came to the fore, and have more often found it in the quiet, steady, and often small and pale-faced boy than in the swashbuckler. Such a lad was Ulysses S. Grant, and he was a famous horseman from his youth up, as well as one of the most truly brave of men.

IN THE ORCHARD.

BY FRANK DEMPSTER SHERMAN.

ROBIN in the cherry-tree,
I hear you carolling your glee.
The platform where you lightly tread
Is lighted up with cherries red,
And there you sing among the boughs,
Like Patti at the opera-house.

Who is the hero in your play
To whom you sing in such a way?
And why are you so gayly dressed,
With scarlet ribbons on your breast?
And is your lover good and true?
And does he always sing to you?

Your orchestra are winds that blow
Their blossom notes to me below,
And all the trembling leaves are throngs
Of people clapping for your songs.
I wonder if you like it when
I clap for you to sing again.

GETTING RID OF AN OFFICE-SEEKER.

BY DAVID KER.

"YOU seem to have a curious way of doing business in Russia, Pavel Petrovitch" (Paul, son of Peter), said I to my travelling companion, looking up from the Moskovskiya Nyedomosti (Moscow News). "Listen here: "Official Accuracy. A lady attached to the Moscow opera, wishing to go abroad, recently called upon M. Basistoff to obtain the necessary permit. The official magnate received her very politely, and asked for her written petition. "I have none," she cried; "I never knew that it was useful." "Not useful, madam? why, nothing can be done without it." "What am I to do, then?" "Nothing easier—just take a sheet of paper, and write as I dictate." The petition was written, signed, and folded. "And now," said he, "you have only to deliver it." "To whom?" "To me, of course," replied the bureaucrat, with a pitying smile at her ignorance. Then, putting on his spectacles, he carefully read over his own composition, endorsed and filed it, and then, turning to the impatient artiste, said, with a low bow, "Madam, I have read your petition, and deeply regret being obliged to tell you that I cannot grant it."

"Well," said the Russian, laughing, "it strikes me that I've heard of public business being transacted rather slowly even in England. Somebody told me once of a lawsuit there between two ladies for the right of bringing up an infant, and by the time it was decided the infant was a Captain in the Guards. But talking of Basistoff, did you ever hear how he once got rid of an office-seeker?"

"No."

"Well, it's worth hearing. He had been terribly bothered by a knavish-looking man with red hair, who came every day to ask for some place or other; and it didn't take long for a sharp fellow like Basistoff to guess that the porter must have been bribed to let this creature in. So one day he said, in passing,

"Misha [Mike], what a good-hearted fellow you must be to admit that red-haired man as you do!"

"Why so, your Excellency?" faltered the dismayed porter.

"Why, don't you know that he wants me to dismiss you and make him porter in your place?"

"The next time the office-seeker appeared, he got the soundest thrashing that the porter's full strength could inflict, and Basistoff listened to his yells with a smile of quiet happiness."

THE DRAWING CLUB.

BY ALICE DONLEVY.

II.

FOR Saturday meetings the club confined itself to drawing single leaves without stems, from the calla, begonia, Chinese primrose, and geranium plant that grew in Dr. Lee's bow-window.

Norman was very anxious to draw a small bunch of ivy that had rooted in a bottle of water. So he kept on drawing ivy leaves, and following Aunt Ida's advice, he never drew the same leaf twice. He had attempted to cut out the ivy's portrait in black paper, but had always found that the slender stems were torn before the larger leaves could be cut out, so he made up his mind to stick to drawing ivy leaves.

He had bought with his own spending money some white ink, a bottle of black American drawing ink, and a sable brush, and had practised every day making the veins of the ivy leaf on black paper with white ink. These "black and whites" he had brought to the club meeting, and every member had given an opinion.

At the sixth Saturday meeting Norman said, "Leonard, I think I know the ivy leaf by heart, but I wish you would help me to draw the bottle."

"Very well," said Leonard. "You will want my T square to measure with."

"I see you can draw the straight neck of the bottle," said Edith, "but how will you manage with the bowl part of the bottle?"

"I shall use my compass for that," said Leonard, "and if I had not a compass I could take a plate and draw around that."

"The top of a teacup would be nearer the size," said Edith. "If you'll wait, I'll ask Aunt Ida for one."

"It seems to me," said Marion, "that as we are drawing from nature, we ought not to measure, but draw by the eye. Do you think measuring is fair?"

"Why not?" demanded Norman, indignantly.

"Well, measuring seems to me like cheating," returned poor Marion, who could see that the opinion of the club was against her.

"You don't call it cheating when the clerk in a store measures the ribbon she sells you," said Rosa.

"Well, he might give you short measure, you know," said one of the sisters, whereat the club laughed.

"The whole point of the thing is this," said Leonard, who was a little fond of laying down the law, it must be confessed: "if you do it for the purpose of deceiving anybody, it is cheating; but no one expects you to draw perfect circles without a guide of some sort, any more than you are expected to scale a high wall without a ladder. The compass or teacup is just a ladder, that's all."

"Well, then, here comes Edith with the ladder," said Norman, as that young lady entered with a teacup, which was none the less pretty because it had lost its handle.

Leonard selected a soft pencil with a sharp point, and drew a circle with an unbroken line. Then he laid his T square so that its two sides touched the circle at two points, and drew two straight lines by the side of the square, making a right angle. Rosa asked to be allowed to help, so the square and pencil were handed to her, and she placed the square so that one of its sides was exactly on the short drawn line, and drew the third line. The fourth was added by Norman, and the square was completed. The club had learned one thing at least, namely, that in order to rule correctly with a T square, the edge of the square must be close to a straight line.

Another thing they learned, and that was that a "guiding line" should be drawn in the centre of the paper for other measuring lines to be drawn from it, because, as one of the members remarked, paper is not always cut straight.

The important business of the T square and the guiding line having been made clear, Clarita attempted to draw a square, and succeeded in making one at least as perfect as the joint production of Leonard, Rosa, and Norman.

"That's very good, Clarita," said Marion, when her friend had finished; "but if the circle had not been drawn first, you would not have known how large to make your square."

"I always use little scraps of paper to measure by," said Clarita; "it saves so much rubbing out on the final drawing."

This reminded one of the quiet sisters of her rubber, which she produced from the finger of an old glove, a bit of carefulness which Leonard praised, because, as he said, it kept the rubber clean and dry.

"Before you rub out any of the lines, I want to draw the neck of the bottle," said Clarita; and laying the T square on the paper so that its thick part was against the base-line, she drew a line from the upper line of the square. Then the question arose as to the length of the neck. Dora declared that it was as long as the height of the square, and Marion was equally certain that it was not, while Norman just escaped committing himself when he remarked that the bottle was "built on the giraffe plan."

"If all the members of the club have made their guesses, we will measure it," said Leonard, and this he did with a knitting-needle, dropping it into the bottle.

Norman took the drawing of the straight lines and circle—the scaffolding, as it were, of the bottle he was to draw—and carefully drew the outline, in doing which he had to trust to his eye to a great extent. When the outline was finished, he filled in the bowl and neck of the bottle with his brush and black ink, and waited for the ink to dry before beginning to draw the tiny roots in white ink. Very pretty the tiny rootlets looked in the transparent bottle, spreading out like the veins of a leaf, and twining in the water as gracefully as the stems do in the air.

"After all," remarked Marion, as they watched them, "roots are only underground stems."

"I vote that we draw roots next time," said Clarita.

Leonard, who had left the room, now returned, and called Norman to the door, and they both went out.

"I know," said Edith, as the other girls looked curiously after the retreating boys, and then at one another. "Leonard has gone to his room for his black-board and easel. He got them for one of his birthday presents."

Presently the two boys returned with the black-board and its belongings, and Leonard said:

"I think I heard Clarita say she wanted to draw roots. Now if Edith will ask Aunt Ida for a beet, and if a beet is good enough for Clarita, we will get to work."

"Will this do?" cried Edith, returning a minute later with a good round beet.

"The very thing," said Leonard, approvingly.

Clarita was not new to the work before her. Her drawing teacher at school made a great deal of use of black-board drawing, and the girl was one of the cleverest of her younger pupils. It was Leonard's account of this that suggested to Aunt Ida the present of the black-board.

Clarita took the T square, and drew a square, the inside of which she made white with chalk. Next she drew the tapering end of the beet. "I leave the black-board as a background," she explained.

"But how shall you show the tiny roots?" asked some one.

"I'll show you soon," replied the girl, and taking a sponge, she wiped out a crescent-shaped space on the board.

"That is the shade," said Leonard, who was honestly pleased with the intelligent manner in which Clarita had gone to work. "Now for the little roots."

The young artist handled a fine-pointed crayon with such skill and delicacy that the little rootlets soon began to stand out strong and distinct on the black ground, as you see them in the illustration, and each member of the club seemed as much delighted with the result as if it had been his or her own work.

"I think this has been the best meeting yet," said Norman, when, soon afterward, the club broke up. "We had some fun with that old T square, and we have seen how Clarita can make beets grow on black-boards."

A NEW SERIAL.

In the next number of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be printed the first chapter of a serial story, entitled:

SILENT PETE;

OR, THE STOWAWAYS.

By the Author of "Toyl Tuber," "Tim and Tip,"
"Raising the Pearl," etc.

This story will be found to be fully equal in interest to the best of this popular author's previous works, so lifelike are the characters and so sympathetically is the moving tale related of the adventures of the young hero and his no less heroic companion. The scene opens in New Orleans, from which city it is soon transferred to the brig Clio, thence in due course, and after many adventures, to the streets of New York City.

The illustrations will be drawn by Mr. W. P. SNEYDER.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

MANY of the children who read the Post-office Box have visited the beautiful Japanese village which was for some time in New York, and has now been removed to another city. I think they will be interested in a little girl's bright description of the odd and pretty things she saw when it was exhibited in San Francisco. The thousands of little people who have not been visitors of the clever oriental workmen will be equally delighted with this contribution:

OUR VISIT TO THE JAPANESE EXHIBITION IN SAN FRANCISCO.

This exhibition represents a Japanese village, in which each workman is employed at his own trade.

After buying our tickets, we passed through a large doorway, and saw in front of us the "Fine Art Exhibition." There were some beautiful cabinets and carvings there, and one particularly beautiful fire-screen, made of black lacquer and ornamented with mother-of-pearl flowers.

Passing on, we saw that the hall had platforms all around, on which the Japanese were working. At one side of each platform was the queer braided straw slippers which the Japanese wear, which they take off before going on the platforms. The Japanese have no chairs in their every-day life, so they sit on their feet which are covered with queer mitten-like stockings.

On the first platform was a carpenter's shop, where the workmen were making a cabinet. Instead of pushing the plane forward, as our carpenters do, they pull it back, and the shavings look like silk, so thin are they. The queer tools the Japanese use are hung on the sides, on nails.

On the next platform were the bronze finishers who take the bronzes from the casting, and clean and color them. Next came the bronze modeller. First he took a clay vase and covered it with wax, which he kept in a basin of water.

Then he patiently made all the ornaments of the same kind of wax and put them on the vase. When he had finished ornamenting it, the vase was covered with clay, and the crevices in the wax being filled, until the whole looked like a large lump of clay. When the clay was hard enough to handle, the lump was held over a fire and carefully turned until the wax was melted. Then the molten bronze was poured in the hollow where the wax had been. When the bronze had cooled, the outer clay was broken off, the hard clay dug out, and there was the bronze vase, ready to be given to the bronze finishers.

On the next platform were the men who paint the beautiful Satsumo ware, which was formerly used only by the Mikado and the nobility. The vase or saucer is first beaded, and then, with a fine brush, is painted on it a beautiful design, by means of the Otta decolorators. They painted so rapidly that they seemed to take no pains, but nothing was spoiled, and all the pictures, when finished, looked as if they had been painted with the greatest care.

Passing on, we saw the potter, with his delicately balanced wheel, which he kept whirling by means of a stick. First he took a large lump of clay and put it on the middle of his wheel. Then, after whirling the wheel, he drew up some of the clay from the side of the wheel, and cut it with his fingers, and cut the vase off the lump with a thread, and put it on a board by his side. On Saturdays these vases were given to the children who watched him make.

We had now arrived at the end of the hall, and on a platform higher than the rest we saw a pretty Japanese house. On the platform we were met by a pretty little Japanese woman with a lacquer tray in her hand, on which were some cups of tea. The cups had no handles, and she had to dip her sugar or cream in it, and tasted like green tea.

Down the middle of the hall we saw the process of making the Japanese crane, which he kept whirling man weaving. His wife, a pretty little woman, was near him, with their cunning baby in her arms. I had taken some marigolds with me, which the Japanese seem very fond of, so I gave each one of two flowers. When I gave the baby one, he smiled and tried to put it in his mouth.

On the other side of the hall were the Satsumo painters, and then some silk embroiderers. The silk was held in frames, and the men pushed the needle in and out in a very queer manner, it seemed to me. Next came the Shippo or cloisonné manufacturers. First, on a copper vase one of the men drew a design; then another spread a kind of liquid over it and stuck with it on the lines of the design; and then the color on the vase and put it in a furnace, where it was burnt. Then it was polished, and put on a stand.

On the next platform were the Bishu porcelain decorators; next the screen-makers, the tailor, and the hair-dresser. The hair-dresser does not stay in any one place, but goes around and dresses every one who may wish it, and dresses their hair. Here we found we had reached the "Fine Art Exhibition" again. At this end of the hall was the panorama of the famous places in Japan. Among the pictures was one of Fuji-Yama, the sacred mountain of Japan.

When we went out, we felt as if we had been in another country, and it seemed strange to see any but Japanese faces in the street.

LUCRETTIA POPE.

HUNGARY, NAGY APONYA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—As I have never yet seen a letter from Hungary or our dear father, I think I will write to you. Till now I have nearly always been in winter in Vienna, as papa and mamma had also a house there, and only in summer we were in our dear country. My cousin, called NAGY APONYA. This winter we all remained here, and as I as well as my brothers and sisters find it very amusing. We are six—three boys and three girls. My eldest brother is twelve and I am eleven, and the youngest of my brothers is a darling baby of one year. He was born on New-year's Day; isn't it nice? I have a large doll, but I do not play with it much. I want to tell you there are 24,000 books in it, and galleries and paintings in it, and I have a great deal of a great fun. My younger brother takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE; I like it very much too, and my mamma and papa like it very much. My letter is getting too long, but as I have still many things to tell you, I shall soon write again, if you will kindly permit it.

TERESA A.

Your very attentive reader.

The little brother was a very charming New-year's gift. We shall be pleased to hear again from you.

GLASGOW, SCOTLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—My mamma laughs very much at the comic pictures in the paper. I must tell you that my last summer holidays were spent at Aberdeen, in the county of Ross. There are some beautiful lochs in the neighborhood of Aberdeen. I live in the central part of Glasgow. I study arithmetic, reading, penmanship, and needle-work, sewing, writing, drawing, and singing. I am doing some plain needle-work for an industrial exhibition which is to be held in Edinburgh.

ANNIE D. (aged nine years).

For little Fairfax Payne's chapel fund the following contributions have been received: previously reported, $16 75; Mrs. A. M. HINTER, Philadelphia, $10; Mrs. J. M. HINTER, Philadelphia, Penn., $1 25; Mrs. Blakie, $1; Mr. McUTCHEON, 30 cents; Mrs. De Rende, $1; total amount received, $30. S. McILWATER, Englishwood, New Jersey.

HAMMERSMITH, LONDON, MIDDLESEX, ENGLAND.

This is the first time I have had the pleasure of writing a letter to you, and I hope you will be able to find a corner for it. I have taken in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for one year and a half. I like it very much. I read the letters every week, and like them very much. The stories also I like very much indeed, and I have two brothers and my two brothers. I learn arithmetic, reading, history, grammar, geography, and am just starting in algebra; history is my favorite, and my brother has four pairs of pigeons, and they are so tame that they will eat out of his hands, and my mamma's also; we let them fly about in the open air, always coming back at night to their house, which is always open. I am twelve years old, and a little English boy. Dear Postmistress, can I write another letter and tell you about our dog?

CLARA.

You may certainly write again. I should like to hear about your dog.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have just begun to take this book, and I like it very much. I have a brother twelve years old and a little sister seven. I live in the suburbs of Nashville, and have a large shady yard. We have three acres of home, and a garden, and a long porch, for Josephine and her little friends; a rope one in a noble old poplar, for the boys; and a cedar, with iron hoops, and not a rope about it, the seat so wide that three little girls can easily sit in it. We have lots of fun in the summer playing ball, and a great many more. I am very proud of being a double cousin of Charles Egbert Crowsfoot. I mean to write some day too. I have a reading stove, and the one I have chosen is for Doris in Little Men, a safe, a set of furniture, and everything complete for doll house-keeping. Sister and I have seventeen dolls; she has forty-

CHAPTER I.

JERRY'S PLANS.

"WELL, what's the use of hanging round here? Pete allows that we could make more money if we were in a bigger city, and he's about right. Somehow it seems as if the folks don't want to hear music; but if they do, there ain't no danger of fellows being loaded down with too much money for playing."

"But where are you going? It costs something to travel round like regular mobs, and if you can't earn enough for your living, what will you do?"

"Look here, Felix Dompain, did you ever see any fellows that thought Jerry Hicks couldn't take care of himself, and Pete too, if there was any need for it?"

"No, Jerry, I never did; but, you see, living here is one thing, and starting off to try to get North is another. Supposing you should get way up to New York, what could you do with Silent Pete? Why, the boys there would just about tease him to death when they saw him mooning round with that fiddle he calls Sweetness, and not even saying a word to anybody when one of his fits of playing comes on to him."

"Where do you suppose I'd be if any fellows should try to pick on Pete? Do you remember what happened to Nigger Jim when he did that same thing last winter?"

"Yes; but you might run across some fellows that you couldn't lay out as easy as you did him."

"It's got to be a mighty tough fellow that could rough it into Pete very long if I was anywhere around. Just move off a little ways, so's he won't hear us. There, stand behind this lamp-post, and I'll tell you all about it. You see, Pete he's getting awful lonesome and homesick like, and that's why I'm going to start North. I thought he'd kinder forget about his father being drowned and his mother dying; but it seems as if the longer ago it was, the worse he feels. He's got some folks up in New York, and he thinks he can find 'em if he's there."

"Suppose he does find 'em, and then gives you the shake, what'll you do 'way off where you don't know nobody?"

"He's got the right to shake me if he wants to; that's nobody's business but his. You see, his mother was so good to me that time I was sick that when she died I said I'd look out for Pete, and I'll do it—don't you forget that! There ain't a better fellow in New Orleans than poor little Silent Pete. You see, the reason why he don't talk very much is that he's keeping up such an awful thinking all the time that he don't have any chance to speak. All he wants is just to fiddle, and when we're round nights, he playing and I trying to sing, he enjoys himself even if we don't get any money. I tell you what it is, Felix Dompain, if you can find anybody who's got as much music in his whole body as Pete's got in his little finger, you let me know, and I'll—I'll—well, I'll give you my share of the St. Charles Hotel."

The speakers were Jerry Hicks and Felix Dompain, and they were standing near the corner of Canal and Royal streets, in the city of New Orleans. The two were old friends—that is to say, they had been acquainted nearly a year, and when it was rumored that Jerry Hicks was about to take a trip North in company with Silent Pete, the little, quiet fellow who played on the violin in the streets while Jerry sang, Felix at once left his fruit stand in the care of a friend, and started out to learn the truth or falsity of the report.

Perhaps none of the boys except Jerry knew that the little street musician whom they called Silent Pete claimed the name of Peter Marquand. They all knew, however, that Pete had formerly lived in New York; that shortly after his parents came to New Orleans, four years previously, his father, while working on a vessel at Algiers, had fallen overboard and been drowned, and that his mother had died of yellow fever nearly a year before this conversation between Jerry and Felix had been held. The boys were also aware that the citizens spoke of Pete as a wonderfully good performer on the violin; but they had no very great appreciation of his powers, since they knew that Pete's music drew more praise than pennies, even from his admirers.

"Well," said Felix, after a moment's silence, "Jerry, if you've made up your mind to take Pete on a voyage for his health, I suppose that settles it; but I reckon that you'll wish you was back before you get very far."

"Perhaps I shall," replied Jerry, as he looked around again to satisfy himself that Pete could not hear him; "but I'll be showing that I was willing to try. You see," he added, as his voice sank to a most confidential whisper, "Pete's mind don't run on anything else but getting up North—I mean when he ain't playing on Sweetness—and I'll get him there if I can. I won't say that I'd think of such a thing if it wasn't for him, for I never was in any other place than this city, except, of course, across to Algiers or out to the Lake, and between you and me I don't think much of New York; but Pete is just set on it, and he's going if I can get him there."

"When will you start?"

"I don't know. I'll look round to-day, and if I see half a chance we'll skip."

"Well, I'm sorry you're leaving, Jerry, but I won't say anything about it, because you'll do just as you want to, I suppose. If you can, I wish you'd let me know when you start; but if you can't, and I don't see you again, you know that if you get busted and can get back, I'm the one that will help you just as much as I know how."

"I'm sure of that, Felix, and perhaps I'll have to ask you to stake me some day, but I think now that I'll get along all right."

Meanwhile Pete, a slender, delicate-looking lad, hardly more than twelve years old, whose flaxen hair hung nearly to his shoulders, and whose large brown eyes had a preoccupied look in them that was almost painful to see, sat on a box fingering the strings of his violin with a touch so light as to be almost a caress. He paid no attention to two little colored boys who were busily engaged in alternately making faces at him, and darting around the corner whenever it appeared as if Jerry might see them; but with Sweetness pressed very close to him, he seemed to be unconscious even of the noise and bustle everywhere around him.

It was not until fully ten minutes after the fruit merchant had left him that Jerry aroused himself to the full importance of the work he had before him.

"You stay here till I come back, Pete," he said, as he approached the little musician, and then he hurried away in the direction of the levee.

Little Pete remained silent and motionless, save as his fingers moved softly over the strings of his violin, his thoughts wandering away to the far-off city of the North, his heart hungry to meet those who had loved the parents he had lost, while now and then a half-suppressed sob told of the pain of utter loneliness. The negro boys, emboldened by Jerry's absence, pressed nearer to the little fellow, whose quiet ways alone made him the object of their mirth, and played the most extraordinary antics expressive of derision, directly in front of him, without attracting his attention.

Jerry, meanwhile, had gone directly toward the water front of the city, as if carrying out some plan he had formed immediately after Felix had left him. He walked down Canal Street to the levee, turned abruptly to the left, and continued on toward the French Market, until a large square of canvas hoisted to the mast of a small brig caused him to come to a full stop. On this canvas had been painted in black letters the words

CLIO, FOR NEW YORK.

Jerry, who had always been an interested spectator of the business done along the levees, knew from this notice that the vessel before him was, after the fashion of the advertisements he had often read, "the fast, able, and staunch brig Clio," and that she was ready to take such freight as might be offered for New York—a method of getting a cargo which would render the time of her departure very uncertain.

Under ordinary circumstances he would have hesitated about going on board, for he knew from past and painful experience that neither the officers nor the crew of vessels were very anxious to receive calls from boys. But on this occasion he felt reasonably certain of being allowed on deck, even though he was not very warmly received, and he clambered on board in what he thought was a business-like way.

"Well, what do you want?" asked a gruff voice, before his head was fairly above the rail of the vessel.

"Are you the Captain?" and Jerry was undecided whether he should conclude his business while he was in such a position that he could easily jump on shore again, or if he should venture boldly over the rail.

"Yes, I'm the captain—of the galley," the man added, with a laugh; "and I reckon that's as much of a captain as you want to see."

"Oh, you're the cook, are you?" and all Jerry's assurance returned, now that he knew to whom he was speaking. "Well, I want to see the Captain of the brig."

"He's at Baton Rouge; but if you'll please to step into the cabin, General, I'll send a messenger after him. You won't have to wait more than a couple of days."

"I suppose it would 'most break his heart if he didn't see me," replied Jerry, with a grin, as he assumed an easy position on the vessel's rail; "but the Mayor never would forgive me if I should stay here so long. I only dropped round to see about hiring this 'ere craft to take me and my pardner up to New York."

"You'd better make some arrangement for a steamer, you had, for this brig is altogether too small for such a swell as you. Now tell me what's wanted, you young monkey, or I'll knock you into the water."

The captain of the galley was evidently in no mood for further banter, and recognizing this fact, Jerry swung himself over the rail in such a manner as to enable him to beat a hasty retreat in case the cook should lose his temper.

"This is just what's wanted, and if you'd try to help a fellow, you can't think how much good you'd be doing."

Then Jerry told the cook about Pete, where he wanted to go, and, in fact, all the particulars concerning him, concluding by saying: "Now you see how it is, and if I could only get a chance for him to go to New York, I'd be willing to do any kind of work to pay for his going, and I'd give up all the money I could raise."

"And how much might that be?"

"Well, I'm 'most sure I could scrape up three dollars, for I know Felix and the rest of the fellows would do what they could to help us."

"Three dollars! Why, that wouldn't pay for the salt you'd eat."

"I'd get along without salt. Here, now," Jerry added, as he perched himself on the rail once more, "I'll agree not to eat anything if the Captain will take us, and let Pete have what he wants. That wouldn't be very much, either, for he don't eat scarcely nothing at all. See here, now, he ain't had any dinner yet, so you'd think he ought to make a good square meal; but you just let me bring him down here and show you how much he does eat. Why, a slice of bread is a regular Christmas dinner for him, and three dollars would keep him in grub till next Fourth of July."

The cook did not seem to think that an exhibition of Pete's feebleness in the way of eating would be any inducement to take him as a passenger on the Clio, and he said, after a short pause:

"It's too bad you— Can he fiddle pretty good?"

"Fiddle? Why, he can play all around anybody you ever saw. To look at him you wouldn't think he amounted to very much; but you set him down once, without saying a word to him, and if he don't waltz around a fiddle better'n men fourteen times his size could, then I don't want a cent."

"I allers like to have somebody on board that can fiddle, and I reckon you could be a right smart lot of help to me in the galley; but, you see, Captain Sproul won't take passengers at any price, and you might just as well butt your head agin the foremast as to ask him."

"Is he ugly?"

"Bless you, no; he's just like a Southdown lamb when he's on board. He's too easy for his own good, he is; but all the same he won't take you, and I know, for I've sailed with him off and on for the last ten years, to say nothing of our being brought up in the same town."

"See here, now," and Jerry leaped from the rail to the deck, looking around cautiously to make sure that no one was near, "I could help you an awful sight if I was on this vessel."

"Of course you could, if you know anything about cooking."

"I'd make out eating better'n I would cooking, I suppose; but it wouldn't take me very long to break in, and I'll tell you what I'll do: you show me and Pete a chance on board here where we can hide, and after the vessel has started I'll come out and take any kind of a licking the Captain wants to give me."

"It wouldn't do no way."

"Why not? After we're on board he can't help himself, and I'm willing to stand anything if I can only get Pete to New York. I've heard of fellows who got off in vessels that way."

"So have I; but no good ever comes to a stowaway, and I wouldn't help you do anything of the kind."

"Say, just let me bring Pete down here, so's you can hear him fiddle once. And look here!"—Jerry stepped very close to the cook as he added, in a whisper, "I'll give you the three dollars if you'll hide us on board so's we can go in the vessel."

"I don't want your money, and I tell you honest that I'd like to have you on board, 'cause I've allers been egging the Captain on to hire a boy; but it's no use for you to talk to me."

"Now suppose you was a poor little fellow like Pete, and was down here without any place to sleep in sometimes, and pretty near all the time without half enough to eat, and you had folks in New York that would fix you up nice if you could only find 'em, wouldn't you think I was kinder rough on you if I wouldn't help you to hide on this vessel?"

"But I ain't got any business to help stowaways."

"And supposing you felt bad all the time 'cause your father was drowned and your mother was dead, wouldn't you think it was tough if you couldn't even get a chance to work a passage up to the place where you could find your own folks?"

"Why don't you talk to some of the steam-boat men?"

"They won't listen to me at all. I tried yesterday, and I couldn't even get on board to talk to anybody."

"But you might find some captain who would be glad to have you go with him."

"Yes, and I might find a hundred dollars; but I don't reckon I shall. Now all you've got to do is just to let me know when to sneak on board, and I'll do all the rest. Nobody won't know you had anything to do with it, and it'll pay you when you see how tickled poor little Pete'll be to have a chance to find his folks. If you'd been in a big city all alone, and your father and mother had died, and—"

"DOGGIE, YOU MUST WAIT FOR THE SECOND TABLE."

"Hold your tongue, will you? I'll toss you over the rail if you don't shut up!" And the cook walked toward the galley, trying to act as if he was in a towering rage.

"Will you help us to hide?" insisted Jerry.

"The Captain will just about break every bone in your body when he finds you."

"He may knock me around as much as he wants to if I can only get Pete to New York."

"Then come down here to-morrow night about seven o'clock, and I'll stow you two away. But remember," he added, as he shook his fist in Jerry's face, "if you let on to anybody that I had anything to do with bringing you on board, I'll smash you all up, and then I'll—I'll boil you like I would a piece of salt beef."

As he finished speaking, the cook darted into the galley, closing the door behind him, and Jerry wisely concluded that it would be better not to attempt to thank him for the promised assistance; so he ran at full speed to tell the joyful news to the little musician.

"We're going to New York to-morrow, Pete!" he said, excitedly, as he rushed up to his friend.

"Are you sure?" asked Pete, as he turned quickly, his face lighting up as with a flood of great joy.

"Of course I am. I've got it settled, and if we don't travel like nobs, Pete, we'll get there all the same. I would 'a hired three state-rooms for you on one of the big steamers, but the Captain and I couldn't exactly agree; so we'll try our luck on a brig I found, and if you don't have everything nice, you can't have it much worse than it's been here sometimes."

Pete looked at his friend in silence, as if it was difficult for him to understand that his dearest wish was to be gratified, and when he did realize it all he laid his hand affectionately on Jerry's rather dirty cheek, while a great sob of joy prevented him from speaking.

"We're going to stow away in a brig," explained Jerry, "and we've got to be on board at seven o'clock to-morrow night. The cook of the vessel is going to help us, and I'll fix it all right with the Captain after we get to sea. We'll go to New York, old man, and after we've found your folks I'll sell my bonds, and people will think we're a couple of sugar-planters come up North to see the sights."

"You won't get yourself into trouble for the sake of helpin' me to New York, will you, Jerry?"

"Of course not. What ever made you think of such a thing? The Captain'll be awful glad when he finds that we're on board; but I'll go on deck before you do, 'cause he might be tickled to death if he found out all at once that we was both with him."

"I know what you mean, Jerry," said Pete, in a low tone, "and I know what may happen when the Captain sees us. I shall go on deck when you do."

"See here, Pete," cried Jerry, almost fiercely, "didn't you agree allers to do just what I told you?"

"Yes; but I didn't mean it when things were what they may be on the vessel."

"You've got nothing to do with talking to the Captain, and if you don't promise me now that you won't go on deck till I tell you, I'll take a rope with me and tie you down so's you can't even wink. Then you'll have to stay below, and be making a lot of trouble for me besides."

"But if the Captain is angry when he finds that we've stowed away, I can't let you go alone to meet him."

"That's just what you've got to do," was the reply, "or I'll tie you down, as true as my name's Jerry Hicks."

"But, Jerry—"

"Now, Pete, promise me that you'll do as I tell you. Be a good fellow, and give me your word."

"I don't like to, Jerry; but I will if you say so, though it seems as if I'd be a coward. But if he should beat you, I'd come on deck, anyway."

"Well, I tell you what you can do. If he wipes the deck with me, and you see that I'm coming all to pieces, you can fetch a broom to sweep me up into some kind of shape; but that's all. Now come on, and let's tell Felix about it."

EASTER-EGG NOVELTIES.

BY ADELIA B. BEARD.

"In marble walls as white as milk,
Behind a curtain soft as silk,
Within a crystal fountain clear,
A golden apple doth appear.
There is no door to this stronghold,
Yet thieves break through and steal the gold."

LONG ago, when children's toys were simpler than they are now, and our young people were less exacting, the colored eggs dyed with logwood were hailed with delight at Easter-tide; but nowadays, however, something more elaborate is required, and novelties are demanded by the young as well as the old. It is to help supply this demand that these Easter novelties made of egg-shells are now inroduced. They are simple in their construction, and, as may be seen by the sketches, are conical little creatures when completed.

FIG. 1.—DIAGRAM OF HUMPTY DUMPTY.

Let us begin with Humpty Dumpty, who may with ease sit upon any wall; and should he, like the Humpty Dumpty of old, get a great fall, all the King's horses and all the King's men could not put this Humpty Dumpty together again.

The diagram (Fig. 1) shows the frame of this little fellow and how it is joined together. A large egg should be chosen; and when the contents have been blown from the shell—which is done by boring a small hole in each end of the shell with a needle, placing one end to the lips, and blowing steadily until the egg has all run through the hole at the other end—four holes must be pricked in the shell for the arms and legs to pass through, as shown in the diagram. These limbs are made of rather fine bonnet wire, the piece used for the arms being about eight inches long. The hand is made by bending up one end of the wire as in diagram, and with softened beeswax covering the loop thus formed. When one hand has been finished off in this way, the other end of the wire, still straight, should be passed through one of the holes near the small end of the shell and out through the one opposite, then bent up into a hand and arm in the same manner as described.

The wire for the legs and feet must be ten inches long. The diagram shows how it is bent to form the feet. On this frame wax can easily be modelled to look like a foot; a coating of red paint will add to the appearance, as red boots look well with the costume to be worn. The wire for the legs should be bent in a curve in the middle (see diagram) before it is passed through the shell. Again, as with the hands, one foot must be finished and the legs fastened on before the other foot can be made.

The figure of Humpty Dumpty being thus prepared, his face must be painted; water-colors are the best for this purpose. The jollier the expression of his face, the funnier the little man will look.

Patterns for trousers, jacket, and hat are shown in the diagrams. The trousers should be cut from white cotton cloth two and a half inches long and six inches wide. A slit an inch and a half long cut in the middle separates the legs of the trousers, which must, of course, be sewed up. Dotted lines at top and bottom show where a gathering thread should be run, the bottom gathers forming ruffles around the ankles. White should also be used for the jacket, cutting it three and a half inches long and five inches wide. The shape of the jacket may be seen in the diagram, dotted lines showing where the sleeves are to be gathered around the wrist. Collar and pockets of red—the patterns of which are given—finish the little garment. A white hat four inches around the brim and two inches high is decorated with a band of red, which should be sewed on the edge and turned up.

When dressing Humpty Dumpty fasten his garments on to his body here and there with glue, which will hold them securely in place. The hat also should be glued to his head, as it is difficult otherwise to keep it on.

top of this melted lead is poured, all the while care being taken to keep the shell perfectly steady, that the weight may fall exactly in the centre and make a perfect balance. A small quantity of lead is sufficient for the purpose, as the shell is so very light.

Miss Rolly-poly requires no limbs; when her babyish face is painted she is ready for her costume. The dress is simply made of a strip of colored cloth, and is two inches long and seven inches wide. The white apron is fastened to the Little Miss Rolly-poly, who decidedly refuses to lie down, always regaining an upright posture, no matter in what position she is placed, is made in the following manner: After the contents have been blown from the shell, the hole in the small end is enlarged gradually until it is about a half-inch in diameter; the shell is then placed in an upright position (a box with a hole cut in it just large enough to hold the egg firmly makes a good stand), and melted sealing-wax is poured in; on to work. No incubator is needed to hatch this bird, as only the shell is used, the contents having been disposed of in the manner before described. We commence the formation of the little owl by making two holes near the large end of the shell in the position shown in Fig. 5. By looking at the next diagram the manner of making the feet and legs may be seen. A short piece of wire is bent in the shape given, and is wrapped on to the longer wire with strong thread, thus forming three toes, which are quite enough for a bird that will never walk. One foot made, the wire is passed through the shell, having first been bent into a curve, as in the description of Humpty Dumpty. When the last foot has been fastened on, the wire should be pushed back into the shell, allowing but little of the legs to show. The wings are cut by the pattern given, and are painted to resemble feathers as much as possible. Brown is the best color to use. By the diagram may be seen how the head and body are painted.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

COMPANIONS.

A BOY is known by the company he keeps. You are judged by your associates, for the very good reason that people usually select for their friends those who are in sympathy with themselves.

If suspicion in a school trouble of any sort falls upon a lad or a set of lads, you may be certain that they have been companions in mischief. Wrong-doing is much like a snow-ball rolling down-hill: it gathers size and momentum as it goes. If a bad boy could always keep good company, few persons would credit him with badness. But a bad boy would be ill at ease among the good, and so you seldom find him in their society.

May your Aunt Marjorie explain that she is not one of those tiresome people who never have patience with fun, and who consider high spirits and merriment out of place? Indeed, no. When there is a frolic going on, count me in, if you please. Under the head of badness, I include the meanness which makes a boy tell a lie rather than own that he has been in the wrong; the malice which prompts him to play a practical joke, and the lack of principle which borrows and does not return.

There are diseases which are contagious, that is, communicated by the touch. We are very careful not to put ourselves in their way. The worst disease in the world which affects only the body is, however, to be preferred to a wrong condition of the soul, and the best way to keep out of that is to choose good companions and avoid bad ones.

dress as shown in the diagram. Sleeves are made of pieces of the dress material about one inch long and one and a half inches wide. They are rolled up and fastened with needle and thread, then sewed on to the dress in the position shown in the diagram. Pockets are made for the apron, and the ends of the sleeves tucked in them, which makes it appear as though the hands were hidden in the pockets. The cap is made of the same material, or of a color harmonizing with the dress, is four inches around the brim, and one inch high; it is sewed together at the two ends, and gathered into a pompon on top, as is shown by the dotted lines in the diagram (Fig. 3). A little glue should also be used to fasten this dolly's dress and cap on.

To turn a hen's egg into an owl has not before, I imagine, been thought possible, yet it is easy enough, and requires but a very short time to accomplish this transformation when one knows just how to go

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLY HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.

FAITH sat up, tremulous and excited. "Oh, Bertie," she said, softly, "where is she? I do so want to see her!"

The lad came forward at once. "And so you shall, dear," he answered, "very soon. Let me tell you first all that 'appened. Have you had anything to eat?" Bertie of late had made himself general manager of the household where Faith's needs were concerned. "Now, if I send your tea in here, will you take it comfortably? and I'll tell you all about it."

Faith assented. Very soon a cosy little tray was spread before her, and Bertie, sometimes sitting down, sometimes pacing the floor slowly, told the story.

The Dawsons and Mrs. Burton had been telegraphed for early in the day, and after Jo's final cross-examination Mrs. Dawson gave her testimony.

"I wish you could have heard it, Faith," said the boy, smiling at the recollection. "It was almost impossible to keep her to the point, she was so anxious to praise Jo. She related how they met; how Jo nursed her daughter—she pointed Miss Rachel out to the jury, and they nearly overwhelmed the poor girl—and how Mary Brooks, as she kept calling her, was the smartest, tidest worker she'd ever known, and the best girl with the children. As for her own Jo, the baby, it was fretting itself sick for her now. Well, the upshot of it was that Mrs. Dawson impressed the jury very finely, but Mr. Burton, in his quiet, forcible way, did more. He told of Jo's coming to him of her own accord, and offering to testify on Sandy's behalf; and he added what I never had suspected." Bertie smiled thoughtfully.

"What?" queried Faith.

"Why, that Jo was fully convinced that by giving her testimony she ran the risk of being thrown at once into prison herself for running away. He brought it all in so that it wouldn't be objected to as testimony, but I assure you that it told well, for no girl would run such a risk unless for a good cause; and, as she said herself, every one knew Sandy and she were not friends."

"And where was Jo all this time?"

"She had asked to be allowed to go out into the ante-room again; and do you know, Faith, I don't think the girl has the least idea what she is to do now. I never saw anything so humble and gentle as she seems. Those Dawsons must be capital sort of people," the boy added, breaking off suddenly.

Faith's eyes were shining. "I just want to see them," she answered. And then: "But, Bertie, if Jo hadn't, as you once said, the real grit in her, she never would have found and made such friends; and only think, if she had not done so well, tried so hard, and been so worthy, her testimony now would have gone for nothing, and Jo would have lost forever her great opportunity. I've often thought we all have just one really great opportunity in our lives to take or miss or to lose."

"Or perhaps not see at all," said Bertie, in a low tone.

"Perhaps; but I think if we make ourselves ready, as poor Jo unconsciously was doing all that year at Burnham, we shall not lose sight of opportunities when they come. God keeps them waiting, I fancy, Bertie, for our ready moments. He lets us have the will and the desire to prepare ourselves, so that we, poor things, may get all the merit possible. Ah, Bertie"—Faith, lying back among her pillows, put her arms up, clasping her hands above her head and looking over to the tall, boyish figure in the window—"do you know what I have thought lately?"

Bertie's face was turned swiftly toward Faith; the boy had learned of late to note every change, every hint of meaning in Faith's voice, words, or looks. So seldom, however, would she speak of herself that he caught eagerly at any suggestion of a mood that was likely to be personal.

"I think," she went on, with her softest smile, "my opportunity is nearly ready. I am not quite fit for it, though, just yet."

"What, Faith?" Bertie was startled by something in her voice and eyes.

"I think I know what it is to be, Bertie dear. Perhaps I ought not to trouble you with my fancies, but Jo was the beginning of it. I wonder if she will help me at the end?"

"Faith!" cried the boy, passionately. He knew now what she meant. Oh, were they all blind? did none of them see the feet of God's messenger coming slowly but surely? And she, in her gentle, girlish heart and soul, she had felt the "fragrance of the winged ones," as they came. She had known it, and was striving to be patient, to be ready.

"Faith!" cried Bertie. He knelt down by his cousin's side, and Faith stroked the curly, boyish locks as tenderly as though he were a child, instead of a lad only two years younger than herself.

"Don't talk and look like that! You mustn't! Opportunities, indeed." He lifted his eyes with a show of indignation in them. "Why, your whole life is full of them, and you're always ready."

But Faith only smiled and shook her head. "The real one is coming, Bertie," she answered. "There, now; don't be dismal any more. I want to see Jo."

Bertie rose to his feet. "Jo is here, Faith," he said, quietly; "they made me promise not to bring her in for half an hour."

"Oh, go quickly," cried Faith. She rose, stood still in the centre of the room, her heart beating with pleasure while Bertie was gone.

And so it chanced that Jo came back to Faith to find her almost as she remembered her last, standing in her beautiful room, the late sunshine of a summer evening falling about her, touching her white gown, her soft brown hair, her tranquil smile, and seeming to linger in the little cross shining at her neck.

But, oh, how really different was this tall, grave-eyed girl, Jo Markham!

Faith went forward swiftly with outstretched hands—with eyes lighted through a mist of tears—with happy, parted lips.

"Jo," she cried, tremulously. She took the girl tenderly in her arms, and held her closely for a moment. "Oh, Jo dear," she said, softly, "thank God for it all! I am so happy! so glad!"

CHAPTER XXV.

PERHAPS it will be hard for any one to understand how entirely Jo believed that she would be immediately sent back to prison; but even when Bertie took her up to North Street she concluded that by some one's kind interference she was allowed that much freedom, but that probably the next day would see her behind those dreadful doors again. The impression many people, brought up as Jo had been, had of the mercilessness of the law was made more striking in her case by her own and Sandy Martin's experience; so, as she drove through Ashfield to North Street by Bertie's side, it was hard for her to respond to his cheerful, satisfied mood. She knew she had done right; she felt sure Faith would think so, but it was difficult to have the lad's good spirits, or even be specially glad to know that Sandy had been completely overcome by what his ancient foe had done for him.

When Bertie fully realized Jo's frame of mind he determined that Faith should have the pleasure of undeceiving her. Jo could bear a little more misery for the sake of the peace that was to come.

Miss Grace welcomed the girl cordially. Her doubts of Jo had begun to melt on the first sight of Jo's neat, altered appearance, the steadfast simplicity of her young face, and as her story progressed the good old lady had been filled with dismay and remorse for her own part in Jo's too prompt imprisonment; so, while Bertie went to Faith, Aunt Justina took Jo up into her own sitting-room, where they both grew friendly over a talk in which Jo's life at the Dawsons' was the chief topic.

Mrs. Burton's good-will and interest in Jo was another open-sesame to Miss Grace's heart, and Jo was really an interesting person now—no longer rude, or ragged, or rebellious—a quiet figure, neatly dressed, sitting quite properly on one end of Aunt Justina's best plush-covered lounge, and speaking in a well-modulated if rather timid voice. A little bad grammar more or less, a slight dulness

"AND SO YOU SHALL, DEAR," BERTIE ANSWERED, "VERY SOON."

about catching all Miss Grace's suggestions, made really very little difference. "Mary Brooke" was on the whole quite a commendable young person, and Miss Justina was just revolving in her mind a plan for sending her to an excellent institution, of which she was patroness, when Faith's summons came.

Half an hour later Faith and Jo were still alone in the library, Jo talking for the most part; her thoughts set free now by what Faith had told her.

"Then they won't send me back, Miss Faith?" Jo had said, in startled surprise. Faith took time and gentlest words to reassure her on this point, and gradually it was impressed fully on Jo's mind.

Words came freely after a little while. Jo felt the comfort of being able to say all that she had kept pent up within her heart and mind so long, and Faith's sympathy was all she needed to draw her on.

At last Bertie appeared; and following him the Burtons, mother and son, who had been invited to tea, Bertie having in his character of master of ceremonies promised that Jo should go back to the hotel for supper with the rest of the Burnham party.

By this time Mrs. Joyce had discovered whose eyes Jo's were like, and had entered into a confidential talk with Mrs. Dawson about Jo's mother, whom she had known well.

"Just the smartest, bonniest lass you ever saw," Mrs. Joyce said to her guests while they waited Jo's coming. "Well do I mind the day of her wedding. I lived in Bayberry then; my man was in the provision business and I had dress-making, and this other Josephine Mary—Markham, her name was—was my best hand. Young Brooke was quite the gentleman. His people, some of them, are out in Bayberry now. I shouldn't wonder if they could be made to take notice of the girl. Poor dear!"

And much more would have ensued had not Jo just then appeared, still rather timid and shy, but with a happy look on her face as she greeted her old friends heartily.

Rachel could not ask or say enough; Mrs. Dawson was equally talkative and interested; the Joyces felt they had a distinguished guest, and altogether the supper-table, set in the landlady's own parlor, presented a very cheerful picture when, about nine o'clock, Bertie looked in upon them to say his cousin wanted Jo to come to North Street for the night.

"And this is Mrs. Dawson, I suppose, and Miss Rachel?" the lad said, in his friendly way, shaking hands with the visitors. "My cousin wants very much to have you stay over to-morrow and spend the day with her. She is not strong, you know," Bertie added, with quick gravity, "and so she thought unless you could stay all day there wouldn't be a chance for her to see enough of you, for she has to rest a great deal."

"Eh! poor young lady," said Mrs. Joyce, when the Dawsons had expressed their ready satisfaction and thanks, "it's failing fast enough she is. Master Bertie!"

The look of quick pain that came into the boy's face was not unobserved by Jo.

When they were out walking along the country road toward North Street, she said, earnestly, "Mr. Bertie, is she so very bad—is she—" Jo could not finish her sentence.

Bertie stood still a moment and looked at Jo in the moonlight. "Jo," he said, "we must value every hour with her, I believe." The lad turned away. "God wants her. I believe she is going away very soon."

IN THE SADDLE.

Part EE.

AND now let us suppose that you have got a good firm seat and light hands, and that you can ride along the road at a walk, trot, and canter, and feel as much at home as if you were on foot. The next thing Don and you may learn is to jump a fence cleverly. Have you never felt a desire to leap over into a field and gallop along the soft turf? I've no doubt you have been sorry that you could not do so, and have thought it a very great feat. But it is not hard at all. Any one can easily learn to sit a clever jumper over a fence or brook. The difficulty lies in teaching the horse to jump willingly and handily. Would you like to teach Don? In the country this is simple enough. In the city it may not be easy to get a good place to practise in. The way to begin is to find a fallen log, or a gate of which you can let down the bars until it is only eighteen or twenty inches high. Then walk Don up to it, and encourage him to step over it often and quietly, until he gets in the habit of lifting up his feet quickly and promptly when he reaches it. Always coax him; never strike him. Keep a little sugar or salt or a bit of apple in your pocket for him, and give him a taste after he goes over. This will make him like to do it. By-and-by Don will find when he walks briskly up to the obstacle that it is easier to rise with both his forefeet and hop over it than to lift up each so high. As soon as he does this, be sure to pat and reward him, for this is the great step gained, after which it is only a matter of practice and patience, raising the height by slow degrees, to make him jump two feet and a half or three feet. When he can do this, he does as well as any pony need. At the instant of jumping give him his head; don't pull on him. But when he lands, take hold of his mouth a trifle, so that he shall not stumble.

Now about yourself. You will be learning at the same time. When Don begins to rise at his leap, do you lean back, settle down in your seat, and hold on with all the legs you have, except your heels. As you hold on remember your bareback seat, but throw your feet to the rear a bit, so as not to lose your stirrups, which should be "home," i. e., under the small of the foot. If you are going to leap much, you may shorten your leathers a hole or two. Some people may tell you to lean forward as Don rises, and then back when he leaps. But don't you try it. Lean back. You may save yourself a "cropper."

When Don walks up to the bar and takes it cleverly, and you sit it without going out of the saddle, trot him up to it. Many horses jump best from a trot, and many bold riders always trot up to timber, while they gallop up to a hedge or a ditch. Later you can canter Don up to the bar, so that he may be familiar with his work at all gaits. By these means, and by rewarding Don whenever he has jumped nicely, he and you will both grow to be fond of it. But do you never strike him at a jump. Many of the best horses have been so discouraged by a cut with the whip when they were trying to do their best that they have lost all courage, and refuse to leap even small obstacles. Don will get to love praise very much. Blows will accomplish nothing. Don't keep on making Don leap till he is tired. You want him to like it, not to weary him with it. You can by these means both learn to leap well.

I told you before that you could use your legs to guide Don. Many hundred books have been written on this subject, from Xenophon down, but I must tell you in so few words that you will get only a very slight idea of it. Suppose you had spurs on your heels, and should gently and quietly touch Don with one of them while holding the reins so that he will not move forward. What will he do? Why, move away from the spur by stepping side-wise with his hind-feet. Now if you did it with the other heel, he would step away from that one. All well-trained horses are thus taught to move their croup, or hind-quarters, away from the spur or heel, and after a while a horse will get so sensitive that the least movement of the heel toward his side suffices to make him do this. It is just as important to make a horse shift his croup to either side as to make him shift his fore-hand. And it is the horse who does so well that is most easily guided. You can see that if you want to turn a corner to the left, you can do it by moving Don's head to the left, or by swinging his croup round to the right, for either will give him the new direction. And it looks very stupid to have to pull a horse's head 'way round to one side to make him turn a corner.

This use of the croup helps in many other ways besides, which I cannot now explain to you. But you will wonder when I tell you that horses may be trained even to do such extraordinary things as to trot and gallop and jump fences backward. Not that there is any great use in doing these feats, but teaching them makes a horse and rider obedient and skilful.

Now there is another use of the legs. If you quietly bring both your heels near Don's sides, he will be apt to move his hind-legs a little more under him than usual, so as to start forward; and if the bit restrains him, and his mouth is soft, so that he arches his neck and clamps his bit, he will be what horsemen call "collected," or, as it were, balanced. In this position he will be much more ready to perform what you desire than if he is in a sprawling one, which is always stiff.

From this you can see that the best use of spurs is not to make a horse go or to punish him, but to guide and control him. A well-trained horse almost never needs punishment. Only in a race are whips and spurs needed to push a horse. And a celebrated jockey once advised another to throw his whip over the fence if he wanted to win a race. A generous horse who understands his rider needs no whip.

You may wonder why a horse should be taught all these things. Why not let him move as nature prompts him? you may ask. A horse that is free can manage his own weight very handily himself. But put a man on his back, and he requires instruction how to manage himself and his burden, under the control of the rider, to the best advantage. Suppose you yourself should try to run and jump with fifteen or twenty pounds on your back; you would quickly understand what a man's weight adds to a horse's duty.

Now in order to teach Don to move his croup, you will have to be very patient, and teach him only one side step at a time, caressing him every time he has responded to your spur, and making him enjoy the learning as much as you do the teaching. When he has been well taught he will be able to move his hind-quarters in a complete circle about his forefeet, which should remain a fixed pivot, and his fore-quarters around, with his hind-feet as pivot. But he knows enough for your purpose if he will thus shift two or three steps quickly. And by using your heel and bit both, you see that you can teach him to walk sidewise, or what riders call traverse.

When you have mastered all I have told you, Don will not only be a much better pony, but you will be quite a promising young horseman, anxious to learn more about equestrianism as an art. I have scarcely told you its A B C. The rest you can learn when you are older. There is just as much to learn in equitation as there is in music or painting, and no art is more pleasant to study. There is as much difference between a fine rider and a man who only sticks to a horse and makes him turn to right or left or jump fences as there is between Mother Goose and Milton.

And now a word to the girls. You may think that a girl cannot do as much as a boy, but she can. In the South girls often ride bareback, sitting somewhat as they would in a side-saddle, and using a stick to guide the horse. But I presume that a girl here must begin on a saddle. It will be well for you to remember that a girl's seat on a properly fitting saddle is just as firm and secure as a boy's. Some of the boldest leapers in England are women. And while leaping is not necessarily evidence of fine horsemanship, it requires a strong seat, courage, and discretion. Your saddle ought to have the leaping horn, which curves over the left knee. Without it you have to depend too much on balancing. Your left foot wants to be in the stirrup at such a length as that you can, by slightly raising the heel, hold it hard against this horn, while the right leg presses on the other. You ought to hold the left knee well against the saddle, and be able, like a boy, to swing the leg, from the knee down, easily to and fro, though it should generally hang straight. The right leg should hang equally straight and close to the saddle over its horn; and if you lower the heel of this leg, you get a better grip. The saddle may be too big, but must not be too small. You must feel free to move your body in all directions, and sit just as easily and comfortably as a boy. If your saddle is on firm, you are as safe as possible.

Everything I have said to the boys applies to you. Be particular to sit square. This is all-important. You need to have some one occasionally watch you from behind to tell you whether you sit upright and in the middle of your saddle, particularly when rising to a trot. A girl who leans over to the left or sits too much to the right runs the risk of her saddle turning and of getting her pony's back sore. Keep your shoulders square, and let your arms hang naturally. Rise to a trot squarely; don't wriggle. It is more important for you to ride with two hands than for a boy, so as to keep your hands low, but it is also well to learn to use one hand only. You can use your whip in place of a boy's right leg, and if your seat is good and your skirts not too long, you can use your left leg as well as he.

A boy's seat is nearer the horse than a girl's, but it is no stronger. A girl can leap as well as any boy, but she wants to be more careful, because if she falls her skirts may catch and embarrass her. For this reason a girl had better not try to leap more than two-feet-and-a-half obstacles, and her pony should be trained not to rush after he has cleared the obstacle. The best way to do this is to pull up your pony, and give him a bit of sugar now and then after he has jumped well. This will lead him to expect it, and make him apt to stop if anything happens.

Learn how your saddle should be put on, and see yourself that it is firm, before you mount, and more than once during every ride. Feel now and then that your girths are tight.

Boys can dress any way. A girl will be most comfortable if she will wear a boy's under-clothes and socks and trousers under her riding dress. Long stockings are apt to make folds under the right knee. My own little girls of twelve and fourteen have such summer and winter suits for riding, and find them altogether the best. They have been brought up to ride by just the rules I have given you, and either can ride Penelope, who is a high-strung sixteen-hand thorough-bred, over a full-size hurdle or wide ditch as bravely as their brother. The old huntsman's "Ands and 'eels low, 'ead and 'eart 'igh," covers the ground for girls as well as boys.

All the gaits, walk, trot, canter, and gallop, will be easy to you long before you are perfect in what I have told you. Remember your seat, always close unless rising to a trot, and then close as may be; your hands, always light and low; your head keeping your body erect and lithe, and your heart in the right spot. And I have found that girls, though they have not generally the kind of bravery that a boy has, as a rule possess that which will make them confident and skilful in the saddle.

MR. THOMPSON AND THE MOSQUITOES.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

OTHER afternoon an odd-looking person entered my office. The figure and general appearance was Mr. Thompson's, but the face was one mass of red blotches, swollen and almost unrecognizable. I stared at him a moment before I could determine who it was. He bore the scrutiny with bad grace, and exclaimed, "Well, what's the matter now? Didn't you ever see me before?"

"Not when you looked as you do now," I replied. "What have you been doing to yourself?"

"I haven't been doing anything. I went out in Jersey to spend Sunday and have a good time, that's all," answered Mr. Thompson.

"Mosquitoes?" I inquired.

Mr. Thompson nodded.

"Tell me about it," I urged.

At first Mr. Thompson was very reluctant, but after some persuasion he consented.

Mr. Thompson had a day or two on his hands which he did not exactly know what to do with, so he concluded to spend them at a quiet little village among the Jersey hills.

"They told me that there were no mosquitoes and no malaria," he remarked, plaintively, as he swallowed a quinine pill; "and look at me now."

All went well until Saturday evening, when the little hotel was invaded by a party of roistering young clerks from New York, who were bent upon having a good time. They sat up all the evening with a bright light burning in their room, and the windows open. The result was that the room was speedily filled with mosquitoes. The hungry insects feasted for a while upon the convivial young men, and then, flying out through the transom, entered Mr. Thompson's room in the same manner. After buzzing around Mr. Thompson's head for some time, they seated themselves in a row on the foot-board of the bed and began to sing.

"You have no idea how dreadful it was," said poor Mr. Thompson, shuddering at the remembrance of the scene. "It was bad enough while they contented themselves with pulling the clothes off the bed and biting me through two blankets and throwing my shoes at each other."

"What?" I exclaimed; "the mosquitoes?"

"These were Jersey mosquitoes," replied Mr. Thompson. "But when they began to sing 'We won't go home till morning,' I could stand it no longer. I threw my pillow at them, and they all flew away, and I sank back exhausted."

It is my private opinion that at this juncture Mr. Thompson went to sleep; but he insists that he only lay for a few minutes, and was falling into a doze, when he heard them coming back more noisy than before.

"He threw that pillow at us; let's throttle him," exclaimed one, angrily.

"No, no; let's bite him," urged a second.

"That's so," they all cried in chorus. And before Mr. Thompson could do anything they were buzzing around his ears and making vicious thrusts at every uncovered part of his body. After a time, however, they seemed to get tired, and sat on the foot-board of the bed again to rest.

Mr. Thompson was relieved, and soon began to breathe gently through his nose. That's what he says; you and I would call it snoring.

"I THREW MY PILLOW AT THEM."

"Just listen to him!" remarked one of the mosquitoes. "He's talking."

"Yes; and he hasn't a bad voice," commented another.

"More like a frog than one of us, though," said a third.

"He may be a very decent fellow, for all that," suggested a fourth.

"I am—I am," interrupted Mr. Thompson, who was anxious to obtain the favor of the little pests in the hope that they would cease bothering him.

"What did you throw the pillow at us for, then?" demanded the first, angrily.

"Well, you were annoying me so," said Mr. Thompson.

"Of course we were," answered the mosquito. "If you were a mosquito you'd annoy people. It's our nature."

"Oh, I'm sure I should not," asserted Mr. Thompson.

"Try it and see," said the mosquito, with a sarcastic buzz.

Mr. Thompson says that he never knew how it came about, but before he knew it he was floating around in the air over the bed, making a tremendous humming, and finally he settled down on the foot of the bed.

"Well, how do you like it?" inquired the mosquito.

"It's jolly," exclaimed Mr. Thompson, enthusiastically; "but I'm awfully hungry."

"We'll go into the next room and get something to eat," said the mosquito, and, in accordance with the suggestion, Mr. Thompson followed his new-found friends out over the transom and into the next room. Here they buzzed around the room, and Mr. Thompson pleads guilty to a malicious joy in humming around the heads of the young men and annoying them in every possible way. He says that he has no idea how long they remained there, but finally growing tired, they returned to his room and settled down on the foot of his bed again to rest.

"Where did you come from?" queried Mr. Thompson, as he gave a last flutter to his wings and drew one long cobwebby leg up under him with a hum of satisfaction.

"Oh, we were blown up from the flats on the breeze," replied the mosquito. "We were born down in the marshes—hatched, I should say."

"How long do you live?" pursued Mr. Thompson.

"That depends upon the kind of luck we have," replied the mosquito, sadly. "Our cousins the gnats live only one day, but we are sometimes a week old before we die."

"And plenty long enough, too," muttered Mr. Thompson. Luckily the mosquito did not hear him, and it continued, after a pause:

"We don't have half a chance here, we are so small and so few. In some parts of South America we are so plentiful that swarms of us have been known to kill horses and cattle. But we are a large family, and have relations all over the world. We all belong to the Culex family, and gnats, midges, and gallinippers are our first cousins."

"Yes?" said Mr. Thompson, trying to appear interested.

"Oh yes," said the mosquito. "I'll tell you what I'll do—you seem like a good fellow; and to-morrow night I'll bring up a swarm of my cousins the gnats and a lot of jolly mosquitoes, and we'll make a night of it."

"If you do I'll put up a net!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson.

"Oh, you will, will you?" hummed the mosquitoes, angrily, in chorus, and forthwith began a simultaneous attack upon poor Mr. Thompson. He says he has no idea how it came about, but he suddenly found himself in bed again, and vigorously fighting the mosquitoes which were swarming around his head. But no matter how hard he slapped, they kept coming, until he fell asleep from sheer exhaustion. When he awoke in the morning his face was so swollen that he could hardly open his eyes, and he made a rapid escape from that mosquito-haunted locality.

When Mr. Thompson had finished telling the story, he looked at me sharply to see if I believed him. I suppose my face must have shown that I regarded his story with distrust, for he said, in an offended tone, "I suppose you think I dreamed it, eh?"

"Well—" I ventured, mildly.

"Oh yes; well! well!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson, in high dudgeon. "Well, I suppose I did not talk to the mosquito; and well, I suppose I didn't get the malaria; and well, I suppose I dreamed this face. WELL!" and Mr. Thompson bolted out of the room, slamming the door hard behind him.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

I wish to make a full acknowledgement of receipts for Monroe chapel up to date: Ladies' Miss. Society of Newtonville, Massachusetts, $17; Miss Josephine Bullard, $2; Mrs. Ernst, $1; Minnie and sister, $1.90; Mrs. Edward Savage, $1; Cito Savino, 50 cents; Ella and El Gulnic, $1; M. Farlin, $1; Mrs. Dana Jones, $3; through Postmistress, $5—$23. Previously acknowledged, $29.90. Total, $63.90.

I have to thank the many young readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for their generous interest in this matter, and the mothers and fathers who have assisted them to give substantial expression to that interest; also to the many people of many denominations who, knowing and recognizing a noble cause, have put aside sect to feel as one. I am sure that the good Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians who have their own flourishing places of worship in Monroe will feel proud of their brethren in this northern land who have so unselfishly helped to give a church service to a small but earnest band of God's people. I have, through the generosity of Mr. Lamb, been able to buy at his New York house a beautiful service for communion, and it is to be engraved as a free-will offering from Fairfax, Payne, and presented, I hope, on Easter Sunday. With many thanks, I am sincerely yours,
S. M. CLYDE, CHAIR.

MADONNA, NEW MEXICO.

I was born in Pennsylvania, April 1876. My cousin Paul, who lives in New York, sent me a year's subscription to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. He asked me to write to you. I never seem to know my papa and mamma teach me. I have lived in this wild mountain country for five years. I wonder how much the boys and girls know about this bright, beautiful part of our Uncle Sam's big farm. We live in the Magdalena Mountains, and the high peaks look like frosted cakes six months of the year. One mountain has a picture of a very handsome lady, and is named Lady Magdalena; another looks like a gigantic elephant, and is called Elephant. The mountains are covered with evergreen trees, and contain large deposits of silver, gold, and lead. When we first came to this place I was once playing near a large stone pile with my little dog, Binky. A large rattlesnake was lying near by, and as I had never seen a snake before, I went up to it. The snake jumped at me, and I suppose would have bitten me had not Binky caught it and jerked it away. A man working near by came and killed it. Since then

I do not play with snakes. The Indians—the civilized ones, not the savage Apaches—come to our place very often to see fruit and pottery. They laugh when they look at us blue-eyed children. I have two brothers and three sisters; we call the baby Rosebud, and she is the sweetest little flower in the mountains. In summer the mountains are covered with wild flowers of all kinds. My grand-papa taught me the names of many. There are about forty different kinds of cactus, and the flowers are very fine. The beautiful yucca grows everywhere; there are also scarlet lily, Phlox drummondii, honey-suckle, and morning-glory, and many other small flowers literally carpet the ground. Our house stands in the middle of an evergreen grove. A great deal of medicine grows on these trees. Last summer I went with papa and grand-papa to see the ruins of an old Indian pueblo not far from our place; and I was inhabited by a race of people long before Columbus discovered America. This is called a new country, but I think it must be very old, don't you? The Rio Grande Valley is a rich farm and garden country, but we have no gardens in the mountains. Papa says the nights are too cold. But there are great herds of cattle, sheep, and goats here, and the owners of all pets, and I drive. We have a pretty little cow named Daisy and a white calf named Lily. Two goats named Spot and one doggie Tom, and a lot of fine chickens. My own dear dog, Dixie is dead; he was a water spaniel. We have no school here, but our grand-papa has many beautiful books, papers, and pictures, and we have learned to read and enjoy them so much.

Do you allow us to write to you often? and would you like to have me tell you more about this beautiful, sunny, far-away country?
JOSEPH M. B.

Write again, and if there is room I shall be glad to insert your letter.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

This is the story an old clock told me as it stood in my father's dining-room and slowly ticked the minutes away:

"I was made in 1736, at Salem, England. My maker was a short, fat, merry old man, who, when I was finished, put his hands on his sides and looked at me with pride. He said he was carefully packed in a large box, my brass face eagerly looking at all that went on. I was taken in a wagon to a large vessel that was lying in her port on the Thames. After a month's voyage we arrived at New York, and I saw many people looking at me through the shafts. I found out afterward that they were Dutch. New York was then a Dutch city. I was placed on a wagon and driven for many days along roads now too good. We came at last to Philadelphia, where I was taken out of my last voyage and set right in the corner of a neat little store kept by a Quaker. About a week after my arrival, a gentleman and his little wife came into the store, looking for a tall clock. They were in preference to three others, and I was at once sent home and set up in the cosy sitting-room, where I reigned for ten years undisturbed. One day my master came hurrying into the room with a newspaper and a very excited face. "Mary," he said, "Well, William," said my mistress, "why, what is the matter? You look as if these shall know all." Then he sat down and read to her the account of the "Boston Tea Party," and the rest of that story you know at Newport, New York. I had a very great liking for the American people, and fully sympathized with them in their love of liberty. My life went quietly on after this for about fifteen years, when I was taken to America free. One day I heard crying and sobbing, and heard, to my sorrow, that my master was dead. My mistress lived only about six months after his death. I went to a young lady, friend of my late owner's, who was born in America, and I lived with her for thirty-five years. Her children regarded me with curiosity and interest, but I never was much loved by the youngest, who had me only ten years, when she died, leaving me upon the mercy of the "wide, wide world." I fell into the hands of an entire stranger, who with a Scotch Presbyterian wife and a large family of children. He much admired my fine brass works. His children liked to see my twisted hands go round; they were liked to open the door of the largest of my twelve iron wind-dials. I lived here for twenty years. At last my master died, leaving me to the youngest son. He grew tired of me in a year, and about fifteen years after my purchase my owners went abroad, and sold me to a worthy Philadelphia man. He lived just out of the city, and had a pleasant home with a nice old house-keeper. I was much admired by his friends, and he grew very proud of me. I lived with him for fourteen years, when a young man, who had been a partner in my late owner's business, came to my partner in life. I made the third in his family. For four years I graced his parlor, and then he sold me at auction. The man who bought me was a young lawyer, and I am very happy to be with you. I hope I shall continue in the family for years.

This is the story the old clock told me.

BESSIE B.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I live on Washington street, and the State is half a mile from Capitol only a few blocks distant. It will be a beautiful Capitol, and will cost $1,000,000. The architect came from Chicago, although we have some very good architects and some of the finest residences and beautiful churches. I went to a Sabbath school picnic last year at Stone Mountain. It is a huge peak of solid rock, three thousand feet in height, and six or seven miles in circumference; it is about fourteen miles from the city. Atlanta has fifty thousand inhabitants.

EMMA LOT, G.

The following letters from Detroit were enclosed in a very pleasant one from the teacher of the little writers. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is used in her school as a reader, and these letters were prepared as a composition exercise:

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

I live in a very pleasant part of this city, which used to be called Springwells, but it has lately been annexed to Detroit. I live on Indian Avenue, in a two-story frame house. In the summer time, when it is so warm in the centre of the city, it is very pleasant where I live, because there are so many trees around. Just from behind the house there are two large elm-trees, which reach above it, and in different parts of the yard there are peach, pear, apple, maple, and hickory-wood trees. And in the corner of the yard there is a tree called the "devil's club," which I will describe.

This tree grows to a considerable height, and one of its branches, of which there are very few, grows almost straight. The tree is covered with thorns, some of which are almost a quarter of an inch in length. In the spring, small, limber leaves, like the stem, are leafed out, and they grow out. On these are clusters of queer blossoms, which change into little purple berries, which soon fall. Then there are still smaller branches, which are called "devil's club" leaves. In the fall the leaves turn yellow, and when they fall the small branches fall also. Our family has a very large tree of this kind, which I call the "devil's club," which I will describe. We have chickens, cats, pigeons, rabbits, a dog, a horse, and a cow.
VIRGINIA S.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

I have read many pleasant stories and letters from your paper. I live in the western part of the city, near the river, and the place is called the bank of a river of the same name; it is called the "City of the Straits."

I am in the E Eighth class. I study arithmetic, grammar, geography, and history, and spelling. The name of our school is the Webster. The A Eighth class is the highest in it.

I have three sisters and one brother. Rhode Island; he went there last June. He likes it very well. It is said to be one of the best places on the whole globe to go to Europe at any time. If he goes, he will go on the Tandolin, as he likes.

We have very pleasant times here. I may write again.
GEORGE H.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.

I am a little girl ten years old. I have four sisters. Last summer we gathered up nuts, and sold them, and got Harper's Young People for ourselves. We like it very much. Mamma says she is glad we received it. I like the story of "Jo's Opportunity" very much. I live five miles from town. We live on a large farm, and have a great many horses, sheep, and lambs, and we have a great many colts. I have a fine colt, and the colt kicked him in the mouth. The cat's name is Muff, because she is so white, and the names of the birds are Brownie, Muff, and Goldy.

My school is out now, and I am very sorry. We had a big dinner over at the school, and all of us had a splendid time. Then we had a party at our house that night.

I am a little girl nine years old, and I go to school. I study reading, spelling, geography, arithmetic, language, writing, and music. My sister and I have taken a party for our friends on Thursday, because it is the day on which we receive the paper. I have four pets—three mice and one cat. The cat's name is Muff, because she is so white, and the names of the birds are Brownie, Muff, and Goldy.

I am twelve years old, and I enjoy reading your lovely stories. I tried your breakfast rolls, and they were splendid. I have two brothers and two sisters. I am next to my oldest, my brother is Dean. I think "Jo's Opportunity" is a splendid story. I take music lessons from a cousin.

My brother Arthur once had a letter published, but I never have, and would I ever be able to have this one. I have for pets a bird and a dog. I have two brothers and a sister. I have a great many friends here. The four I play with the most are Emma M., Maud B., Laura E., and my brother H. Emma and Maud are my cousins, and we have very nice times, as we each have a tricycle. I play with dolls a good deal. My mother is Flora Frangeline W. My father is John H., and out of school for over a month, but hope to commence again next term.

I will describe our Ice Palace. It has melted some, but it is lovely. There are toboggan slides on the palace grounds, also a skating rink, dog sledges, and Indian tents. I love to skate, and I am the president. We have a bird, a cat, two kittens, and a dog for pets. Sister Mildred says I look like a story-book cat. I love to read, and peace-fully together, for Carlo and Kitty do not like each other. My brother Frank, who is fifteen, buys Harper's Young People for each of us, and at the store. I have three brothers, and I did have two sisters, but our dear Florence died. I have a sweet, pretty room. It has a bay window, where my work stand and my booker. There is also a grate and a mantel, with little cupboard and cornices; also a divan and writing desk, on which stands a jar of pussy-willows. On Christmas, I received a watch, a chain, and a tiny gold harp from my dear papa. Was it not nice? I also received a fan, five books, two gold pins, a French doll, a gold watch, a bag, a game, a picture, and some other things. Six friends, Alice, Luella, Cassy, Elizabeth, Grace, and Pansy, and myself have a favor to ask of you. We would all like to join the Little House keepers, and form a club. May we do so?

Certainly you may.

THE LITTLE SHOESTRING-SELLER.
Once in the cold and pitiless streets wandered a tiny clad little girl, selling shoestrings. She had never known a home, and had a worthless and dissipated father, who would not allow her to pass a certain street. On this street lived a man who once had a little girl, but the child had been stolen from her when she was but three months old, and this lady was very kind to Mary, a little shoestring-seller, and more than once had she offered to adopt her, but Mary's father would not consent to it.

It happened that one day little Mary, tired, and afraid to go home because she had not sold any shoestrings, wandered into this street, not thinking what she was doing, because of hunger and cold, and sat down to rest. Her father, who was fast growing dark, and little Mary fell asleep. She dreamed she was in a land that is hard to describe. She saw angels, and she saw a king, and her she awoke, and found herself covered with what she thought was snow. But when she began to walk, she found it was a kind of soft, white stuff. "Are you awake, darling?" and then she saw she was in a little bed. And the kind lady who had wanted to adopt her, Mary's mother, was there. And after Mary was well enough, she learned that she had been found on her own mother's doorstep by her father, and brought in nearly frozen to death, robbed property, and put to death.

After this she knew a mother's love and father's care, and whenever she saw a little beggar she was reminded of herself, who many a night in her younger days had no comfortable home to go to, and she would always give a few pennies and a kind, cheering smile.

Here is a very nice receipt for chocolate caramels: Two cupsful of sugar, one of molasses, one of butter, one of cream, and one of Baker's chocolate. Batter your saucepan, and put in sugar, molasses, and milk; boil fifteen minutes. Add butter and flour, stirred to a cream, and boil five minutes longer; then add the chocolate, grated, and boil until quite thick. Butter tin flat pans, and pour in the mixture, half an inch thick, and mark it in squares before it gets hard in cooling.

I am ten years old. My birthday comes on the 10th of March. I have lessons at home. I have five little brothers and three big ones, and one sister. We are English people, but live in Virginia. I was born in New Brunswick, Canada. I am six years old. My name is KATHLEEN MCM.

I am a New Orleans boy, but am now living in this beautiful Northwest. I have several cousins. We have fine times together, and all drifts have enjoyed our sleds and the great drifts of snow of this past winter. With our caps and mufflers, we run to school the usual way, with our feet. My cousin Albert and I belong to the choristers of the Holy Trinity Church, but like best to sing the Sabbath-school songs, especially the Christmas carols. We all read the Youth's Companion and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

We are two girls named Edith and Grace. We are both eleven years old, and go to the same school. The only pet Grace has is a little brother, named Arthur, but Edith has a dog and a horse. Sometimes we go to ride together, and have real nice times. As this is the first letter that either of us has ever written to the Post-office, we want to send you our thanks for it in print, and the rest of our families would be surprised, for they do not know that we have written it. Lovingly yours, GRACE E. B. and EDITH M. M.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I think your letters from children are very nice. My mamma reads them to me, so this week I thought I would send you a few lines. My uncles goes to Florida every winter, and last year brought a young alligator with him. He called him Julius Caesar. This winter he brought one to my papa. He is called Papa Inondas. He does not eat anything, but lies all day in a box wrapped in a woollen cloth, except when he takes a mud-bath in a mud-pool. His breath are quite small, but he bites savagely at a lead-pencil. My brother takes the paper this year, and I like to look at the pictures; they are so cunning!

HELEN M. (aged six).

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am so delighted with HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and like it so much. I write to tell you so. I am a boy who will be six years old on my next birthday, and I have two pets, an Isle of Skye terrier, and a Persian kitten. Many steamers leave this place for Canada, and my papa has proposed that we take a trip some day to see New York. I want to see Canada, where I have some cousins. If you think this letter good enough for the Post-office, I shall be so glad to hear from you about the part of England. And now, dear Postmistress, accept my kind love, and believe me your affectionate little friend, HARVEY E. M.

I am twelve years old, and we live out in the country, sixteen miles from New York. Papa goes to the city every day. I have been down to the city many times, and I like to see New York. This place is very pretty in winter as well as in summer. We think I too would like to see the Postmistress's picture in the Post-office. I have a pretty kitten which I call Ben, and a gray rabbit called Silver, which is very tame. Mamma teaches me at home, but next year I shall go to school.

I have no brothers nor sisters. I wish you would print this letter, for it will be a surprise to mamma and papa. I had a canary-bird, but he died. He was such a cute little fellow! I think it was a pity; don't you? I am afraid this letter will be too long to find a place in the Post-office Box. If I do not stop pretty soon. So good-by.

PUZZLES FROM PARIS.

THIS time we will try an exercise that is a little more difficult than those we have already given. Our puzzle-solvers have by this time, no doubt, discovered that the French, like the English, when they want a new word to explain something, are very apt to borrow it from the Greek or the Latin language. Now our new puzzles are called "logogriphs," and this word comes from logos, the Greek for "word," and griphos, the Greek for "net." That is it exactly. Each of these logogriphs is answered by a word which, like a net, contains others, that may be found by leaving out or adding a letter or so, or by changing the place of one. By way of helping our puzzlers we would say that the word piéd, which they would usually translate as "foot," is used by our French puzzle-makers as an equivalent for "letter."

SILENT PETE; OR, THE STOWAWAYS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"TORY TYLER," "MR. STEVEN'S BROTHER," "RAISES THE PEACE," ETC.

CHAPTER II. "STOWING AWAY."

FELIX was very busy when Pete and Jerry called at the fruit stand to tell him of their intended departure. He had just made a side of five oranges, and the question of disposing of ten cents' worth of apples, and he depended upon his willingness to give four cents for each apple for that amount of money.

After his two visitors had gone, Felix went for an opportunity to speak with him privately. Felix, for the sake of the sale by giving his customer two five-cent oranges and two that looked rather the worse for having reposed so long on the stand.

"Well, fellows, what's up now," he said at last.

"We're going to-morrow, Felix," said Jerry, in a low whisper.

"What?"—and the fruit-merchant was attentive now—"you don't mean to say that you've got it fixed already?"

"I'll tell you the whole story; but you musn't even think about it when anybody's round, 'cause if the fellow what's helping us should know I'd let on that he was doing anything, it would be good by for us."

Then Jerry told Felix of his interview with the cook of the good brig Clio, concluding his story by saying, as he moved away from Pete to be certain that the little musician could not overhear him:

"I'll allow that the Captain will kick up awful rough when he finds that we're on board; but I'll show myself first, and take what he's got to give before he sees Pete."

"I wouldn't do it," whispered Felix, warningly. "Don't you remember what a time Italian Joe had when he stowed away in that fruit schooner? You don't know nothing about the Captain of the brig, and you might get pretty near killed."

"I can't help it, Felix. I don't reckon that the Captain will be any too glad to see me; but I'd stand a good deal for the sake of getting poor little Pete where his friends are. But don't you let on to him that the Captain is likely to make it hot for me, 'cause I've just been having a lively time to get him to promise that he wouldn't go on deck when I did."

If Jerry had had the least doubt but that the one great hope in Pete's mind was to get to New York, where he might try to find his friends, that doubt would have been dispelled whenever he looked in the boy's face, which was radiant with joy. Never since his parents died had Pete appeared to be so happy, and Jerry was even in higher spirits than he, as he saw the wonderful change in his friend, all of which had been brought about by him.

"Look at him," Jerry whispered to Felix, when on the following day the two boys called at the fruit stand according to agreement; "he's so tickled that he don't hardly know what his name is, and I tell you, Felix, when I look at him, it seems like I'd have the nerve to stow away on twenty vessels."

Felix shook his head despondently. "I'm awful sorry you're going, Jerry; but I won't talk about it, 'cause I know it wouldn't do any good. Here's some oranges and things for you to eat while you're stowed away."

Felix gave his friend a large package of fruit, and then, after bidding both good-by, he said, with a mysterious wink at Jerry, "Be careful of yourself, now."

There could be no question but that he referred to Jerry's meeting with the Captain of the Clio; and his friend so understood it, for he returned the wink, nodded toward Pete, snapped his fingers, and shouted, as he and Pete started down Canal Street, "Good-by, old man; I'll see you again sometime."

Pete had Sweetness, his beloved violin, wrapped carefully in old newspapers; other than that, his personal effects were quite as limited as Jerry's. As they walked slowly down the street, and then picked their way along the levees, among the huge bales of cotton, bags of cottonseed, and barrels of sugar, past the steamers of all sizes and odd shapes, he was mentally saying good-by to everything he saw, and trying to hide the moisture that would come into his eyes.

"There she is! There's the brig!" Jerry cried, just as Pete had begun to fear that the vessel had sailed without them. "Now you can stay here, and I'll snoop round to find out if the cook is on deck."

Leaving the little musician crouching behind a bale of cotton, as if fearing that if he were seen his purpose would be suspected, Jerry darted from one pile of freight to another, until he was where he could command a good view of the brig. He was not long in making up his mind that it would be safe for them to advance, and he said, as he ran back to where he had left his friend, "Come on, Pete, and step out lively, for the only trouble we'll likely have is to get stowed away. I can't see anybody on deck but the cook, and he acts as if he was watching for us."

Pete did not need any urging, and the idlers on the levee saw two very small boys, each with a bundle, running at full speed toward the brig Clio, looking over their shoulders every now and then, much as if they feared that the entire police force of the city of New Orleans was at their heels.

"We've come," said Jerry, in a hoarse whisper, as he clambered up the side of the vessel.

The cook was standing near the capstan, and must have heard the information given, but he did not even look around.

"Shin up here, Pete," whispered Jerry. "That's the cook; but I suppose he don't speak 'cause he don't want to let on how glad he is that we've come."

Jerry did not lose any time. Dropping his bundle of fruit on deck, he clambered inboard; then, leaning over, he helped Pete up the somewhat difficult ascent; but yet the cook made no sign that he had either seen or heard them.

"Look here," said Jerry, as he went up to the man, almost fearing that he had repented of his promise, "we're going to New York with you, you know. Now I don't want to fuss about having a big state-room, or to make trouble about sending our breakfasts in to us, so if you'll show us a place where we can hide, we'll get below pretty quick."

"I suppose you know where the fore-peak is, don't you?" asked the man, persistently keeping his head turned as if to avoid seeing either of the boys.

"It's right in the bow of the vessel, ain't it?"

"Yes, and you'll find a place in the fore'stle where you can crawl through. If you'll take my advice, you'll get below mighty quick. All hands 'll be aboard pretty soon, for the tug will hook on to us before sunrise to-morrow morning."

"All right," replied Jerry. "You needn't check our baggage; if we want anything, we can ring the bell."

Then Pete's protector pushed him toward the dark, ill-smelling forecabin, and the two boys had hardly disappeared when the cook, coming near the companionway, called out, "Have you got anything to eat?"

"We've got enough for a couple of days," answered Jerry. "You see, we're kind o' taking this voyage for our health, and the doctor wouldn't like it if we should stuff ourselves too much."

"Have you got some matches?"

"We didn't bring any wax ones; but if you want a few of the common kind, I can give 'em to you."

"Then light one, or you'll be breaking your precious necks. Don't come up for twenty-four hours at least, and when you do come, look out for squalls."

Jerry would have made some reply if at that moment the cook had not closed the companionway suddenly, as if one of the officers of the vessel was in sight, and the boys stepped softly in order that they might not betray their whereabouts. After he had lighted a match, Jerry saw that one of the boards which divided the forecabin from the extreme bow of the vessel was loose, and, by the light of another match, soon saw the place where the captain of the galley proposed they should stow themselves away.

It was simply a dark hole, large enough for half a dozen boys to have hidden in, but so littered with ropes, boxes, and barrels as to make it a decidedly uncomfortable place in which to spend even an hour. To add to its discomforts, the odor of the bilge-water, combined with that of general mustiness, was so great as to be almost overpowering until the boys grew accustomed to it.

"I wouldn't wonder if they've got some rooms up at the St. Charles's Hotel that are nicer than this; but, you see, we shouldn't be on our way to New York if we was there; so we're better off here."

"I was afraid it would be a good deal worse than this," said Pete.

"Was you now, really?" asked Jerry, immensely relieved to know that his friend was not down-hearted. "Anyhow, I wish we'd brought a candle so's we could see the things around us. If we only had stuff enough to eat we needn't show ourselves to the Captain until after we got to New York."

"Haven't we enough?" asked Pete, quickly, for he was anticipating something terrible in the way of punishment when the Captain of the brig should see them.

"Well, I reckon there's what would last you on a voyage to Chiney; but I can't make three square meals out of a banana, so I'm afraid I should run kind o' short by to-morrow night. I'll light some more matches, and we'll put your fiddle where it won't get hurt. I suppose the vessel will rock some when we get out to sea, and we must fix up all we can now."

It was not an easy matter for Pete to decide where he would leave Sweetness. He wanted to hold it in his arms, to be certain that it would not be injured; but Jerry insisted that if a storm should arise—one such as he had heard of—it would be impossible to so guard the violin as to keep it from being broken. Pete finally placed his beloved instrument high up on a coil of rope, where Jerry was positive it would be safe, and crouched again in his corner with a sigh. If he could have spent the time playing—"making Sweetness talk," as he expressed it—the hours would not have seemed so long, nor the fore-peak so dark; but, of course, anything of that kind was out of the question.

"The only thing to do," said Jerry, cheerfully, as he seated himself in something near a comfortable position, and made an attack on the fruit, "is to get as much of a good time as we can. It can't take forever to go to New York; and no matter what kind of a captain runs on this vessel, it won't be so very long before we'll be there. The cook said the skipper was just like a Southdown lamb; but I don't seem to know what kind of a lamb that is."

"Suppose he should make us go on shore?"

"How can he when we get out to sea?"

"But we do go near Key West when we come out of the Gulf of Mexico, for I've heard the fellows say that the steamboats stop there."

"Crickety, I never thought of that!" exclaimed Jerry, rising quickly, and hitting his head with a resounding thump against the timbers above.

"Did you hurt yourself?" asked Pete, sympathetically.

"I wouldn't want to say I hadn't," replied Jerry, as he rubbed his head vigorously. "It's lucky I didn't get up a little harder, or I'd gone right through the deck, and then there would have been a row. You see, it kind o' startled me when I thought that we might have to go ashore before the voyage was ended."

"It would be worse than not having started at all," said Pete, in a low tone.

"Oh, no, it wouldn't," was the cheery reply. "We will be nearer New York, and if we can't walk, we can try this same dodge on some other vessel. But what's the use of talking about that? It'll be all right when I see the Captain, and then you can sit up on deck fiddling just as much as you want to. We're bound for New York, old man, and that's where we're going, so pitch into Felix's present, and then we'll go to sleep. We've got one night's lodging at any rate, and I go in for making the most of even that. It's kind o' lucky, after all, that we're poor, Pete."

"Why?"

"Cause, you see, fellows that have all the money they want can't feel good when they get such a place as this to sleep in. Here we are where it don't make any difference whether it rains or not, where the policemen ain't very likely to turn us out, and where we can sleep just as long as we want to."

When Pete awakened and heard the wash and swirl of the water against the bow of the brig, it was some moments before he could understand where he was; but when he did realize it, he shook his companion into wakefulness, as he shouted: "Oh, Jerry, we have started—really started for New York."

"Well, I reckon we have," said Master Hicks, as he leisurely raised himself to a sitting posture, taking good care not to hit his head again; "you didn't think we'd started for Chiney, did you?"

"Do you suppose we've got out to sea yet?"

"I reckon not. The tug is still towing us most likely. There ain't any trouble but what you'll know when we do get to sea, for this brig will be standing on her bow-sprit about half the time."

Pete would have been perfectly contented now to remain idly listening to the gurgling of the water, since it told that they were really on their journey; but Jerry was not as modest in his desires. First of all he insisted that they should have breakfast, and after the simple meal was finished, he explored as well as possible the "state-room," as he called it.

It was not an easy matter to grope around the confined space in the darkness, and his stock of matches was now so small that he did not think it prudent to use any simply for purposes of exploration, therefore it was some time before he had satisfied himself regarding the size of their hiding-place.

"It's large enough," he said at length, as he seated himself by Pete's side; "but it wouldn't do to try to squeeze more'n forty boys in here, 'cause there wouldn't be first-class quarters for 'em all. It'll be kind o' lively for us if the vessel pitches so much as to send these boxes and things rolling around, 'cause we wouldn't have much of a chance to dodge."

A noise from the fore-castle at that moment warned the stowaways that some of the crew were there, and Jerry lowered his voice to a whisper lest he should be overheard, and the voyage come suddenly to an end by their being sent back to New Orleans on the tug.

As the hours wore on matters were not quite as monotonous as during the earlier portion of the day. The vessel, which had been gliding through the water with apparently no more motion than if she had been at the dock, began to move about in a manner that puzzled Jerry greatly. First it would seem as if the brig was trying to stand upright on her rudder, and then the bow would go down so low that the boys would be thrown violently against the coils of rope, while the timbers creaked and groaned as if they were being wrenched apart by some giant hand.

"I tell you what it is, Pete," said Jerry, as he was thrown against his companion harder than usual, "it's lucky for us that this place is so small, or we'd be rolling around like marbles."

"What do you think is the matter?" asked Pete, who was beginning to grow alarmed.

"It must be a big storm like Italian Joe told about, only this is worse'n anything he ever saw, I'm certain."

As a matter of fact, the vessel was simply pitching on the waves of the Gulf, with the sun shining brightly, and not even the suspicion of a cloud in the sky. When the boys were the most alarmed the tug had cast off the towing hawsers, and the Clio heeled over to the breeze, as her sails were set, until Jerry believed there was great danger that she would turn completely over. Understanding, however, that Pete was even more frightened than himself, he said, with a feeble attempt at his usual careless manner:

"We've got to be shook up just about so much before we can get to New York, I suppose; but—gracious! what was that?"

The brig was plunging into the seas at what seemed a terrible rate of speed, and the exclamation was forced from Jerry's lips as she struck a wave with such a heavy blow that it seemed certain she must have run against a rock.

"Do you suppose she'll sink, Jerry?" Pete asked, in a trembling voice.

For the first time since he had known him, Jerry made no attempt to cheer his friend. Never before had the valiant Jerry felt so really sick and uncomfortable, and his only reply to Pete's question was a groan. It was not until after both the boys had spent a decidedly disagreeable hour, during which time they felt convinced that the vessel would be wrecked, and that they were dying, that Pete said, with a moan:

"I wish we had tried to go on the cars."

"If you'd said so before I'd rather bought a whole train than to be thrown 'round this way," replied Jerry, and then he relapsed into uncomfortable silence once more.

Another hour went by, and then Jerry said, in a tone of desperation, as he struggled to gain a foothold on the uneven floor of their hiding-place:

"I can't stand it any longer, Pete; I've got to go out on deck."

"You mustn't, Jerry! you mustn't! The Captain will just about kill you, I'm afraid," cried Pete, in an agony of apprehension, forgetting for the moment his own sufferings.

"I can't help it, Pete; I've got to go up, and just as soon as I can fix things I'll come back for you. It don't make any difference what he does to me, 'cause he can't make it any worse'n being here. I don't suppose he'll any more'n kill me, and I'll die, sure, if I stay here much longer."

Pete was too sick to make any very decided objection, and Jerry started for the deck, hardly caring, in his desperation, what the Captain might do or say.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S SHOW.

BY CHARLES BARNARD

FOR course he went to grammar-school every day in New York city, and his father was a policeman. These two facts about the boy are curious, because if the policeman had not gone to a particular place in town, and seen the strangest thing in the world, we might never have heard about the boy, the school-marm, and the carved owl. It happened in the most natural way possible. The officer went on duty at the station-house, and the Sergeant directed him to go to Cosmopolitan Hall. There he was to stay during the evening to see that the world behaved itself in a gentlemanly manner. He started out to find the hall, and wondered what could be going on—a circus, or a dog show, or something else. He had not heard a word about the affair before, and when he reached the place he was a truly astonished policeman. "Children's Industrial Exhibition," that was the sign at the door.

The moment he entered the brightly lighted hall he thought it was a church fair; then he didn't know what to think. There were, indeed, plenty of children in the place, and several hundred "grown-ups," but they were all so busy looking at the wonderful things to be seen that the room was as quiet as a picture-gallery. There was nothing for a dutiful policeman to do; so he began to look at the show, and the more he looked the more he thought about the boy and the carved owl at home. Everywhere in the hall were rows on rows of tables; everywhere were shelves, and all loaded and covered with the greatest variety of curious and beautiful things. There were pictures and drawings, dolls' dresses, toys, models of boats and machines of all kinds; furniture, statues of dogs and foxes, beautiful brass-work, and handsome things made in iron, embroideries, and—well, there didn't seem to be any end to the strange and curious objects exhibited. Seeing a pretty lady wearing a badge, he asked her what it really meant. Was it true that all these things were made by children?

CHILD'S FROCK.

CRANE.

It was true. This was a young folks' exhibition, the first large exhibition, representing work done by children in many different schools in a dozen different States, ever given in the country.

"And could any boy in New York bring his work to the exhibition to show what he could do? And the medals, too, could a New York boy get one?"

That was true also. Round and round the great room went the officer, thinking of the boy and the carved owl. If his boy had only known of this exhibition, he might have shown that beautiful carved owl. Why had not the school-marm told him about it? She must have known all about it, and she never told the scholars that they might take part in this boys' and girls' exhibition.

So far this story about the officer, the boy, the school marm, and the owl is true. It really happened; and perhaps there is more, but as the policeman went home, and never came back, nobody knew what happened next. The exhibition was open for a week, and if you had been there you would have seen the most curious sight in the world. When you enter the door, of course you buy a catalogue giving the name of every young child, young man, and young woman, from the youngest Kindergartener up to the young work man and woman of the trade schools and art societies, the name and age of every one who made anything for the exhibition. Think of it! According to the book, over seventy schools are represented here, and here is work of nearly four thousand young people and children who can make things with their hands.

Look at this model of a suspension-bridge—foundations, towers, cables, roadway, and all—made by the young master mechanics and engineers of the Granerney Park Tool-house.

And what is this?—A whole tableful of models. See for yourself. The pictures show some of them. A real working elevator or inclined railroad, copied from the real railroad over in Hoboken. Then here's a working crane, with blocks and tackle all complete, just as you can see it in any stone-quarry. Here's an odd thing for a boy to make. He must be a Frenchman, for he has made a model of a guillotine that has an unpleasant way of letting fall its sharp knife with a bang.

GUILLOTINE.

Here is something more sensible—a model loom, with the cloth in it, and all the yarns in place. Why, any fellow could learn the business of weaving from such a working model as this. Furniture too, made by Master Louis Wassell, aged thirteen. It is a bric-à-brac stand, and our young cabinet-maker made it all himself, fitted the drawers, and stained and varnished the whole complete. The model of a loom was made by Master Muehlenthal, and both of these boys are pupils in the Hebrew Technical Institute of New York. The miniature guillotine was made by David W. Benedict, and the inclined railroad by Everett L. Thompson, both boys attending the East One-hundred-and-fifteenth Street Public School, New York. There is also a music-stand, made by Fred A. Wood, aged fourteen.

We must not think all the things are made by boys. Look at the picture of a child's dress. How is that for young dress-makers less than ten years of age? Little Miss Augusta Stein and Katie Hebold are step-sisters, and both attend the sewing-school of the Wilson Mission in New York. Augusta cut and fitted it, and Katie did the sewing. Could you do that, my young lady? What do you think of such work as that? Isn't it better than to be able to conjugate Latin verbs, or give the names of the Kings of France?

The initial picture shows what Master Joseph Condon, of Pelham, can do in the way of wood-carving. It is no wonder he took the gold medal for such fine work. To picture it all would fill every page, and to tell of every one who did something for the exhibition would fill a book of a hundred pages. The tables and screens were like a museum. Sewing! There were wonderful embroideries and dress trimmings by girls in Germany; hundreds of garments cut and made by girls in the public schools of New Haven and Philadelphia. As for carpentry, it seemed as if the boys were all young masters of the art of making things. Here is the work of boys who can handle a file, and make rough cast iron look as beautiful as silver.

MUSIC PORTFOLIO.

These young folks can work, can make things both useful and beautiful, and the exhibition was to show how much a boy or girl can do if he or she is rightly trained. This exhibition is the first of the kind, but it is not by any means the last. More are to come. There will be others in New York, and perhaps in the very town where you live. What can you do? what can you show? Shall you be ready to try for a medal with a carved owl or something else just as beautiful? Harper's young people can use their hands as well as other folks' young people, and this curious Children's Industrial Exhibition is the beginning of a new kind of school that will be as delightful as play and as instructive as anything now in the school-books.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE.

A PUZZLED TIGER.
A STORY OF BRITISH INDIA.

BY DAVID KER.

TWO men sat under a clump of palm-trees on the bank of a small river in upper Bengal eating their tiffin (lunch) with the appetite of men who had been all morning in the open air. One of them, a tall, weather-tanned, black-mustached fellow, was evidently an English officer. His companion, who was a good deal smaller and slighter than himself, did not look much like either a fighter or a hunter; but the almost superstitious reverence paid him by the Hindoo servants showed that he must be a great man in some way.

In fact, there were few more famous scientists or more adventurous travellers than Professor Ameroyd, Fellow of the British Royal Geographical Society, President of the Calcutta Antiquarian Club, Honorary Member of the Russian Imperial Association of Scientific Research, with other titles too many to name. There was hardly a corner of the earth, however remote or dangerous, into which he had not thrust his little bald head and gold-rimmed spectacles; and people who saw him for the first time, after having heard of his exploits, were greatly startled to see, instead of the big bearded, sun-burned fellow whom they expected, a slender, pale-faced little man, who looked as if he would be knocked up or knocked down by the first mishap that befell him.

In the centre of an open space just behind the two picnickers stood a large looking-glass, which the Professor had just been using in one of his experiments; and at this the native attendants were looking and pointing excitedly, although keeping their distance from it all the while as carefully as if it had been a packet of dynamite.

"See those fellows!" laughed Major Hampton, as he finished his second plate of cold chicken. "I'll be bound they all take you for a magician of the very first class. Just now I overheard two of them having a discussion about what you could be trying to do. One would have it that you were trying to bring down fire from heaven, and the other was just as positive that you were at work to discover a buried treasure."

"So I am," chuckled the Professor, cutting himself a slice of bread, "but it's a treasure of knowledge, not of money. However, this can't be much fun for you, my dear Major; and it's too bad of me to keep you here all day doing nothing, just for my convenience. Couldn't you find a wild beast or two to amuse yourself with while I'm at work?"

"No such luck," replied Hampton, shaking his head. "This bit along the river here used to be a famous cover for the big game; but since they began to cut away the jungle you can't get a decent tiger here for love or money."

The words were scarcely uttered when, as if on purpose to give the lie to them, the native servants, who had been enjoying their long pipes in the cool shade of the trees that flanked the clearing, suddenly sprang up and fled in every direction with shrill screams of terror. Mingling with their outcries came a deep, hoarse roar, which the hardest sportsman never hears quite unmoved—the cry of a hungry tiger on the track of his prey.

"Up into that banyan-tree for your life, Ameroyd!" shouted Hampton, leaping to his feet, "for that fellow means business, and no mistake."

Up flew the Professor as nimbly as a monkey, and the next instant Major Hampton was beside him. But even in that moment of deadly peril the veteran sportsman had found time to catch up his double-barrelled rifle and ammunition-pouch.

Hitherto the flight of the Hindoos and the fearful sound that accompanied it had been the only signs of the terrible creature's presence. But the Major's keen eyes soon detected a stirring among the bushes, and then a great flat head and fiery eye gliding forth from them.

"Isn't he a splendid fellow?" whispered Hampton, as coolly as if he were looking at the beast through the bars of a cage in a menagerie. "He seems to be in want of a lesson, though, and I'm going to give him one."

But he had hardly loaded one barrel of his rifle when he suddenly broke into a fit of laughter so violent as almost to shake him off his perch. And well he might. The tiger was indeed about to get a lesson, but such a one as neither he nor his two enemies had foreseen in the least.

The tall mirror was still standing in the middle of the clearing, just as the coolies (native porters) had left it; and the tiger, coming out right in front of it, saw (as he thought) another tiger advancing against him open-mouthed. His very whiskers bristled with rage at this defiance, and with a savage growl he drew back for a decisive spring. But in doing so he moved beyond the line of reflection, and instantly the other tiger disappeared as if he had never been.

This was evidently something quite new to the "royal Bengal." He stopped short, stared blankly around him, drooped his tail, and altogether looked so utterly bewildered and foolish that the two watchers almost burst their sides with laughing at him.

"Well," gasped the Major, "if this isn't the best fun I've seen since I came out, my name's not Dick Hampton."

Meanwhile the tiger seemed to have made up his mind that the puzzle lay in the mysterious looking-glass, and that it was his duty to examine it more closely. He crept cautiously toward it, and of course the other tiger reappeared at once. Now for it! With one tremendous bound he was close upon his enemy; but the shock of his leap overturned the mirror, and the phantom tiger vanished once more.

This second disappearance was quite too much for the nerves of the "jungle king." With a low whine of dismay he turned sharp round, and was about to make off, when Major Hampton, who had no notion of losing his game so easily, levelled his rifle and fired. The sting of the bullet in his flank changed the tiger's fear to fury, and with a roar like thunder it darted toward the tree whence the shot had come; but instantly the second barrel sent its charge home, and the monster rolled over into the jungle grass, a harmless heap of black and yellow fur.

A SISTER'S SACRIFICE.

BY MAY HUSTWAYTE (AGED FIFTEEN YEARS).

"I SAY, Mabel, if you had any feeling for a fellow you would put away your book and listen to me. What ever is the use of sisters unless they are always ready to wait on their brothers, and especially on the only holiday we get in the week—so, there!"

Having delivered himself of this speech, Leonard threw himself on the sofa with a very discontented expression on his face, and began watching some flies buzzing round and round on the ceiling.

Their father, Colonel Doughty, was an officer in a regiment which had been for many years stationed in India. Leonard had a dim remembrance of his mother, but she had unfortunately died when Mabel was only four years old. When Leonard was about ten and Mabel eight, their father thought they ought to be sent away from the hot climate of India. So he made arrangements with his only sister (who lived in the south of England) for them to stay with her until he retired from the army. On the ship that was to take them to England there was a sorrowful parting between the father and his children. "Leonard, my boy," said Colonel Doughty, "there will be many temptations in a large school; but remember, whatever troubles you get into, speak the truth, although you may be punished for it. Mind how you choose your companions; and, lastly, take care of little Mabel, and often talk to her about her mother. And you, little one," he said, turning to Mabel, "help auntie, and always be a good girl, that you may grow up like your mother; and if either of you goes wrong you must help each other."

There was no time for any further words, as the bell rang for all friends to leave the vessel. "Good-by, my children, and remember," were the last words they heard. Their father was gone, the ship was moving, and for the first time in their lives they felt lonely.

After a calm voyage the two children landed at Portsmouth, where they were met by Mr. and Mrs. Saunders, their uncle and aunt. There was a happy greeting and many questions asked on either side. The children were glad when they reached their new home, for they were very tired after their long journey. Mrs. Saunders was kind and gentle with them, so that they soon grew to love their new home.

Mabel and Leonard had been living with their uncle and aunt about five years when our story begins. Leonard still went to the grammar school, and Mab had a governess in the house.

"I say, Mab," said Leonard, who had grown tired of watching the flies on the ceiling, "do come; you have read quite enough."

"All right; I'm coming, Len, but let me finish this chapter first."

"Now that always is the way with girls," began Master Leonard, as if he had experienced it.

This had the desired effect, for much as Mabel loved her books, she could not bear to be like other girls, as Len was always telling her she was.

"Well, I am ready, and you said last night, Len, you had something to tell me."

"Oh, bother!" returned her brother. "Well, if you won't go and tell Aunt Nelly, I will tell you, because you always help, Mab." And the boy's eyes filled with tears as he thought of his father and the last words he had heard from him.

"I say, Mab, have you any pocket-money?—because I am in a scrape again."

"Oh, Len, and you promised auntie you would keep straight! I have only three shillings left; I spent all the rest for a present for uncle's birthday. But what scrape are you in?"

"Oh, well, it's just this," began Leonard: "You know Barker wanted me to join that supper of theirs; well, it was out of bounds, and the Doctor has threatened to expel any day-scholar found with a boarder outside the school gates, but Barker said I could not withdraw my word, as I had promised on my honor; so I went last night, and Barker told me this morning if the affair was to be kept quiet we should have to bribe the man at the lodge not to tell; and, besides all that, Barker wants me to return the money he lent me, and with the interest it has amounted to four pounds."

After a short silence Mabel promised to help Leonard if he would break off with Barker.

"Now, Len, don't forget, because if papa were to come home and find you in disgrace, it would grieve him so. For you know in his last letter he did say something about coming to England."

"All right, Queen Mab!" said Leonard, gayly.

Mabel soon escaped to her own room to think it over. How could she get the money for Leonard? It must be got somehow. She counted over all her belongings, and then went to turn her drawers out. She could not part with her watch—that would be missed; and she could not part with her mother's ring, for though Mabel had no remembrance of her mother, Leonard had told her how good and gentle she was, so that she revered the smallest thing that had belonged to her. The only thing left was the gold brooch her father had sent for her last birthday, and what was the brooch when compared to Leonard's disgrace?

At last tea-time came. When Mabel came into the room, her aunt noticed her pale face, but made no remark. They had an unusually silent tea. Her uncle was engaged in reading, and her aunt was busy with her own thoughts. Leonard was absent, but he returned just as they were finishing. He caught sight of Mabel's pale face directly, and shouted out, "Hallo, Mab! what's up? You're like a sheet!"

At the sound of voices Mr. Saunders looked up. "We must not have our queen ill, and especially when I hear whispers of a long-hoped-for meeting, eh?" he said, looking at his niece.

"I am only tired, uncle, and should like to go to bed."

A few minutes after Mab had left the room her brother started up, and rushing upstairs, knocked at Mabel's door.

"Come in," said a little voice. Len was by her side in a minute.

"I say, Mab, don't bother about me if you can't get the money. I shall have finished with Barker when this money is paid."

"But, Len, why are you friends with him?"

"You see, Mab, it is rather hard for a fellow when once he gets wrong. But never mind; I'll turn over a new leaf. Good-night, Queen Mab; don't think any more about it."

About eight o'clock Mabel awoke, and dressed herself, for she meant to perform her errand to-night. Holding the brooch safely in her hand, she opened the door softly, and crept down-stairs as far as the school-room, where she turned in, because she felt sure of being able to get out of the big French window, which was seldom fastened. Once outside, Mabel flew down the road, and never stopped till she had nearly reached the town. She had never thought of the consequences if her errand were discovered; her only thought was to get money, and thus save her brother from public disgrace. A church clock was striking nine as she entered the town. Darkness was coming on, the shops were closing, and the little eyes in the sky were shining brightly. But Mab saw none of these. She looked wildly for a jeweller's shop. Should she try that grocer's over the way? The woman at the counter looked kind. She crossed the road and entered the shop. The woman looked kindly at her, but when she saw what her errand was likely to be (for Mabel had tremblingly begun her request), she gruffly ordered her off, as she was not used to such dealings.

The poor child left the shop with a heavy heart, and looking around, she saw a boy putting up the shutters of a shop on the opposite side. Mabel was deaf to everything but her own thoughts, and as she sprang across the road, did not hear a carriage come rattling along the streets, nor did she hear a shout from the driver, but the people standing by saw a little figure dart across the road, and heard a scream, as the carriage passed over something, and then continued on its rapid course, leaving a motionless figure lying on the road behind.

People poured out of the houses and shops near, and soon a large crowd had gathered; but only one among all those people recognized the pale little face. A kind-looking woman gruffly ordered them to make way for her, as she knew something about the child. She attempted to lift her up, but Mabel groaned so piteously that the woman, turning to a man standing near, said:

"Here, Tom, carry the poor lamb to my house. And you, Bill, run for the nearest doctor."

Shortly after Mabel's accident a carriage stopped before Mr. Saunders's house, and a gentleman sprang out, and rang the bell. The door was hardly opened before he hurried into the house, greatly surprising the servant.

“I WAS NOT IN TIME, LEN. I AM SO SORRY.”

who stood staring at the strange gentleman. Colonel Doughty (for it was no other than Leonard's and Mabel's father) made his way to a room where he heard voices, and opening the door, discovered Mrs. Saunders sitting by the fire, and Leonard at her feet. The boy sprang forward, exclaiming:

“It is my father! I know it is!”

“You are right, my boy, but you have altered so, I should hardly have known you.”

After giving his father two or three joyous and bear-like hugs, Leonard rushed upstairs to fetch his sister, when, to his astonishment, he only saw an empty bed. The news soon spread. The house and grounds were searched, but there was no trace of the missing one. Colonel Doughty was calm through the search, but Leonard was nearly wild. There was no rest that night.

Toward morning a shabby-looking man came to the door and asked for Mrs. Saunders. He gave her a handkerchief, which Mrs. Saunders recognized as her niece's. The man was invited in, and soon told his story. A child had been run over, who had been recognized as Mrs. Saunders's niece; she was now at Brown's, the grocer's, in the town. The man offered to be their guide, if they wished.

When they reached the shop door, a woman stood there as if expecting them. She led them into the house, but thought none of them had better see the child until they had seen the doctor. Soon after the doctor came from her room with a very grave face. He turned to the Colonel, and said:

“I suppose you are her father. I will tell you the truth at once. There is no hope.”

To see the look of pain and misery on the father's face touched the kind-hearted doctor.

“There is a physician coming down from London this afternoon,” he said; “but do not raise your hopes.”

As they entered the room they saw a little figure lying on the bed, scarcely resembling the bright-looking Mabel of yesterday. It was touching to see the silent meeting between father and child. Nothing could persuade him to leave Mabel until he had seen the London physician. But the great doctor would not deceive the father, for he knew that even if the child recovered she would always be a cripple.

The day wore away, and toward evening Mabel unclosed her eyes and asked for Len. When he came near her she opened her hand and held out a little parcel. “I was not in time, Len. I am so sorry!” And then her eyes closed.

The doctors returned in the evening, but there was no hope. She might die that night. All gathered around her bed, Len knelt by the side; Colonel Doughty stood by with bowed head.

Suddenly a sweet, quiet voice was heard through the room. “Uncle, don't blame Len; he told me not to bother about him. Good night, aunty and uncle. Oh, Len, listen to the angels' music. Isn't it lovely? I am so tired! Kiss me, Len, and tell papa, when he comes from India, I tried to be good. I will take your love to mother; and please, Len, break off with Barker. Mother, I am com—” And her eyes closed, and all knew that their little queen was dead.

The days that followed were full of misery for all, especially for her father; but he was even thankful to have been in time to see his child die. All missed her light step through the house, but no one so much as Leonard. Years after, when he was grown up and felt tempted to do anything wrong, a picture of his little sister lying on her death-bed floated before his eyes, and he seemed to hear her saying, “Please, Len, break off with Barker.”

"OTHELLO AND DESDEMONA."—SEE PAGE 388

LAMMEN FORT, 1574.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

OVER the billows rushing free,
Over the stormy, wind-swept sea,
On to the gates of Leyden town,
Admiral Boisot's fleet came down,
Hope to the city whence hope had fled,
Bread for the famishing, life from the dead.

All night long in Leyden streets
A whisper was passing: "The foe retreats,
Haughty and bitter and strong and bold,
And brave in the might of their shining gold,
What though we've stood like a motionless rock,
With the guns on Lammen our plight to mock?
Not till the ocean for Leyden fought
Was the hour of our deliverance wrought."

A shivering whisper on Leyden streets:
"The fort is empty, the foe retreats."
But men and women, all spent with grief,
Were slow to believe in the dear relief,
Till who but a boy, with fearless eyes,
Blue as heaven, should cheerily rise,
"Here or yonder, I'll go and see,"
Cried the lad to the people. "Trust to me."
And presently, sweet as the tints of dawn,
Pearly and pink, stole softly on,
And the starving babes, and the gray, gaunt men,
And the white-faced women crowded. Then
Clear as a statue against the sky,
On the topmost tower, where he'd mounted high,
Every one saw him, the laddie bold,
His cap torn off from his hair of gold,
And he waved it madly across the sea,
And his shout rang out, "We are free, oh, free!"

You want me to tell you the hero's name?
'Tis lost from the scroll of heedless Fame.
Only, forever, on history's page,
To be read by the children from age to age,
This legend stands: "A lonely boy,
Waving his cap in excess of joy,
Climbed to the top of Lammen tower,
Beheld the foe in the morning hour
Creeping stealthily, beaten, away
As the bells rang in the glad new day—
Ringing, swinging, in spire and steeple,
Singing the bliss of a happy people
When the bread of God came over the sea,
And Leyden the brave was free, was free."

SOMETHING ABOUT CHICKENS.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

WHEN the writer was eight years old he spent all his savings on a little white bantam hen. It was a very pretty chicken, but it did not prove to be a very profitable one, for as he was taking it home, it escaped from his hands, and got into a field of standing wheat, and he saw that bantam no more. Bantams, indeed, are not a profitable breed. They are nice as pets, but if you keep chickens only as pets, you must not expect many eggs. If you keep them for profit, you will soon come to like those hens best which lay the most eggs.

As a rule, large fowls are better than small ones. The handsome Dorking lays a good many eggs, and may be counted on to raise at least one brood of chickens in a year. Besides, it is the most valuable of fowls when it is killed and plucked. Leghorns are a very useful breed. They are good layers, and are easily kept. Unlike the Dorkings, they are satisfied with a small space in which to roam, if more is not to be had. They are, perhaps, better as a "stand-by" than any other kind.

If you want something a little more "fancy" and yet profitable, get a few black Hamburgs. They are very handsome, are generous layers, and are good for the table. Neither these nor the Leghorns, however, are sitters, so if you want to raise chickens, you should keep two or three large hens of a common kind that have the reputation of being good sitters. Then, as a hen cannot distinguish between her own and other eggs, you may take away her own eggs, and set her upon those of your fancy stock. A good authority says: "If you want layers, buy your chickens from a man who always seems to have eggs in the winter. The chances are you will then buy the right sort."

Before you buy your fowls, however, you must prepare a place to keep them in. You will require a shed from twenty to thirty feet long, and six feet wide. This is the "run." If it can back against a wall, so much the better. If not, a close wooden wall must be built for the back. The front and one end should be enclosed, either with a fence made with narrow upright slats about two inches apart, or with wire netting, which is better. At one end of the run should be the house. This need not be more than six feet square, and it should be built so as to keep out wind and rain.

The main thing about the house is that it should be kept clean. The floor should be laid smooth and hard with concrete composed of lime, sand, and gravel; and then, on top of this, a layer of lime and sand, without gravel. Such a floor, if carefully laid, will be easily kept clean, and will last for years. Inside the house, about eighteen inches above the floor, make a broad shelf against the rear wall. A few inches higher up fasten a stout bar running from end to end of the house along the middle of the shelf. This is the roost. Under the shelf you may place bricks against the wall to form nests. The shelf over which the chickens roost should be cleaned every day with a scraper (a short-handled hoe), and then sprinkled with clean sand. The floor of the house and of the run should also be swept every day, and every week or so the latter should be dug up a little and raked over.

Most people who live outside of large cities think they know all that is worth knowing about feeding chickens, and they generally say, Why, give them as much corn as they can eat. This is all wrong. Corn is not good except for fattening chickens for market. If you want eggs, give your chickens very little corn, and never give them as much as they can eat of anything. They would be sure to eat too much, and then they would become fat and lay no eggs. The best kinds of grain to feed chickens are wheat, barley, white oats, and buckwheat. Chickens are fond of variety, so it is a good thing to give them these in turn; say a week of each. Then they like a little meat, and a little does them good. The meat scraps of a household will be enough for as many chickens as you are likely to keep. Other scraps, such as potato peelings and other outside leaves and leavings of cabbage and other vegetables, should be chopped and boiled until soft, and they may be given alone or mixed with the "middlings" or "sharpers" of flour, which is the coarser kind of flour produced in the grinding. Bran is not good unless mixed with something stronger, such as barley meal or oatmeal. Mixed food of this kind ought to be only just wet enough to be lumpy and not like porridge.

When your chickens will not take the trouble to run for more food, and to fly up for it as you hold it up to throw it, you may be sure they have had as much as is good for them. If you threw more, they would eat it, but every handful after they have enough means fewer eggs. They should have plenty of fresh water, and should not be allowed to drink water that has been standing in the sun until it has become warm.

There are two other things which chickens must have—plenty of dry dust or ashes to dust themselves in (dusting is their way of cleaning themselves), and some lime in some shape or other. Plaster or mortar from the walls of an old building is good, and so are crushed oyster-shells, for oyster-shells are made of lime. Egg-shells also are made of lime, and it is for egg-shells that the hens require it.

JO'S OPPORTUNITY.*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF "NAN," "ROLF HOUSE," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

IT was perhaps as well for Faith as for Jo that when the various plans for the latter's future began to be discussed, and everybody was ready with suggestions and advice, Bertie stepped in to point out to them all, in a quiet, forcible way, that Faith ought to be let alone to do precisely as she liked.

"Can't you see, Aunt Justina," he said, almost angrily, one day, when Miss Grace had been unusually energetic in her counsel, "Faith wants to have Jo quietly to herself just for these days."

"What days, Bertrand?" said his aunt.

But Bertie could say no more. If they all persisted in being blind, then he could do nothing, thought the boy, whose heart was full to the brim of loneliness and the ache of parting with his dearest cousin and companion.

The Dawsons had spent what Rachel called a "royal day" at North Street. Jo was already reinstated in her own little cheerful room upstairs, again in her hall window, and Rachel was delighted to sit there with her friend and hear about that other summer. The big apple-tree, beneath which she had first sat with Faith, seemed to have unexpectedly acquired a sacred character in Jo's eyes, and she hardly liked lingering there with Rachel as they strolled about the grounds; but the gardens and terraces were free to them that bright summer's day, and Jo already knew enough of what Faith designed for her to be able to talk it over with Rachel. For the present she was to remain at North Street.

"I'm to take care of her, Miss Faith says," Jo explained, "and perhaps do some lessons."

Rachel was greatly interested. Her mind, more imaginative than Jo's, already took in visions of a very luxurious and romantic future, wherein Jo would figure as Miss Emerson's heiress or adopted sister, or something equally like the heroine of the romances in the Burnham circulating library. But, happily for Jo, she contemplated no such unreality; happily too, for her, Faith had wiser and kinder plans.

Mr. Burton, Bertie, and she held a long council. The former told them every possible thing he knew of Jo's life in Burnham, and when alone with the kind-hearted friend, Faith spoke freely of her intentions. She wanted very soon to talk of them to Jo—to be able to plan with her for the time when she must be away. Such counsels, Faith felt instinctively, would never be forgotten.

"Let her alone in it," Mr. Burton said one day to the old doctor. "Don't you see how it has taken hold of her; and it's the best thing that could happen to Mary Brooke, or Jo, as you call her."

So Bertie's counsel was allowed to take effect. No one interfered with anything but words of sympathy; and Faith, lying on her sofa, not suffering very much, tranquil and quiet for the most part, made her plans, shaped her legacy, moulded the little corner-stone on which Jo's future could be built.

"My little opportunity!" she said one day to Jo, smiling, and drawing the girl's face down to kiss it—"that's what you are to me, Jo, my dear."

And she told her something of what she and Bertie had said that other evening.

"There are no many things for us to talk about, Jo," she added; "these days seem to go by so soon. I'll tell you what we'll do. Thursday will be the school-day for Burnham here, won't it? Well, then, do you know I think I'll get Mr. Burton to come up the day before, and we'll have a good talk before the company arrives, and settle everything. I want you to know just how I should like things to be done afterward."

Always thoughtful of others, Faith tried to make her companion used to the final parting; but Jo could not, dared not, face the thought. The look of dumb agony always in her face made Faith half dread to speak of it, yet she felt it best, most tender and most kind, and for her sake Jo tried to listen with patience and silence.

They all knew it now. The slight hold on life which Faith had tried so hard to make firmer seemed to be loosening every day, and the prayer which had been so often in her heart for patience and resignation rarely came now to her lips. He had answered it in His own way. She felt that she had faced her "opportunity," and not let it pass.

It was enough. The twenty years of life, the gayety, the joyousness, the work, the striving after her Master's final precepts, the humility and sweetness, the final crowning act of all, the giving up of life itself, were laid now at His feet, an offering worthy of Him who had placed her here; and those who were near her, day by day, seemed, as they said sometimes to each other, to see the light of all that had been lovely in that life shining in her eyes, or quivering in the smile with which she always greeted them. It was as though some great and unexpected gift had reached her; as though some unearthly yet joyous messenger had left the glory of His coming to light her and those around her while she staid.

Jo rarely left her. If care, if thought, if love could have kept her, Jo would have done it all, but at last it seemed to the girl as though nothing earthly could in any way avail; all that seemed left for her to do was to be patient and to wait.

CHAPTER XXVII.

FAITH entered heartily into the spirit of the school treat. Not a detail which concerned the comfort or amusement of her guests escaped her thoughts, and every one seemed anxious to assist her one way or another. Her own "children," whom Faith saw now only as rare visitors, were to be present, under Jo and Miss Kitty Barker's special care, and when Mr. Burton came, Faith had a favor to ask of him.

He listened gravely.

"Will it tire you, my dear?" he said, for what Faith wanted then was to have a little talk with Sandy.

The lad, after some further investigations, had been set free, and since then Bertie had found employment for him; but Faith knew that he wanted to go away from Ashfield, and she believed Mr. Burton could suggest a way.

He could, and did.

A first-class boat-builder at Bayberry was ready to take him in, knowing his history, but willing to give the lad a trial, and Sandy had professed himself delighted with the chance.

Jo had never seen Sandy to speak with him since the trial ended, but on this evening Faith sent for her own little sitting-room, where the lad, not yet recovered from the effects of the terrible ordeal he had gone through, was sitting quietly by Miss Emerson's sofa.

They had had their talk: Faith had told the boy gravely what she had left in Mr. Burton's power to do for him. If he did well while he remained with the boat-builder he was to be started in business for himself.

Softened and subdued by Faith's words, Sandy met Jo with a quiet, respectful manner.

Jo's hand was quickly outstretched. Sandy took it in his own rough palm, and drew the back of the other hand across his eyes.

"You were—good to me, Jo," he said, huskily. "I didn't thank you—I couldn't right there—but I do now."

"MY LITTLE OPPORTUNITY; THAT'S WHAT YOU ARE TO ME, JO"

And so at Faith's side the feud was forever ended. Sandy's good-by was a hurried one; but when he went out into the lightly falling summer rain the lad flung himself upon the ground, and shook in an agony of silent weeping. So Bertie Farnham, coming up heavy-hearted enough to the house, found him, and did not venture to disturb him, but later remembered it, and knew why it had been.

Faith was very anxious for a bright day, and it came. The Burnham company were assembled by eleven o'clock, but the young hostess of the occasion could only watch them from her sofa in the library, drawn into the big bow-window, when she looked out contentedly and happy at the gayly flitting young people, the animated groups, the attitudes of sociable ease into which the older ones fell. Jo hated to be away from her, yet went hither and thither at her bidding, glad, however, when at seven o'clock all was over, and she and Faith were alone upstairs in the former's room.

A fire was lighted on the hearth, for it had begun to rain again, and the evening was chill. Faith on her sofa, Jo on a low stool in the fire-light, were silent for a while, and then Faith told her what she wanted her to do.

She was to live if she liked at Mr. Burton's, to study, and then— Faith smiled.

"Do you remember, Jo," she said, "what it was you once said long ago you wanted?"

"The training school, Miss Faith."

"Yes; when you are ready, and if you still care for it, you can learn to be a nurse. Not just to care any sort of way for the sick, Jo, but to be a real nurse—carer of bodies, and souls perhaps; to do all, and with all your heart, that you can, dear."

In a moment Faith spoke again.

"Whatever you take up must be a good work, Jo, and there will always be money enough for you to be able to give some of your time to the sick and needy, to have, perhaps, charge of a little home Mr. Burton is to found for my children."

It was told so simply, and added to by such simple, gentle words of counsel, that it was hard to feel how much it all meant. Afterward they sat together talking for an hour of different things, and finally Faith bade Jo good-night.

Once—Jo was glad of this—she came back to the room without Faith's knowing it, stood in the doorway, and looked in upon her friend. Jane was dozing in her chair by the fire; Faith was still upon her couch, and her eyes were fixed upon the picture of Gethsemane, which she had asked, one day not long before, to have brought down there from the school. The fire-light showed Jo both faces: that of the Master's, heart-stricken, anguished, and alone; that of His child's, peaceful after her toil, waiting for the sound of her name, "spoken from afar."

Faith's hand was resting on the cross at her neck—the cross Jo had promised her always to keep; it moved slightly; it was folded in the other gently, and with a little sigh. And it was so they found her at daybreak: the earthly tenement deserted, the answer to the Master's summons given, her work ended, her "opportunity" come.

As you turn down Mill Street, in Burnham, and just beyond Mrs. Dawson's comfortable store, a pretty gabled house attracts every one's attention. It is on high ground, with a lawn and gardens, and at the back the most luxurious of orchards and a sort of "romping-ground" for children. Every one in or around Burnham knows the place. "Faith's Cottage" it is called, although the rambling, pretty house deserves, some think, a more dignified name; but it was Jo's wish, when she was installed as head nurse last year, that no change should be made, although wings and a dormitory were added, and room made for twenty more crippled or invalid children.

Young Jo Dawson thinks there is no such home anywhere as the "Cottage," and would, I am inclined to think, break a leg or an arm any day for the sake of having "Aunt Jo," as the children call her, take care of her; but Aunt Jo gives her little namesake all the petting possible, thankful she is not one of her crippled charges.

Everything is bright and fresh and wholesome about Faith's Cottage. Mr. Burton and his mother enjoy many pleasant days there; Bertie Farnham takes his own little daughter Faith over very often to see the place and Aunt Jo and her charges, and the Dawsons are regular visitors; while a tall, stalwart boatman named Martin gives a treat often to those among the little cottagers who can go out in summer weather.

Perhaps it is when Jo feels happiest, when the work Faith left her to do is prospering most surely, that her thoughts are the tenderest of the past. At such moments, almost instinctively, her hands touch the little cross which she wears always, and she tells her children something of the one who led her to meet her first "opportunity."

APRIL & THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.

Young April sat in the fork of a tree,
 A wilful girl as all might see,
 And fond of her wilful way,
 Now laughing, now crying, now merry,
 Now sad,
 Now noisy, now quiet, now angry, she had
 A hundred whims in a day.

"You are late," she trilled in a mocking song,
 When stately Easter came along,
 His white cloak floating wide.
 "I thought you were never coming at all,
 I've waited until I'm ready to fall."
 Then she hid her face & cried.

The Holidays, tied in a package neat,
 Just ready to lay at April's feet,
 Were under Easter's arm, (years)
 But he thought, with a sigh how for many
 She had spoiled these days with her
 Foolish tears
 And stolen half their charm.

"Here are the Holidays, April, see."
 He said as she took them "Try for me
 To do your very best; (clear)
 Let the coming week be so bright &
 That the children may find ^{me} days this year Fairer than all the rest."

"I'll try," sobbed April beginning to smile
 When she dimpled & laughed & was sweet
 For a while
 As any day in June,
 And Easter thought with an anxious glance
 "She may be good if nothing should chance
 To put her out of tune."

But an April promise is not a thing to depend upon, so the poets sing,
 And Easter I fear will say that his Holidays & the childrens' fun
 Had as much of rain as they had of sun, which is apt to be the way.

instead, been stolen by them, and brought over to America to earn money for them. As soon as this was made known the people were distressed, and the children sent back to their own homes in Switzerland. It was also found out that the children themselves had placed the papers in the beams, and that they were afraid, as they were afraid of being detected by their master.

HOLLY.

This is really an interesting story, and the manner the children took to obtain their freedom was very ingenious. The pretty "Day a Moment" song was very popular when I, like your mamma, was a little girl.

SALON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I live in a large house with my sister and my auntie's family, for my parents are both dead. I go to school, and study grammar, arithmetic, spelling, history, geography, reading, singing, and drawing. I don't like school, and will be glad when I have vacation. I am thirteen years old, but I like to play with dolls, and have two (of course I have a lot of old broken ones besides). In the summer I fix up an old shed in the garden with my dolls, and have nice things playing there. I have no pets, unless I call our six-year-old boy one; he is my cousin. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a year and a half, and think it is the best paper ever read. Sometimes I have five Sunday-school books to read in a week. I love reading very much.

KENDAL, WESTMINSTER, ENGLAND.

I thought I would like to tell you that one of my brothers and myself had ten Chinese rats. We kept them in a large cage we made, and taught them to turn a wheel and climb up sticks, but I am sorry to say some of them came to an untimely end. The cat got at them at night, and ate three; some died; others ate the rats and they have such sharp teeth, and so they got away. We had to make fresh bars for the cage almost every day. The grandfather rat lived the longest; but one day my youngest sister had a friend to play with her, we had the rat upstairs on my brother's shoulder, it was very old, and as he was going out of the cage, some one closed it and knocked the rat's nose, which killed it. We were very sorry, as it was an old one, but we buried it in our garden and erected a stone over its grave, with the date on it.

RICHARD P. S.

Since the poor old Monsieur Rat had to die, it was a great comfort to erect a monument over his grave, was it not?

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA.

I have just finished "Dolly's Santa Claus," a Christmas story in the Post-office, which made me think of a piece of poetry I wrote before I was ten years old, and as I could not think of a story, I thought I would send this:

Ten little daisies,

All playing in the fields,

All with a sword

With their swords and shields.

The leaves were the shields,

As we're all sure to know;

The petals are their hands,

Just as white as snow.

Two for the captains,

Four on each side,

And this is the way the daisies played

Until they all died.

MIAMI P. L. (age eleven years).

WORSLEY, MASSACHUSETTS, ENGLAND.

I have a little brother called Tootie; he is six years old. We have a dog called Bean; he is very affectionate. I live in Worsley, and it is a very pretty place, and I like it very much. I hope you will put this letter in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I want a name for a canary, please, age eight. Good-by.

DOUGLAS H. F.

Goldie, Coquette, Sprite, Caprice, Muff, Fluff, Pet—are pretty names.

EASTON SHORE, MARYLAND.

I am now ill in bed. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for seven months, and I love it. I like the Post-office box very much. I live on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and like it very much. I go to school, about one mile from home, and study spelling, reading, history, grammar, and geography, and many more lessons. I am twelve years old. For pets, I have a goat, which I drive with a wagon, two cats, and two tame hens. I had a canary-bird, but it died.

MARY H.

BUFFALO BLUFF, FLORIDA.

I am a girl thirteen years old. My home is on a hill, and the St. Johns River, and it is a very pretty place. All the creeks flow running between Jacksonville and Sanford, Florida, and the Ocklawaha River flows, passing in front of our house. And also the J. T. & K. W. Railroad, running between Jacksonville and Sanford, runs through the whole length of our house. A bridge crosses the river at this place. The scenery is lovely here. We are twelve miles by river from Palatka, and four miles by railroad. We lived in Charlotte, New York, eleven years, and we have lived here three winters and one summer. We spent one summer in Charlotte. We intend going to the sunny South in the summer. My sister, both younger than myself. For pets, I have three kittens and a dog. We have a row-boat, and I can row as well as any one. There are a great many alligators here in summer.

ELIZABETH N. H.

KILBO, BANK, KIRKBRISTE, SCOTLAND.

I have been glad to write you for a long time. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE so much; I get it on my way from school every Monday. I have one sister, Nettie, and five brothers, Davie, Willie, Harry, Ronald, and baby, who is four months old. He is named Archibald Whyte, after a friend of papa's. He has fair hair and dark blue eyes. We could not get to school to-day, the rain was so heavy, and with snow. No trains have come to Kirkbristie to-day. I go to school, and take English lessons, French, German, and music. I am soon to begin drawing.

AGNES B. J. (11 years).

By the time you see your letter, you will almost have forgotten the snow.

BLACKPOOL, ENGLAND.

I have been waiting a long time to send you a letter, but I have not got to come to Blackpool. It is so pretty, with two beautiful piers and a splendid promenade. If you come in the summer-time, you must come to our garden, and have tea in the tent, and a game of lawn tennis.

With love and kisses,

ETHEL MCN. (6 years old).

Thank you, dear.

Here are letters from a little brother and sister:

BREHAY, GLENG, LOGBOURGH, ENGLAND.

I am a boy eleven years old. This is the first letter I have written to you. I like reading the letters in the Post-office Box very much. We have a dog, and a cat, and a mouse, and a rabbit, and he will let me stroke him. We have five tame rabbits, and other pets.

GEORGE HENRY S.

ROTHAY, LOGBOURGH.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have a pretty little kitten called Tibby. My youngest brother goes to school at Atherton. I have two brothers and one sister. We began to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE this year, and we all like it very much.

HILDA MARIAN S.

DEORIEDA, IRELAND.

Drogheda is a very picturesque old town. We live quite close to an old gate called St. Lawrence's Gate; you can see the whole of the town from the top of it. There is one tower called St. Magdalene also in the town. The battle of the Boyne was fought near this town. I once had a goldfish, but my sister made it fall dead in the cage, and we buried it in our garden. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, especially the Post-office Box. I have a letter, and leads it to me. I am eleven years old. My birthday falls on New-year's Day, so everybody keeps it a long time, and some make a party. I like it very much, which I hope you will like. I would like very much to see this letter in print, as it is my first.

I remain, with love,

DORA C. K.

PORTLAND, OREGON.

I am a little boy ten years old, and my birthday is on the Fourth of July. Every summer we go down to the beach, and stay in the water, and I like it down there very much, for we go in bathing pretty nearly every day, when it is clear and pleasant and the water is warm. I have a row-boat, and I can row it, but I cannot catch nor get off; I have to run up against the fence and get off. My brother has one also, and he can row it very well; he can get off, and he can catch fish. My sister is two years older than I. My bicycle is not a very good one, nor a very big one, but it is good enough for me; my brother's is a pretty good one, and a good deal better than mine. We have a little dog also; I think he is old—about fifteen years. I have a pet chicken named Speck, and I got that from my mother. I have a hen with the name of Speck, which I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I got it on Christmas for a Christmas present from papa. I like the pictures best of all.

WILLIE N.

TRUMBULL, MASS.

I will tell you about my dog. His name is Speck; we named him after the gentleman who gave him to papa. I fed and watered him, and papa said I was so good about it that he would give him to me. A gentleman and I taught him two tricks.

One of them is that when I bring a knotted rag, he will run and get it and throw it to me; and the other is, when I give him his dinner, and say to him, "Heed!" he will not go to it, until I say, "Hi away!" and then he will begin to eat it. He is a setter, and he is a white dog with liver-colored spots.

WILLIE E. B.

RICK CHURCH, NEW JERSEY.

MY DEAR POSTMASTER.—I am a little girl eight years old. My sister Louise takes the YOUNG PEOPLE, and though I cannot understand all the stories, I enjoy the paper very much. My sister wrote a letter to you, so as to surprise me, and I was just printed, but it was not printed, so I wrote you one to surprise her.

BESSIE R. B.

LEWISTOWN, ILLINOIS.

I want to tell you about Cairo, where I lived before I came here. It is at the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi. It is a good many feet below the river, which is only kept out by levees. I wish the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE could see it when the river is at its highest. They have the levees built, and on top of that a sort of wooden fence, put up with dirt piled on it. This, coming right up to the edge of this fence, is the great river, which threatens to run over at any minute. A great many stopped school when the river was so high, but a good many did not. The levees had broken. Then you should have seen the hurrying and scurrying. I was rather glad, because I thought I could sit on the ball steps and catch fish, but the river didn't come in at all.

THE SPRING FLOODS—A TRYING SITUATION

"OTHELLO AND DESDEMONA."

DESDEMONA was the beautiful daughter of a rich Senator of Venice. Being amiable as well as beautiful and rich, she did not lack suitors, and it was a great disappointment to many of the richest and noblest young Venetians of her time when she accepted as her betrothed husband a Moor named Othello.

But though he came of a different race from her own—for Moors are natives of Africa—Othello was in all other respects a her namesake than the former, for she is indeed a beautiful and gentle creature, and, moreover, she is Italian, as Desdemona was. But the "Othello" of the picture—why, he has nothing but his black face to fit him for the character. The hero of Shakespeare's tragedy was a giant in strength and courage, as a mastiff is among dogs. This little pug would rather go without his dinner than fight, I am sure; and as for his wanting to kill "Desdemona," if that young lady chose to run away "Othello" would never catch her in the wide world.

EASTER.

BY MARY E. VANDYNE.

HALL, to the spring-time, the wide world adorning!
 Fair is her countenance, fragrant her breath.
 Borne on her wings is that wonderful morning
 When Life in its loveliness triumphs o'er Death.
 Hark to the voices!
 All nature rejoices,
 Rings the glad choruses
 O'er mountain and shore.
 Earth in her glory repeats the sweet story,
 Love is the conqueror; Death is no more.

Loosed from the fetters wherewith winter bound them,
 Flowerets are lifting their heads to the sun;
 Hid 'neath the turf the soft zephyrs found them,
 And whispered the tale of the victory won.
 Sweet birds are singing,
 The glad tidings bringing.
 Hark how the notes
 In their melody pour,
 All the air filling, every heart thrilling!
 Love is the victor; Death is no more.

Wreaths of white lilies are ranged on the altar,
 Lilies of Easter in beauty so rare.
 Israel's King in the height of his glory
 Was not arrayed like the lilies so fair.

Stately and stender,
 And robed in white splendor,
 Lifting their heads,
 When the winter is o'er,
 Smiling at sadness, proclaiming with gladness,
 Love is the conqueror; Death is no more.

Sweetest of all are the songs of the children,
 Greeting with rapture the glad Easter-tide.
 Hark! through the air rings the grand jubilate,
 Spreading the story so far and so wide.

Censers are swinging,
 Hosannas are ringing,
 The nations are thronging
 Their Lord to adore.
 Winter has vanished, sorrow is banished;
 Love is the conqueror; Death is no more.

CHAPTER III.

ON DECK.

HAD Jerry not been feeling utterly miserable when he staggered from the fore-peak to the fore-castle, he might have hesitated a moment before going on deck. As it was, however, he was too sick to have any fears regarding the reception he might meet with from the Captain. He was growing worse each moment, therefore he ascended the steep, narrow staircase as rapidly as the motion of the brig would permit; but unfortunately he had not chosen his time well, nor did he take any extra precautions to retain his foot-hold after he reached the companionway.

Therefore it was that the officers on the quarter-deck, the cook near the galley, and the crew forward, were very much surprised at seeing a small, pale-faced boy hurled from the fore-castle companionway the entire length of the brig, stopping only when he struck the first mate full in the stomach.

Now no man, even though he be the first officer of as large a craft as the Clio, can remain upright when quite a heavy boy is thrown at him with great force, and the consequence was that Jerry and the mate rolled down to leeward, both striking the rail with a resounding blow.

The Captain looked bewildered at this sudden appearance of a boy when he had believed there was none on board; the cook closed the galley door suddenly, as if he did not dare to look at the ruin, of which he was the remote cause, and the crew laughed boisterously at the downfall of the man who was far from being a favorite.

The mate scrambled to his feet and began kicking Jerry industriously, too angry even to be surprised; and while he was thus engaged, another and a smaller boy, but with quite as white a face as the first, came rolling down the deck like an animated ball, striking the mate's foot just as he raised it to kick Jerry for the third time.

Down fell the officer again, while a suppressed but yet shrill squeak from the second boy told that his body had served to break the force of the mate's fall.

Of course this second boy was Pete. When Jerry had left the fore-peak he thought he would venture out as far as the companionway to see that his friend was not abused, and just as he got there a "green" wave raised the bow of the brig high in the air, causing him to execute exactly the same manœuvre as Jerry had performed.

The Captain turned as if half expecting a shower of boys was about to fall upon the brig; the cook made an almost deafening clatter with his pots and pans, as if he was too busy just at that moment to even peep outside the galley, no matter what might happen, and the man at the wheel joined his companions in a roar of laughter.

When the mate scrambled to his feet for the second time his face was almost purple with rage, and he started toward the two boys, who were lying under the rail, as if he was about to inflict some terrible punishment upon them.

"Stop, Mr. Harding!" cried the Captain, quickly recovering from his apparent bewilderment as he saw the look of anger in the mate's face. "Before you punish them it will be well to know of what they are guilty."

"Of what they are guilty?" repeated the officer, impatiently. "Why, they are stowaways, of course, and I'll teach them how to treat me in a proper manner."

"It can hardly be possible that they willfully came aft in that fashion; and even though they are stowaways, a man has no right to flog boys as small as they are."

The mate looked at the Captain a moment as if to assure himself that he could trust the evidence of his own ears—that he was not to be allowed to punish those who had upset his body and his dignity at the same time, and then he walked indignantly to the other side of the deck. By this time the cook had plucked up sufficient courage to push open the galley door a few inches in order that he might learn what course the Captain intended to pursue toward the stowaways, and the crew came as far aft as they dared, to see and hear what was going on.

"Well, where did you come from?" asked the Captain, after he had tried in vain two or three times to look angry.

"We come out of that hole there, up near the bowsprit," replied Jerry, gravely.

"That hole?" repeated the Captain; and then he added, as a positive smile appeared on his face, while the crew made no attempt to check their merriment: "Oh, you stowed away in the fore-peak, did you? How does it happen that you came shooting down aft as you did?"

"Please, sir," said Jerry, piteously, "we couldn't help it. I was coming to tell you about our being on board, when the vessel jumped up and I fell down. I suppose that's the way Pete got here, though he promised me he'd stay down-stairs till after I'd had the flogging."

"Until after you had what flogging?"

"Why, the one that you're going to give me for stowing away," replied Jerry, as he drew poor little sick Pete closer to his side, as if to protect him.

"But didn't you suppose that if I flogged one, I would serve the other in the same way?"
